

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

HANSARD'S
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

THIRD SERIES:

COMMENCING WITH THE ACCESSION OF

WILLIAM IV.

45° VICTORIÆ, 1882.

VOL. CCLXX.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM

THE FIFTH DAY OF JUNE 1882,

THE TWENTY-FIRST DAY OF JUNE 1882. .

Fifth Volume of the Session.

L O N D O N :

PUBLISHED BY CORNELIUS BUCK,

AT THE OFFICE FOR "HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,"

22, PATERNOSTER ROW. [E.C.]

1882.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

TO

VOLUME CCLXX.

THIRD SERIES.

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 5.

Page

Justices' Jurisdiction Bill—

Bill to extend the Jurisdiction of Justices in General and Quarter Sessions of the Peace—Presented (The Lord Bramwell); read 1^a (No. 112) 1

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, The Marquess of Salisbury, The Earl of Carnarvon; Answers, Earl Granville .. 3

Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock) Bill—Moved, "That the Bill be re-committed to another Select Committee,"—
(The Duke of Westminster) .. 4

After debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill re-committed accordingly: The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF MR. PARNELL AND OTHERS CONFINED UNDER THE ACT—MOTION FOR PAPERS—

Moved, "For correspondence respecting the release of certain persons imprisoned under the Act,"—(The Marquess of Waterford) .. 19
After debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Entail (Scotland) Bill—

Bill to amend the Law of Entail in Scotland—Presented (The Lord Rossbery) 51
After short debate, Bill read 1^a (No. 115.)

Parliamentary Oaths Act (1868) Amendment Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Duke of Argyll); read 1^a (No. 111) .. 54

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 5.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

STANDING ORDERS—

Standing Order 129 amended, in lines 9 and 10, by leaving out the words "the Report of the Examiner on such Bill," and inserting the words "the Examiner shall have given notice of the day on which the Bill will be examined" instead thereof,—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

VOL. CCLXX. [THIRD SERIES.] [b]

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 5.]

Page

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—APPOINTMENTS IN THE ROYAL ENGINEERS—Questions, Mr. Stewart Macliver, Colonel Alexander; Answers, Mr. Childers ..	55
THE MAGISTRACY (SCOTLAND)—LICENSING MAGISTRATES AT PETERHEAD—Questions, Dr. Cameron; Answers, The Lord Advocate ..	58
DEBTORS' (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1880—ILLEGAL PAWNING — Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate ..	59
CRIME (IRELAND)—CASE OF JOHN LYNE—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	59
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. H. BLAKE, R.M.—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan ..	60
PUBLIC WORKS (INDIA)—RETURN 259 OF 1859—CONSTRUCTION OF RAILWAYS—Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington ..	61
ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CAPTAIN TALBOT—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan ..	61
ENGLAND (EAST COAST)—HARBOURS OF REFUGE — FILEY — Question, Sir Harry Verney; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	62
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—W. FITZSIMONS AND T. TUTTE—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	62
PRISONS (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN HILL—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	63
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. DOLAN AND HANLY—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	63
ARMY — SENIOR MAJORS—Question, Sir Henry Fletcher; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	64
ARMY—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS—WEST INDIAN REGIMENTS—Question, Major Master; Answer, Mr. Childers ..	64
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOSEPH HUBAN AND OTHERS—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	64
LICENSING ACTS (IRELAND)—CASE OF MRS. KELLY—Questions, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan ..	65
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—EDWARD BARRETT—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	66
INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—PAY OF SURVEYING OFFICERS—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Mr. Courtney ..	66
CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—SALARIES — Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Courtney ..	67
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	67
PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE STRANGERS' GALLERY—Question, Mr. Joseph Cowen; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre ..	71
COPYRIGHT (WORKS OF FINE ART, &c.) BILL—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Hastings ..	71
SOUTH AFRICA (THE TRANSVAAL)—ATTACKS BY THE BOERS ON NATIVE TRIBES—Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley ..	71
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE BRITISH SQUADRON — Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman ..	73
AFRICA (EAST COAST)—SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE—Question, Mr. Gourley; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman ..	73
CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—SALARIES OF COLLECTORS—Question, Mr. Jackson; Answer, Mr. Courtney ..	74
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. PARNELL—Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland ..	75

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 5.]	Page
FRANCE—THE BIMETALLIC CONFERENCE AT PARIS—Question, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	75
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—VOLUNTEER CORPS—Question, Mr. Rankin; Answer, Mr. Childers	75
ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—Questions, Mr. Biddell, Mr. Gregory; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	76
WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE—THE CARRIAGE DUTIES—Question, Mr. Cochran-Patrick; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	77
PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—MEMORIAL OF IRISH JUDGES—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	77
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	78
PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT—PRISON WARDERS—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	78
LICENSING ACTS (IRELAND)—CORK RACES—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	79
NAVY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD H.M.S. "SWIFTSURE"—Questions, Sir John Hay, Lord Eustace Cecil, Colonel Nolan; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. Childers	80
PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE RECENT DIVISION—Questions, Mr. Mac Iver, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Gladstone ..	81
PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	82
PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE—AMENDMENTS—PRECEDENCE IN COMMITTEE—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Speaker	82

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [FOURTH NIGHT]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 2nd June] After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow .	83
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Bill [Bill 153]— Order for Committee read :— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Mundella) Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. A. Grant :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Original Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee. Moved , "That the Chairman do report Progress , and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Mundella :)—Motion agreed to :—Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow .	208
Partnerships (re-committed) Bill [Bill 179]— Order for Committee read :— Moved , "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,"—(Mr. Monk) Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Horace Davey :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Original Question put, and agreed to :—Bill considered in Committee. Committee report Progress ; to sit again upon Monday 19th June .	210
Judgments (Inferior Courts) Bill [Bill 44]— Further Consideration, as amended, resumed After short debate, Bill to be read the third time To-morrow .	215

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 5.]	Page
County Courts (Advocates' Costs) Bill [Bill 188]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Hastings) ..	217
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday .

Criminal Lunatics Bill — Ordered (Mr. Findlater, Mr. Dillwyn) ; presented, and read the first time [Bill 192]	218
--	-----

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 6.

Union of Benefices (London) Bill (No. 101)—
Amendments reported (according to Order)	219
After short debate, Bill to be read 3 ^a on Tuesday next; and to be printed , as amended. (No. 118.)
Imprisonment for Contumacy Bill (No. 103)—
Amendments reported (according to Order)	220
After short debate, Bill to be read 3 ^a on Tuesday next.
Somersham Rectory Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Earl of Powis) ; read 1 ^a , and referred to the Examiners (No. 116)	223
Lunacy Districts (Scotland) Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Earl of Dalhousie) ; read 1 ^a (No. 117)	223

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 6.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—THE EARTHWORKS—Question, Mr. Bourke ; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	224
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. P. J. QUINN—Questions, Mr. Healy ; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	225
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—DETENTION OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. Healy ; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	225
PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA) 1881—IMPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVE OILS FROM AMERICA—Question, Mr. Macfarlane ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	226
NAVY—THE RIGGERS IN THE DOCKYARDS—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff ; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	227
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE REV. THOMAS FEEHAN—Questions, Mr. Marum, Mr. Leamy, Mr. Gibson ; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	227
IRELAND—STATE-AIDED EMIGRATION—Questions, Captain Aylmer, Mr. T. P. O'Connor ; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	228
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. M'Coan, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett ; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	229
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. THOMAS BRENNAN—Questions, Mr. Tottenham, Mr. Labouchere ; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	233
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Questions, Mr. J. G. Hubbard, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Healy ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	235
NAVY—BREECH-LOADING GUNS—Question, Colonel Nolan ; Answer, Mr. Childers	236

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 6.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [FIFTH NIGHT]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 5th June] After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow .	237
---	-----

Settled Land Bill [Lords] [Bill 120]— Order for Committee read:— Moved , “That the Order for going into Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,”—(Sir R. Assheton Cross) Question, “That the Order for going into Committee be discharged,” put, and agreed to . Moved , “That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,”—(Sir R. Assheton Cross :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn . Moved , “That the Bill be committed to the Select Committee on the Conveyancing Bill,”—(Sir R. Assheton Cross :)—Question put, and agreed to .	349
--	-----

Vagrancy Bill [Bill 62]— Moved , “That the Bill be now read a second time,”—(Mr. Pall) After short debate, Question put, and agreed to :—Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday .	358
--	-----

Commonable Rights Bill — Moved , “That the Lords Amendments be now considered” Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Warton :)—After short debate, Question put:—The House divided ; Ayes 16, Noes 38; Majority 22.—(Div. List, No. 115) Original Question put, and agreed to .	361
---	-----

Corn Returns (No. 2) Bill — Ordered (Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. John Holms); presented , and read the first time [Bill 193]	363
Settlement and Removal Law Amendment Bill — Ordered (Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert); presented , and read the first time [Bill 194]	363

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, Mr. M'Coan, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	364
PARLIAMENT—ORDER IN DEBATE—MR. O'KELLY, M.P. FOR ROSCOMMON— Observations, Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Speaker	365

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [SIXTH NIGHT]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 6th June] After long time spent therein, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress:—Committee to sit again To-morrow .	367
--	-----

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 8.		Page
Justices' Jurisdiction Bill (No. 112)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Bramwell)	..	454
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE COMBINED FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—
Question. Observations, The Earl of Ravensworth; Reply, The Earl of Northbrook	460
 COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 8.
Q U E S T I O N S.
<hr/>
THE CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION— Question, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answer, Mr. Courtney	455
POST OFFICE—ADHESIVE STAMPS ON POST CARDS— Question, Mr. R. H. Paget; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	465
THE LIBRARY OF THE FOUR COURTS, DUBLIN— Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	466
VACCINATION—TRANSMISSION OF DISEASE THROUGH INOCULATION OF SOLDIERS IN THE FRENCH ARMY— Question, Mr. Hopwood; Answer, Mr. Dodson	467
HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)—VACANCIES ON THE IRISH BENCH— Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	467
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICCTIONS AT DRUMLISH, CO. LONGFORD— Questions, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	468
POST OFFICE—INSURANCE OF REGISTERED LETTERS— Question, Mr. Greer; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	469
CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CASE OF J. M. JOHNSON, EX-SUSPECT— Questions, Mr. Charles Russell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	469
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. THOMAS EGAN— Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	470
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. DENIS KELLY— Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	471
INDIA—SIMLA ARMY COMMISSION— Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	471
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—HALL OF SCIENCE, OLD STREET— Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Mundella	472
EMIGRATION—THE "NEMESIS"— Questions, Mr. Moore; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain	472
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—COLEMAN NAUGHTON— Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	474
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN KELLY— Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	474
SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—JOHN DUNN'S TERRITORY— Questions, Mr. Richard, Mr. Gorst; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley	474
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)— Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	475
ARMY—FIELD DAYS IN HOT WEATHER— Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Childers	476
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT SUDA BAY— Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	476
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. E. J. AND M. J. BARRETT— Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	476
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MARTIN MULLEAGUE— Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	477

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 8.]	Page
POST OFFICE—THE IRISH MAILS—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	477
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—ARMING OF THE FORTS AT ALEXANDRIA—Question, Mr. Bourke; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke.. ..	478
INDIA (BENGAL)—MORTALITY IN GAOLS—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	478
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. DENIS CROSBIE—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	480
POST OFFICE—AUXILIARY LETTER CARRIERS—Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Courtney	480
STATE OF IRELAND—OUTRAGE AT RATHCOOLE—Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	481
PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA) 1881—IMPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVE OILS FROM AMERICA—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	481
ARMY—COMMITTEE ON DRESS OF THE ARMY—Question, Colonel Barne; Answer, Mr. Childers	482
POST OFFICE—LETTER CARRIERS (BLACKHEATH AND GREENWICH)—Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	483
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Gibson, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Bulwer; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	483
METROPOLIS—EPPING FOREST—Question, Mr. Labouchere; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	485
IRELAND—KILLALOE DRAINAGE WORKS—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Courtney	486
POOR LAW—THE BURNLEY BOARD OF GUARDIANS—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHILDREN—Question, Mr. Callan; Answer, Mr. Dodson	486
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MISS GLEESON—Question, Mr. J. C. Lawrance; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	487
INSPECTORS OF FISHERIES—Question, Mr. Birkbeck; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	488
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. CROSBIE AND MRS. QUINN—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	488
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	489
PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—CLAUSE 5—DEASY'S ACT—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	490
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ENGLISH AND SCOTCH AGRICULTURAL MEASURES—Questions, Mr. James Howard, Mr. Chaplin; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	491
IRISH LAND COMMISSION—LABOURERS' COTTAGES—Question, Lord John Manners; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	492
NAVY—ACCIDENT ON BOARD H.M.S. "SWIFTSURE"—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	493
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. THOMAS DUNLEAVY—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan.. ..	493
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE CONFERENCE—Notices, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Puleston	494

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [SEVENTH NIGHT]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 7th June]	494
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 8.]	Page
Corn Returns (No. 8) Bill [Bill 193]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Chamberlain)	610
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read a second time.
Moved , "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill,"—(Mr. Chamberlain.)
Amendment proposed,
To leave out all the words after the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee,"—(Mr. John Talbot.)
Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to :—Main Question put, and agreed to :—Bill committed for Monday next.
Married Women's Property Bill [Lords] [Bill 191]—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Osborne Morgan)	615
Moved , "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Sir George Campbell):—
Question put, and negatived :—Original Question put, and agreed to :—
Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

M O T I O N S .

—o—

Police Bill—

Motion for Leave (Mr. Hibbert)	617
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill to make provision respecting the pensions, allowances, and gratuities of Police Constables in Great Britain and their widows and children; and to make other provisions respecting the Police of Great Britain, ordered (Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, The Lord Advocate); presented , and read the first time [Bill 197.]
Trusts (Scotland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. James Stewart, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. Crum); presented , and read the first time [Bill 198]	621
Conveyancing and Settled Land Bills—Ordered , That the Select Committee do consist of Twenty-one Members:—List of the Committee	621

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 9.

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MURDER OF MR. W. BOURKE AND ESCORT—THREE FARMERS SHOT AND MAIMED—Questions , Lord Oranmore and Browne; Replies, Earl Granville, Lord Carlingford	621
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—Question , The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville	622
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—Observations , Question, Viscount Midleton; Reply, Lord Carlingford	623
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—WILLESDEN SCHOOL BOARD—Observations , The Earl of Carnarvon; Reply, Lord Carlingford; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury; Answer, Earl Granville	627
ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH—Question , Observations, Lord Truro; Reply, The Earl of Morley	628

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 9.

Page

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—o:0:—

Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Bill (by Order)—

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time" 631

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months,"—(Mr. Monk.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question : "

—After debate, Question put : —The House divided; Ayes 220, Noes 74; Majority 146.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

Main Question put, and agreed to (Queen's Consent signified) :—Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

—o—

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—PAY AND PROMOTION—Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan 651

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICCTIONS IN CONNEMARA—Questions, Viscount Lymington, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan .. 651

ARMY—ORGANIZATION OF THE CAVALRY—Question, Colonel O'Beirne; Answer, Sir Arthur Hayter 652

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE DERRY CITY BENCH—Questions, Mr. Redmond, Mr. Macartney; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Callan [No answer] 653

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—REMOVAL OF PLACARDS—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan 654

ARMY—COST OF SALUTES—Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Sir Arthur Hayter 654

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. A. AND P. GALLAHER—Question, Mr. Lalor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan .. 655

SOUTH AFRICA—CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—RESTRICTIONS AS TO CORRESPONDENCE—Questions, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley 655

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MISS M'CORMACK—Questions, Mr. O'Sullivan, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, The Attorney General for Ireland 656

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—THE ISLAND OF ARRAN—Questions, Mr. Dillon, Sir Henry Fletcher, Mr. Healy, Mr. Brodrick, Sir Herbert Maxwell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. Speaker .. 657

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE—Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke 660

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—SECTION 31—ADVANCES TO IRISH TENANTS—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone .. 661

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MURDER OF MR. W. BOURKE AND ESCORT—THREE FARMERS SHOT AND MAIMED—Question, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan 662

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS—STANDING ORDER 167—Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Mr. Lyon Playfair 664

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE KHEDIVE—Question, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke 664

AFFAIRS OF MALTA—NOTICE OF MOTION—Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Anderson 665

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS—ORDER OF BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Speaker 665

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 9.]

Page

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [EIGHTH NIGHT]
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 8th June]	666
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

COUNTY COURTS [SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF EXAMINERS OF ACCOUNTS]—
Considered in Committee	772
Resolution agreed to , to be reported upon Monday next.

PUBLIC OFFICES SITE BILL SELECT COMMITTEE—

Ordered, That the Report and Minutes of Evidence of the Select Committee on Public Offices and Buildings (Metropolis) 1877, be referred to the Select Committee on the Public Offices Site Bill,—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 12.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA —Questions, The Marquess of Salisbury, Earl De La Warr; Answers, Earl Granville ..	773
---	-----

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill (No. 75)—
Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Earl of Dalhousie) ..	774
Amendment moved , to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months,")—(The Lord Balfour.)
After debate, on question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion? their Lordships divided ; Contents 128; Not-Contents 131; Majority 3.
Division List, Contents and Not-Contents	801
Resolved in the negative ; and Bill to be read 2 ^a on this day six months .

Public Health (Fruit-Pickers Lodgings) Bill [H.L.]— Presented (The Earl Stan- hope); read 1 ^a (No. 127)	804
---	-----

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 12.

MOTION.

—:0:—

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—"GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH" —
Moved , "That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament,"—(Mr. Labouchere)	805 Motion postponed .

QUESTIONS.

—:0:—

METROPOLIS—THE PARKS—GARDENS OF THE ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY, REGENT'S PARK—ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC —Question, Mr. Broadhurst; Answer, Mr. Courtney	805
EVICCTIONS (SCOTLAND)—LOCHCARRON, CO. ROSS —Question, Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh; Answer, The Lord Advocate	806
THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—MR. COMYN, SUB-COMMISSIONER —Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	807
THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—MESSRS. WYLIE AND CUNINGHAME, SUB-COMMISSIONERS —Question, Lord Arthur Hill; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	807
CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—PROSECUTION AT SLEAFORD —Question, Mr. Heneage; Answer, Mr. Mundella	808

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]

	Page
METROPOLIS—THAMES RIVER (HUMAN CORPSES)—Questions, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir William Harcourt	809
ARMY—THE BRITISH TROOPS IN NATAL—Question, Sir David Wedderburn; Answer, Mr. Childers	810
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICCTIONS AT RYNMOUNT, CO. LONGFORD—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	810
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN GANNON—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	811
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTRIBUTION OF THE VOTE OF COMPENSATION—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	811
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — DR. O'BRIEN AND MR. DOYLE—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	812
NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)—GRANTS TO NATIONAL SCHOOLS—Question, Mr. Synan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	813
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. BERNARD M'HUGH—Question, Mr. O'Kelly; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan.. ..	814
HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)—JUDICIAL VACANCIES — Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; [No answer]	814
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. M. J. LYONS—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	815
NAVY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD H.M.S. "SWIFTSURE"—Question, Sir John Hay; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	815
HIGHWAY RATES—SMALL TENEMENTS — Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Dodson	816
PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS)—ROBIN HOOD COURT, SHOE LANE—Question, Mr. J. G. Talbot; Answer, Mr. Dodson	816
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE PROTECTION FOR CARETAKERS IN COUNTY WICKLOW—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	817
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA—THE PAPERS—Questions, Mr. Bourke, Lord Eustace Cecil, Mr. Onslow, Sir George Campbell, Mr. O'Donnell, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Northcote, Sir Stafford Northcote; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	818
PUBLIC HEALTH—UNQUALIFIED MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS—Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	822
POST OFFICE—AUXILIARY LETTER CARRIERS—Question, Mr. J. G. Hubbard; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	823
ARMY (IRELAND)—SOLDIERS AS CARETAKERS—Question, General Sir George Balfour; Answer, Mr. Childers	824
AFRICA (SOUTH)—CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—LETTER FROM THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT URGING HIS RESTORATION—Question, Sir Wilfrid Lawson; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley	824
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JAMES MONAGHAN—Question, Mr. T. D. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	825
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—TEARING DOWN NOTICES—Question, Mr. T. D. Sullivan; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	825
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET—SUDA BAY—Questions, Sir John Hay; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	825
ADULTERATION ACTS—LARD CHEESE—Questions, Mr. R. H. Paget, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton; Answers, Mr. Chamberlain	826
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Question, Sir William Hart-Dyke; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	827
STATE OF IRELAND—ILLEGAL NOTICES—"BOYCOTTING"—Questions, Sir Baldwyn Leighton; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Healy; [No answer]	828

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]	Page
CURRENCY—THE MONETARY CONFERENCE, PARIS—Question, Mr. Briggs ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	829
POST OFFICE — THE UXBRIDGE POST OFFICE — Question, Mr. Schreiber ; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	829
INDIA—APPOINTMENTS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	830
INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND)—FLOODS AT KILLALOE—Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor ; Answer, Mr. Courtney	831
ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT — Question, Colonel O'Beirne ; Answer, Mr. Childers	832
IRELAND—AGRARIAN OUTRAGES—THE RETURNS—Question, Mr. Buxton ; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	832
INDIA—FORCED LABOUR IN ASSAM—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell ; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	833
INDIA—NATIVE ESTATES — APPOINTMENTS OF MANAGERS — Question, Mr. O'Donnell ; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	833
THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME — Question, Mr. Monk ; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain	834
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS) — THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE — Questions, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Puleston, Mr. A. J. Balfour ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	834
ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE ESTIMATES—Questions, Sir Staf- ford Northcote, Mr. Brand ; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	836
PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE PROTEST OF THE JUDGES— Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Callan ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	838
THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—ESTIMATED ASSETS—Questions, Lord George Hamilton, Mr. Mulholland ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Courtney ..	839
THAMES NAVIGATION—THE THAMES BELOW BRIDGE—Question, Mr. Thorold Rogers ; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	840
PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE CONDITION OF IRELAND— Questions, Mr. Monk, Mr. O'Donnell, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Healy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor ; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	840
SCOTLAND—LOCAL TAXATION AND EXPENDITURE—Question, Mr. Anderson ; Answer, The Lord Advocate	843
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTING—Question, Mr. Dillwyn ; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	843

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 9th June] [Ninth Night] After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress ; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.	844
Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers Bill [Bill 153]— Bill considered in Committee After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow , at Two of the clock.	949
Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 154] Bill considered in Committee After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Friday .	952

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 12.]

Page

MOTION.

—:0:—

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—“GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH”— RESOLUTION—

Moved “That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament,”—(Mr. Labouchere)

963

Motion being opposed, not proceeded with.

COUNTY COURTS [SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF EXAMINERS OF ACCOUNTS]—

Resolution [June 9] reported, and agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the County Courts (Advocates’ Costs) Bill, That they have power to make provision therein, pursuant to the said Resolution.

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 13.

EGYPT (LATEST TELEGRAMS)—Observations, Earl Granville ; Question, The Marquess of Salisbury ; Answer, Earl Granville 964

Pluralities Acts Amendment Bill (Nos. 74-102)—

Amendments reported (according to order) 965

Bill to be read 3^a on Monday next ; and to be printed as amended. (No. 139.)

Imprisonment for Contumacy Bill (Nos. 91-103)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 3^a,”—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury) 965

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Bill read 3^a accordingly ; an Amendment made ; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment Bill (No. 120)—

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a,”—(The Viscount Monck) .. 966

Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Metropolis Management and Building Acts Amendment Bill (No. 104)—

House in Committee (according to order) 967

Bill reported, without amendment ; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

FOOD SUPPLY—IMPORT OF FROZEN SHEEP—Question, Observations, Lord Lamington ; Reply, Lord Sudeley 969

NAVY—H.M.S. “INCONSTANT”—Question, Viscount Sidmouth ; Answer, The Earl of Northbrook 971

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—WILLESDEN DISTRICT SCHOOL BOARD—Observations, The Earl of Carnarvon ; Reply, Lord Carlingford ; Observations, Viscount Cranbrook 971

ENTAILS (SCOTLAND)—MOTION FOR A RETURN—

Moved for Return of—

“I. Entails executed in Scotland prior to 1st August 1848 ;

(a.) The number cut off since that date ;

(b.) The number now in existence :

“II. Entails executed in Scotland on and subsequent to 1st August 1848 :

(a.) The number registered ;

(b.) The number which have since been cut off ;

(c.) The number now in existence,”—(The Earl of Camperdown)

974

After short debate, Motion agreed to:—Ordered to be laid before the House.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 18.]	Page
Election of Representative Peers (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Earl of Belmore); read 1^a (No. 137)	976
Intermediate Education (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]—Presented (The Lord O'Hagan); read 1^a (No. 138)	976

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 13.

QUESTIONS.

—o:0:—

LICENSING ACTS (SCOTLAND)—THE JOINT LICENSING COMMITTEE, PETER-HEAD—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Courtney..	976
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SPELLING REFORM—THE PHONIC SYSTEM—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Mundella ..	977
VACCINATION—THE OFFICIAL METHOD—Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Dodson ..	978
THE IRISH CHURCH TEMPORALITIES COMMISSION—NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) ACT—Question, Mr. Macartney; Answer, Mr. Courtney ..	979
EMIGRATION—PASSENGER TRAFFIC FROM SCANDINAVIAN PORTS—Question, Mr. Moore; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	979
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Questions, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. G. W. Elliot, Mr. Raikes, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Joseph Cowen, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	980
EMIGRATION—THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA—PASSENGER ACTS—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Moore; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain ..	983
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. J. HOULIHAN—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	984
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PATRICK AND JOHN CURLEY—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	984
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. M. P. KENNY—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	984
IRELAND—INTERFERENCE OF THE POLICE — EDENDERRY — Question, Mr. Molloy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	985
IRELAND—THE “TREATY OF KILMAINHAM”—Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answers, Mr. Gladstone; Question, Mr. Sexton; [No answer] ..	986

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—o—

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Tenth Night]—Bill considered in Committee [Progress 12th June] ..	988
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.
Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill—
Motion for Leave (Colonel Nolan) objected to; Motion postponed ..	1111

MOTION.

—o—

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—“GURNEY V. BRADLAUGH”—RESOLUTION—
Moved , “That leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, with the paper writing subscribed by

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 13.]	Page
PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—“GURNEY V. BRADLAUGH”—continued.
Mr. Charles Bradlaugh at the Table of the House on the 21st February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House of the same date,”—(Mr. Labouchere)	1111
After debate, Moved , “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. E. Stanhope :)—Question put :—The House divided ; Ayes 65, Noes 85; Majority 20.—(Div. List, No. 137.)
Original Question again proposed	1125
Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Lord Claud Hamilton :)—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .
Original Question put, and agreed to .

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14.

Q U E S T I O N S.

EJECTMENTS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) BILL—Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Warton	1127
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Notice of Question, Mr. Bourke; Questions, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1127
Moved , “That this House do now adjourn,”—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff :)—Debate thereon.
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—Observations, Colonel Nolan	1173
After debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn .

O R D E R O F T H E D A Y.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Eleventh Night]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 13th June]	1191
After some time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow .
<hr style="width: 10%; margin: 10px auto;"/>
Baths and Washhouses Acts Amendment Bill— Ordered (Mr. Stanhope, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Gorst); presented , and read the first time [Bill 201]	1217
Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill— Ordered (Colonel Nolan, Mr. O’Shea, Mr. Justin M’Carthy, Mr. Lalor, Mr. Martin, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Findlater, Mr. Lea, Mr. Moore, Mr. Biggar, Mr. Richard Power, Mr. Whitworth); presented , and read the first time [Bill 202]	1217

LORDS, THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA—Question, Observations, The Marquess of Salisbury; Reply, Earl Granville	1217
Entail (Scotland) Bill (No. 115)—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,”—(The Earl of Rosebery)	1221
After short debate, Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 29 th instant .

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, THURSDAY, JUNE 15.

Page

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Notices of Questions, Mr. M'Coan, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Onslow	1225
TURKEY AND GREECE—MURDER OF MR. OGLE—Question, Mr. H. Samuelson; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1226
DEBTORS' (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1880—KENNETH MACKENZIE, A BANKRUPT—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, The Lord Advocate	1227
ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—Question, Sir Henry Holland; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1228
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA SURGEONS PENSIONS—Question, Mr. O'Shaughnessy; Answer, Mr. Childers	1228
SMALL TENEMENTS AND HIGHWAY RATES—LEGISLATION—Question, Mr. Hicks; Answer, Mr. Dodson	1229
CRIMINAL LAW—RELEASE OF CRAWSHAY CRAWSHAY, A CONVICT—Question, Lord George Hamilton; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1229
TRADE AND COMMERCE—TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH SPAIN—Question, Mr. Henry Lee; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1230
STATE OF IRELAND—THE MURDERS OF MR. BOURKE AND CORPORAL WALLACE—Questions, Lord Eustace Cecil, Sir Walter B. Barttelot; Answers, Mr. Childers	1231
DIPLOMATIC SERVICE—FOREIGN LANGUAGES—THE EXAMINATION PAPERS—Question, Mr. Jerningham; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1232
POST OFFICE—TELEPHONE LICENCES—Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	1232
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—MR. JAMES SHERIDAN, DRUMHALRY, GRANARD, CO. LONGFORD—Question, Mr. Justin M'Carthy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1233
PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PROCLAMATION OF THE CITY OF LIMERICK—Questions, Mr. O'Shaughnessy, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1234
EMIGRATION ACTS—EMIGRANTS IN HULL—Question, Mr. Moore; Answer, Mr. Dodson	1235
CUSTOMS RE-ORGANIZATION—OUTDOOR CLERKS—Question, Mr. Anderson; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1235
POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPHIC DEPARTMENT)—A SIXPENNY RATE FOR TELEGRAMS—Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	1236
SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—JOHN DUNN AND THE ZULU CHIEFS—Question, Mr. Richard; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley	1237
EGYPT—THE SOUDAN—CONSULATE AT KHARTOUM—Question, Mr. Cropper; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1237
SUNDAY LABOUR—EMPLOYMENT OF WORKMEN ON SUNDAY—Questions, Mr. Hicks; Answers, Sir William Harcourt	1237
POOR LAW (IRELAND)—ELECTION OF GUARDIAN FOR THE KILLENKEY DIVISION, RATHDRUM UNION—Question, Mr. W. J. Corbet; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1238
LOCAL BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) ACT—CASE OF JOSEPH MAGILL, BELFAST—Question, Mr. Ewart; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	1239
SEA AND COAST FISHERIES (IRELAND)—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1240
CRIME AND POLICE (IRELAND)—DETECTIVE POLICE FORCE—COLONEL BRACKENBURY—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1240
INDIA (BENGAL)—THE DURBHUNGA RAJ—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1241
INDIA—IMPORTATION OF PETROLEUM—RELAXATION OF PRECAUTIONARY LEGISLATION—Questions, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, The Marquess of Hartington	1241

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 15.]	Page
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. Brodrick; [No answer]	1242
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—APPLICATIONS OF PERSONS EVICTED TO THE LAND COURTS—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1244
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—ENGLISH POLICY—Question, Mr. Arthur Arnold; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1244
THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—AMOUNT OF THE SURPLUS—Question, Mr. Villiers Stuart; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1245
ARMY—OFFICERS OF THE RESERVE—Question, Sir John Kennaway; Answer, Mr. Childers	1246
NAVY—DOCKYARDS—MEMORIAL OF ESTABLISHED SHIPWRIGHTS—Question, Mr. Puleston; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1246
SPIRITS ACT, 1880—EVASION OF THE PROVISIONS OF THE ACT AT PETERHEAD—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1246
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JAMES BANON—Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1247
STATE OF IRELAND—THE AFFRAY AT BALLINA—Question, Mr. O'Connor Power; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland	1248
POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POSTMASTER AT MILFORD, CO. CORK—CASE OF MATTHEW MURPHY—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	1248
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN O'BRIEN—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1249
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. JOHN AND CORNELIUS KELLEHER, WILLIAM WALSH, AND MAURICE GLEESON—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1250
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—EXTRA PAY—EX-CONSTABLE WALSH—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1250
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1250
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—COUNTY WEXFORD—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1251
IRELAND—MR. O'SHEA'S VISIT TO KILMAINHAM GAOL—Questions, Mr. G. W. Elliot, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1251
THE IRISH FISHERIES—THE REPORT, 1881—Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1252
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. T. AND P. MORRISSY—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1253
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN DARCEY—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1253
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. WILLIAM KEOGH—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1253
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. ARTHUR MOLONEY—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1254
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. THOMAS CUNNINGHAM—Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1254
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. J. P. QUINN—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1254
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Questions, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Slagg, Sir John Hay, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Onslow, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1255
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE HALL OF SCIENCE, OLD STREET—MRS. BESANT AND THE MISSES BRADLAUGH—Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr. Mundella; Observations, Lord George Hamilton	1260

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 15.]	Page
SCIENCE AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—Question, Mr. Coope; Answer, Mr. Shaw Lefevre	1262
PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT—PRISON DISCIPLINE—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1262
THE PENAL SERVITUDE COMMISSION, 1879—SPIKE ISLAND—Question, Mr. Mulholland; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1263
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — JUDICIAL RENTS — Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland	1263
NAVY—LIABILITY OF OFFICERS—RETIRED PAY—Question, Mr. St. Aubyn; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1264
ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—Questions, Mr. Anderson, Mr. W. H. Smith; Answers, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1264
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—LOANS TO OCCUPIERS—Question, Colonel Colthurst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	1266
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	1266
EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY—Questions, Baron Henry De Worms, Mr. Bourke; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Speaker	1268
PARLIAMENT—SCOTCH BUSINESS—Questions, Sir John Hay, Sir George Campbell, Mr. O'Donnell; Answers, Mr. Gladstone	1272
WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE—DUTIES ON GOLD AND SILVER PLATE—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer	1273
SCIENCE AND ART—THE NATIONAL GALLERY—THE HAMILTON PALACE COLLECTION—Question, Mr. Coope; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	1274
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—Question, Mr. Storey; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	1274
ADULTERATION ACTS—LARD CHEESE—Question, Mr. Wilbraham Egerton; Answer, Mr. Chamberlain	1275
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT—Notice of Question, Mr. G. W. Elliot; Questions, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Sir George Campbell, Mr. Chaplin, Sir John Hay; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1275
PARLIAMENT — PRIVILEGE—UN-PARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE—Observations, Mr. Macartney:—Short debate thereon	1277

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:o:—

- Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Twelfth Night]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 14th June] 1279
 After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again
To-morrow, at Two of the clock.
- Metropolitan Board of Works (Money) Bill [Bill 176]—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time,"—(Mr. Courtney) .. 1389
 After short debate, Question put, and agreed to:—Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 26th June.

MOTIONS.

—:o:—

- Surrey Trial of Causes Bill—Ordered (Mr. Warton, Mr. Henry H. Fowler); presented, and read the first time [Bill 204] 1393
- Real and Personal Estate (Accumulation of Income) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Davey, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. Henry H. Fowler); presented, and read the first time
[Bill 205] 1393

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 15.]

	Page
Cruelty to Animals Bill — Ordered (Mr. Anderson, Mr. Samuel Morley, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Passmore Edwards, Mr. Buchanan); presented , and read the first time [Bill 206]	1393
Ancient Monuments Bill — Ordered (Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Courtney); presented , and read the first time [Bill 207]	1394

LORDS, FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

ARMY (INDIA) —CAPTAIN J. B. CHATTERTON, BENGAL STAFF CORPS— Motion for an Address, The Earl of Galloway	1394
After debate, Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn .

Poor Rates Bill (No. 113)—

Moved , "That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,"—(The Lord Carrington)	1398
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —SEARCH FOR ARMS—Question, Observations, Lord Forbes; Reply, Lord Carlingford	1398
ENTAILS (SCOTLAND) —Question, Observations, The Earl of Minto; Reply, The Earl of Rosebery	1400

COMMONS, FRIDAY, JUNE 16.

QUESTIONS.

VACCINATION ACT —CALF LYMPH—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Dodson	1402
ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) —THE ISLAND OF LEWIS—Question, Dr. Cameron; Answer, Mr. Mundella	1402
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —PRISONERS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Biggar, Mr. O'Shea, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1403
ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) —ADJUTANTS—Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Childers	1405
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —INTIMIDATION AT MILTOWN MALBAY—Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1406
POOR LAW (IRELAND) —KILDYSART UNION—ELECTION OF CHAIRMAN OF BOARD OF GUARDIANS—Question, Mr. O'Shea; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1407
THE FACTORY ACTS —LEAD POISONING—Question, Mr. Burt; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1407
STATE OF IRELAND —ALLEGED RIOTS BY SOLDIERS IN BELTURBET—Question, Mr. Biggar; Answer, Mr. Childers	1408
NAVY —INSPECTOR OF MACHINERY IN THE CHANNEL SQUADRON—Question, Captain Price; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1408
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS) —THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA—Questions, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Healy, Mr. W. H. Smith, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. M'Coan; Answers, Mr. Speaker, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1409
LAW AND POLICE —PROCESSIONS OF THE SALVATION ARMY—Questions, Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Healy; Answers, Sir William Harcourt; Question, Mr. R. H. Paget; [No answer]	1413

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 16.]	Page
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—LORD CLONCURRY'S TENANTS—ERECTION OF HUTS— Questions, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Gibson, Mr. J. Lowther; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. O'Donnell; [No answer]	1414
NEWSPAPERS—INCITING LANGUAGE—THE "GLASGOW HERALD"—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Sir William Harcourt	1416
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1416
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AFTER EVICTION AT RHODE, KING'S Co.—Questions, Mr. Molloy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1418
EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—Questions, Mr. Bourke, Lord Eustace Cecil, Sir Walter B. Barttelot, Mr. O'Kelly, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answers, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Question, Mr. Onslow; [No answer]	1418
ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND)—LORD ROSSMORE'S ESTATE—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Gladstone	1422
EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY—Personal Explanation, Sir Charles W. Dilke; Observations, Baron Henry De Worms	1423
LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CORONER OF THE QUEEN'S COUNTY— Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1425
COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—THE ANNUAL REPORT— Question, Mr. Arthur O'Connor; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1426
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—"QUESTIONS"—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett; [No answers]	1426

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Thirteenth Night]—
Bill considered in Committee [Progress 15th June] 1426
 After some time spent therein, it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.
 The House suspended its Sitting at Seven of the clock.
 —————
 The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.
 After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

LORDS, MONDAY, JUNE 19.

Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Bill (No. 60)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord Coleridge) .. 1545 After short debate Motion agreed to:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Select Committee.
 EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL—Observations, Question, Lord Lamington;
 Reply, Earl Granville 1550
Intermediate Education (Ireland) Bill (No. 138)—
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a,"—(The Lord O'Hagan) .. 1554 On Question? Resolved in the affirmative:—Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
County Courts (Ireland) Bill (No. 105)—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,”—(The Lord O’Hagan)	.. 1556
After short debate, on Question? Resolved in the affirmative:—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow .

Somersham Rectory Bill (No. 116)—
Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,”—(The Earl of Powis)	.. 1558
On Question? Resolved in the affirmative:—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly.

COMMONS, MONDAY, JUNE 19.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

—:0:—

Blackburn Improvement Bill (by Order)—
Moved , “That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,”—(Sir Charles Forster)	.. 1559

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is inexpedient to proceed with the consideration of the Improvement Bills, or any of them, included in the Reference to the Committee on Sanitary and Police Clauses of March 13th 1882, unless such portions thereof as create local Sanitary or Police Law exceptional to the Law of the Realm be omitted therefrom,”—(Mr. Hopwood,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:”—Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. Pugh):—After short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn:—Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to:—Bill considered; to be read the third time.

Manchester Corporation Bill (by Order)—
Moved , “That the Bill, as amended, be now considered,”—(Sir Charles Forster)	.. 1575
Question put, and agreed to :—After short debate, Bill to be read the third time.

QUESTIONS.

—:0:—

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE—Notices, Mr. M’Coan, Mr. O’Donnell;
Question, Mr. O’Kelly; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke..	.. 1581
ARMY—DRUNKENNESS—Question, Mr. Caine; Answer, The Judge Advocate General	.. 1582
STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE PROTECTION AT AMAGARRA (Co. CORK)—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	.. 1583
THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—MR. H. A. BLAKE, R.M.—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	.. 1583
STATE OF IRELAND—POLICE SURVEILLANCE—Question, Mr. Healy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	.. 1584
NEW ZEALAND—TE WHITI, THE MAORI CHIEF—Questions, Mr. Cropper, Mr. Brogden; Answers, Mr. Evelyn Ashley	.. 1585
EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—ROMAN CATHOLIC SCHOOLS, OLDHAM—Question, Mr. O’Connor Power; Answer, Mr. Mundella	.. 1586
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PATRICK SLATTERY—Questions, Mr. O’Donnell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	.. 1585

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—SECTION 21—"SULLIVAN v. BOWEN"— Questions, Mr. Healy, Lord John Manners; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Gladstone	1588
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AFTER EVICTION AT RHODE, KING'S COUNTY—Question, Mr. Sexton; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1589
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—VOTE OF COMPENSATION—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1590
PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE—QUESTIONS—RELEASE OF PERSONS DE- TAINED UNDER THE PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—Questions, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. A. J. Balfour; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Speaker ..	1591
NAVY—THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON—Question, Sir John Hay; An- swer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1593
NAVY—ENGINEER STUDENTS—H.M.S. "MARLBOROUGH"—Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1593
ARMY—LIEUTENANTS OF ARTILLERY—Question, Mr. Stanley Leighton; Answer, Mr. Childers	1594
ARMY—ORDNANCE ARTIFICERS CORPS—Question, Mr. Boord; Answer, Mr. Childers	1595
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. Leamy; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1595
ARMY—SHOOTING AND DRIVING PRIZES, 1881—Question, Colonel Nolan; Answer, Mr. Childers	1595
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—Michael M'QUEENY—Questions, Viscount Folkestone; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland	1596
IRELAND—"THE KILMAINHAM COMPACT"—MR. YATES THOMPSON—Ques- tion, Mr. G. W. Elliot; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1596
PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA) 1881—STANDARD OF FLASHING POINT—Question, Mr. Macfarlane; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1597
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOHN RYAN—Question, Mr. Tottenham; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1597
THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—CONSTABLE BYRNE—Question, Mr. Redmond; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1598
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL —Question, Baron Henry De Worms; Answer, Mr. Fawcett	1598
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—DETENTION OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1599
INDIA (BENGAL)—THE DURBUNGH RAJA—Question, Mr. O'Donnell; An- swer, The Marquess of Hartington	1600
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—BRITISH REFUGEES—Questions, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman	1601
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—EDMUND STEWART—Question, Mr. Corry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan, The Attorney General for Ireland	1602
PUBLIC WORKS COMMISSIONERS (IRELAND)—LAND IMPROVEMENT LOANS— Question, Mr. Gibson; Answer, Mr. Courtney; Question, Mr. T. P. O'Connor; [No answer]	1602
ARMY—INSTRUCTION IN MILITARY TACTICS—Question, Mr. Anderson; An- swer, Mr. Childers	1603
COOLIES (INDIAN)—EMIGRATION TO LA REUNION—Question, Mr. R. N. Fowler; Answer, The Marquess of Hartington	1603
THE ASSASSINATIONS IN THE PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN—WITHDRAWAL OF THE POLICE PATROLS—Questions, Mr. Healy, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Parnell; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan	1603
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN G. HELY—Question, Mr. Marum; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan	1605

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 19.]	Page
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Questions, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Mac Iver, Mr. Chaplin, Mr. Salt, Mr. Bourke, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Onslow, Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett, Mr. Goschen; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Gladstone	1606
EGYPT AND ITALY—CESSION OF ASSAB BAY—Questions, Baron Henry De Worms; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1610
THE ROYAL MINT—PROFIT ON THE COINAGE OF SILVER—Question, Mr. Williamson; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer ..	1611
LAW AND POLICE—SEIZURE OF ARMS IN CLERKENWELL—Questions, Lord Eustace Cecil, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Sir R. Assheton Cross; Answers, Mr. Childers, Sir William Harcourt	1612
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL—Questions, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Gladstone ..	1613
POST OFFICE—THE LETTER CARRIERS—Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Courtney	1614
EGYPT—SIR EDWARD MALET, CONSUL GENERAL—Question, Mr. Chaplin; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke	1614

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Fourteenth Night]— Bill considered in Committee [Progress 16th June]	1615
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow , at Two of the clock.
Copyright (Musical Compositions) Bill [Bill 161]— Bill considered in Committee	1715
After short time spent therein, Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered To-morrow , at Two of the clock.
Petty Sessions (Ireland) Bill [Lords] [Bill 203]— Order for Second Reading read	1717
Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.
Highway Rate and Expenditure Bill — Ordered (Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hibbert); presented , and read the first time [Bill 209]	1718

LORDS, TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

Interments (felo de se) Bill (No. 130)— Moved , “That the Bill be now read 2 ^a ,”—(The Earl Fortescue)	1719
Motion agreed to :—Bill read 2 ^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.
PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—THE HOUSE OF LORDS—THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL—Question, Observations, The Earl of Camperdown, Earl Stanhope; Replies, Lord Carrington, Earl Granville ..	1719
THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME—Question, Observations, Viscount Bury; Reply, The Earl of Morley	1722
EGYPT—THE RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA—REPARATION TO BRITISH SUBJECTS—Question, Observations, The Earl of Feversham; Reply, Earl Granville:—Short debate thereon	1724
EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—THE LANDLORDS—Question, Observations, The Marquess of Waterford; Reply, Lord Carlingford:—Short debate thereon	1730

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

COMMONS, TUESDAY, JUNE 20.

Page

PARLIAMENT—PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—DUBLIN PETITION— Petition presented, The Lord Mayor of Dublin (Mr. Dawson) ..	1748
--	------

QUESTIONS.

— o —

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—Questions, Mr. Healy, Colonel Dawney; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1750
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PRISON WARDERS—Questions, Mr. Healy; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1751
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—POLICE SUPERANNUATION BILL— Question, Baron De Ferrieres; Answer, Sir William Harcourt ..	1752
STATE OF IRELAND—INTIMIDATION—Question, Sir Henry Fletcher; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1752
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—THE SPECIAL, AND RESIDENT MAGISTRATES, AND THE POLICE—Questions, Mr. Gibson, Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. Healy, Mr. Mitchell Henry; Answers, Mr. Trevelyan; Question, Mr. O'Sullivan; [No answer] ..	1753
NORTH SEA FISHERIES CONVENTION—RATIFICATION—Question, Mr. Birk- beck; Answer, Sir Charles W. Dilke ..	1756
LAW AND POLICE—CASE OF CHARLES FROST, WRONGFULLY CONVICTED — Questions, Mr. Macfarlane; Answers, Sir William Harcourt ..	1756
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MICHAEL M'SWENEY AND JOHN RYAN—Question, Sir Herbert Maxwell; An- swer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1757
PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RESIDENCES OF RELEASED PRISONERS—Question, Mr. Donaldson-Hudson; Answer, Mr. Trevelyan ..	1757
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—THE FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—Question, Sir H. Drummond Wolff; Answer, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman ..	1758
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—DEATH FROM EXPOSURE AFTER EVICTION AT RHODE, King's Co.—Questions, Mr. Molloy, Mr. Sexton; Answers, Mr. Tre- velyan ..	1758
IRELAND—ADVANCES TO IRISH LANDLORDS ON IRISH ESTATES—Question, Captain Aylmer; Answer, Mr. Courtney ..	1760
SELECT COMMITTEE ON RAILWAY RATES—DRAFT REPORT—Question, Mr. E. Stanhope; Answer, Mr. Evelyn Ashley ..	1761
EGYPT—THE POLITICAL CRISIS—Questions, Mr. M'Coan, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Arthur Arnold, Mr. J. Lowther, Sir H. Drummond Wolff, Mr. Bourke, Mr. Onslow; Answers, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman ..	1761
EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—LORD ROSSMORE'S ESTATES—Question, Mr. Dillon; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	1766
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE —Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	1767
PARLIAMENT—PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL—Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Gladstone ..	1768
PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—QUESTIONS—Question, Mr. Mac Iver; Answer, Mr. Speaker ..	1769

MOTION.

— o —

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—Ministerial Statement, Mr. Glad- stone ..	1769
Moved , "That the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill have precedence, on every day for which it is set down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motions, except the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

[June 20.]

Page

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—continued.

After long debate, Moved, “That the Debate be now adjourned,”—(Mr. R. N. Fowler :)—After further short debate, Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put:—The House divided; Ayes 253, Noes 97; Majority 156.—(Div. List, No. 158.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Fifteenth Night]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 19th June] 1806
After long time spent therein, Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

Vagrancy (re-committed) Bill [Bill 199]—

Bill considered in Committee 1883
After short time spent therein, Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill [Bill 157] [Sixteenth Night]—

Bill considered in Committee [Progress 20th June] 1888
After long time spent therein, it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

Labourers' Cottages and Allotments (Ireland) Bill—Ordered (Mr. Villiers Stuart, Sir Patrick O'Brien, Sir Hervey Bruce, Colonel Colthurst, Mr. Blake, Mr. O'Sullivan); presented, and read the first time [Bill 212] 1968

LORDS.

SAT FIRST.

MONDAY, JUNE 5.

The Lord Barrogill (the Earl of Caithness), after the death of his father.

MONDAY, JUNE 19.

The Lord Erskine, after the death of his father.

COMMONS.

NEW WRIT ISSUED.

MONDAY, JUNE 12.

For the County of Banff, v. Robert William Duff, esquire, Commissioner of the Treasury.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

MONDAY, JUNE 19.

For the County of Banff—Robert William Duff, esquire.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

THIRD SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SECOND PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, APPOINTED TO MEET 29 APRIL, 1880, IN THE FORTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

FIFTH VOLUME OF SESSION 1882.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 5th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Barrogill, after the death of his father.

SELECT COMMITTEE—Law relating to the Protection of Young Girls, The Lord Bramwell added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Parliamentary Oaths Act (1866) Amendment * (111); Justices' Jurisdiction (112); Poor Rates * (113); Entail (Scotland) (115).

Committee—Report—Inclosure (Arkleside) Provisional Order * (92); Inclosure (Bettws Disserth) Provisional Order * (93); Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order * (94); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order * (95).

JUSTICES' JURISDICTION BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD BRAMWELL, in presenting a Bill to extend the Jurisdiction of Justices in General and Quarter Sessions of the Peace to cases of burglary and forgery, said, that neither of those crimes could at present be tried at Quarter Sessions, and that his proposal was that it should be permissible to try them at such Sessions, it being left to the committing magistrate to say whether a case should be tried at Sessions or at Assizes. There was no doubt there were many cases in which it was desirable that the accused should be tried by the best tribunal the country could afford; but, on the other hand, he might point out that cases of burglary often partook of a trivial character. For example, if a man should open a window, put his hand behind it, and steal a small piece of beef, his offence would amount to burglary, and, according to the present law, would of necessity be tried at Assizes.

Bill to extend the Jurisdiction of Justices in General and Quarter Sessions of the Peace—Presented (The Lord BRAMWELL); read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 112.)

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, there is a Private Bill coming on which will occupy some little time; and, therefore, I wish now to ask the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) a Question of which I have been unable to give him Notice. I am afraid that, under present circumstances connected with Egypt, it is impossible to give Notice with respect to information which sometimes, as in this case, only reaches us an hour or two before your Lordships meet. I wish to know, Whether the noble Earl is able to give any information to the House with respect to that which he stated to be the remedy for the Egyptian difficulty, on which Her Majesty's Government relied—namely, the project of assembling a Conference at Constantinople; and, whether it is true, as rumoured, that the Sultan has refused his assent to such a Conference?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I think the noble Marquess might have given me Notice of this Question; but in reference to the statement appearing in the morning newspapers, I can only reply that, while the Sultan does not think it necessary that a Conference should be held, I have no hesitation in stating that he has not refused his assent. I am able also to contradict another erroneous statement that has appeared in the newspapers. It is entirely untrue that Lord Dufferin has recommended Her Majesty's Government to abandon the Conference.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish, if I may do so, to put to the noble Earl another Question, of which I did give him Notice two days ago—namely, with respect to the earthworks at Alexandria. Have Her Majesty's Government given any instructions with respect to those earthworks—instructions to press in any manner on the authorities who are now governing in Egypt the expediency of abstaining from prosecuting the construction of the earthworks; and have any instructions on the subject been given to the officer in command of Her Majesty's Fleet in consequence of the earthworks being commenced?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, we have had communication with our Admiral at Constantinople and our Agents in Egypt on the subject; but the noble Marquess will agree with me that it would not be right for me to indicate the nature of any instructions that have been given on the subject.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: I wish to ask another Question, of which no Notice has been given. It has been stated—

EARL GRANVILLE: I must press the noble Earl to give me Notice of the Question.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Question arises out of the answer just given, and I consider that I am perfectly justified in putting it. It is stated in to-day's papers that guns are being placed in the earthworks at Alexandria. I shall be glad to know, if the noble Earl is aware of the truth or untruth of that statement?

EARL GRANVILLE: As a matter of fact, I believe orders have been given that no further armament shall be placed in those earthworks.

WREXHAM, MOLD, AND CONNAH'S QUAY RAILWAY (EXTENSIONS AND DOCK) BILL.

MOTION FOR RE-COMMITMENT.

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER, in rising to move that the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway (Extensions and Dock) Bill be re-committed to another Select Committee, and, at the same time, presenting Petitions in favour of the Motion, said: My Lords, I cannot allow this Bill to proceed without asking your Lordships to re-commit it; and I have taken what I know to be a somewhat unusual and exceptional course, because, as I am about to endeavour to show to your Lordships, the proceedings taken by the Select Committee, who have already had the Bill before them, testify that the course they have followed has also been unusual and exceptional. The matter, therefore, requires at your hands unusual and exceptional treatment. But there are precedents in your Lordships' House for the re-committal of a private Bill, such as this is, by your Lordships. There was one in 1859; and though I am aware that the House, as a rule, supports the decision of its Committees, still I am also aware that, having a strong sense of the public estimation with which the decisions of your Committees are regarded, where a sense of justice requires it, your Lordships have justly held that Bills should be re-committed to another Select Committee. If, therefore, I can show that the action of this Committee in the present case has been somewhat irregular and somewhat unusual, I know that your Lordships will, doubtless, allow it to be re-committed. I will very briefly allude to some of the facts with regard to the case itself, and will then call attention to what the Committee actually did with regard to it. The Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway Company was formed about 20 years ago. It is independent of two great Railway Companies at either end—namely, the Great Western on one side and the London and North-Western Railway on the other. It was formed for the purpose of giving the collieries in the district access to the River Dee at a place called Connah's Quay—the coal raised in that district being very considerable. In Denbighshire the output in the year 1861 was 1,260,000 tons, and in 1881 it had increased to 1,874,000 tons. Since that time the Great Western has tapped the district to a considerable extent by carrying branches through the coalfields of Denbighshire, the result being that that railway has largely increased its traffic, having in 1870 carried 643,000 tons of coal from the district, while in 1880 it carried 960,000 tons. At the same time, the prosperity of the district has been greatly retarded by the want of better outlets for the coal, and the inhabitants are not at all satisfied with the accommodation which has been given them by their railway, or by the system of the Great Western Railway; and they have, therefore, brought forward this Bill, the provisions of which give them access to Connah's Quay on the River Dee. It is rather difficult to explain all the various extensions and junctions which the Bill provides, and it is almost impossible to do it; but perhaps it is not necessary for the purposes of my argument. There are no engineering difficulties with regard to the making of the proposed line, and the money which will be necessary will, I understand, be forthcoming. The population of the district amounts to 45,000 souls; and I may say that, almost without exception, the whole population and the whole trade of the district are in favour of the Bill. There are 498 owners of land and lessees of collieries in the district, and only one is opposed to it. The only formal opponent to the measure is the Great Western Railway Company, who, I willingly admit, have done a great deal with regard to the development of the trade of the district by carrying branch lines into it; but the population of the district feel that they have not done all that they could. Of course, what they have done, they have done as much with a view to their own advantage, as well as to that of the advantage of the district; but I admit that they have done a great deal to the district, especially with regard to the collieries which I happen to own myself. The Bill before the Committee gives them extended accommodation for the increasing trade of the district, and that is the case with regard to the railway itself. Now with regard to the action of the Committee. The Committee met on the 11th of May. Mr. Rodwell, the counsel for the promoters, made his opening statement, and in the course of it he said more than once—and laid great stress on the observation—that he would shorten his address for the convenience of the Committee, because he relied principally upon the evidence to be given in support of the promoters' Bill. Witnesses were called, and among them Mr. Charles Townshend, who is the Chairman of the Westminster Brymbo Coal and Coke Company, by far the largest colliery in the district, which has an output of about 200,000 tons per annum, and his evidence went to show that he wanted a connection with the London and North-Western in order to get to Holyhead and Connah's Quay. The evidence of the other witnesses was to the same effect. Mr. Townshend, moreover, stated that, by the proposed system of railways, he would be able to get his coal carried at a cheaper rate than by using the Great Western Railway. The Committee examined only 10 witnesses, out of some 40, whom the promoters wished to bring forward, and of those 10 witnesses, five—one of whom was the engineer—gave only general evidence; the others gave specific evidence. After hearing these witnesses for about three hours, the Chairman of the Committee, speaking on the same afternoon when the proceedings had been opened, the 11th of May, said that they would pass that part of the Bill which related to the upper end of the proposed railway system—the end close to the River Dee, and that was done in spite of there being no other opponent to the Bill beside the Great Western Railway, who were not heard at all against it. Well, that part of the Bill was passed, and they said they would not pass the other portion of the Bill; the result being that the Committee passed that part of the Bill, which was practically useless without the Wrexham end of the line, and the other part was ignored; the extensions, &c., were passed over, and thus the Bill was practically thrown out. The Chairman of the Committee used these words—

“The Committee are fully impressed with the advantages that would be derived by competition, the only question being whether the competition would be fair, and whether the project is a good or a bad one.”

Notwithstanding this opinion of the Committee, they refused to hear the evidence as to whether the project was “a good or a bad one;” and they did not appear to think that the proposed competition with the Great Western Railway would be fair, or that the project contained in this Bill was a good one. The fact was, however, that the Chairman admitted that the proceedings were virtually stopped, when, practically, no evidence was given to show the merits of the proposal, or rather when only one-fifth part of the evidence had been given. The Petitions that I present are from 2,524 inhabitants of the district. They were got up in a hurry; and, in addition to this, there is also a Petition from an enthusiastic meeting held at Wrexham near the lower end of the proposed railway—a meeting at which 1,500 persons were present. There is likewise another Petition from the Mayor and Corporation of Wrexham, and bearing their corporate seal. I mention these things to show that there is very great feeling in the district with reference to this subject about the Bill being re-committed. The whole district is in favour of the Bill, and the people think it a very great hardship, and a very unfair thing, that the Bill should be thrown out in this very summary manner, without at least going fully into the evidence, which, I think, the Committee were bound to do before adopting such a course. In introducing this subject I promised your Lordships' House a precedent in favour of the course which I am now taking; and I will refer just briefly to a precedent of the 12th April, 1859, when the

The Duke of Westminster

Bill on the subject of the Thames Watermen and Lightermen was before the House. It does not, however, quite run on all fours with the present case. In that case, the opponents of the Bill were not heard fully by the Committee. The Committee was presided over by a noble Relative of my own (Lord Ebury), who is not now present, and Lord Campbell asked that the Bill be re-committed, and in doing so said—

“That the Committee sat on the 29th of last month, when the case of the petitioners was opened, and evidence was tendered on their behalf. . . . On the 4th of this month the opponents gave evidence against the Bill; but afterwards, on the 11th of April, though there remained several witnesses to examine, and without hearing counsel, the Committee cleared the room, and afterwards announced that they had come to the conclusion that the Preamble of the Bill had been proved.”

Lord Campbell further said—

“That this appeared to be a very unusual and unfair course to pursue. . . . There could be no disparagement to the Committee in saying that they had decided under mistake, and that the matter should be referred back to the same Committee for re-consideration.”—[3 Hansard, cliii. 1618.]

I will now refer to what was said on that occasion by the noble Earl opposite, whose opinion upon these questions your Lordships always treat with respect. The noble Earl, then Lord Redesdale, said that—

“A chief consideration in this matter was the effect it would produce on the public at large as to the character of their Lordships' proceedings.”—[Ibid. 1621.]

That is a remark very well worth weighing in the present case. My noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset), following the noble Earl, said that—

“The question with which their Lordships had to deal was one of considerable difficulty. On the one hand they would be most anxious to uphold the character of their Committees; but, on the other hand, they would be no less anxious that the decisions of those Committees should enjoy the confidence of the public. . . . He therefore thought that the Bill should be re-committed.”—[Ibid. 1622-3.]

That remark was equally applicable with that of the noble Earl opposite to the present occasion. In that case the opponents' evidence had not been put forward; in this case, the promoters' case had not been fully gone into, but had been summarily dismissed. Under all these circumstances, what I ask your Lordships to do—and I ask it with the utmost confidence—is to vote for the Motion which stands in my name for the Bill to be re-committed to another Select Committee.

Moved, "That the Bill be re-committed to another Select Committee."—(The Duke of Westminster.)

LORD METHUEN said, that as Chairman of the Select Committee in question, he should not detain the House by going into details of what the Committee did; but he should rely upon this—that what they did was done in the public interest. It was a peculiar Bill. It was an abandoned line, and the proposal was to obtain a better financial condition. There were other objectionable proposals in the Bill. He would just remark, in passing, that he only wished that their Lordships had had a map of the district showing the proposed railway in the outer Hall, and then he did not think that there would be one of their Lordships but who would require much stronger evidence than could be possibly given to induce them to believe that this Bill was one which ought to be passed in the way in which its promoters wished it to be passed. The line was impecunious, and, indeed, he might say was bankrupt. The noble Duke (the Duke of Westminster) thought that his interests and those of the proprietors of land in the district was not sufficiently attended to in the decision that they had come to; but the Committee decided upon another and much better way for providing for the interests of the district. If the promoters had gone to the Great Western, and had asked them for through rates or more running powers, they would have come before the Committee with clean hands; but they did nothing of the sort, preferring simply, as it were, to work on their own hook. The decision the Committee arrived at was one which they came to in the interest of the public; and he, therefore, held that, under the circumstances, the Committee were bound to protect the interests of the opponents. They were unanimous. There was not a single Member of the Committee who cast a doubt on the decision that they came to. He could only say that he never came to a decision which he intended to uphold more than in the present case. It was given for the benefit of the public and the railway interest at large.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH said, that, having been a Member of the Committee now brought prominently before their Lordships, he wished to say a few words, and he should not trespass very long upon their time. He would say, at the outset, that he could entirely endorse what had been said by the noble Lord who had just sat down (Lord Methuen), the Chairman of the Committee which sat on this Railway Bill. That noble Lord very properly said that he wished their Lordships had a map before them to assist them in their decision upon this question, for by its means they would not only be able to see those lines projected all over a particular tract of country like an octopus, but they would easily see that one limb of the octopus was not sound—that particular limb had been some time out of working order, and was not fit to be used. He could only say that the Committee were unanimous in their decision that the promoters had not made out their case. He had to make a further remark with regard to a whisper that the Committee had some corrupt Great Western influence brought to bear upon them. He could say positively that no Great Western influence had any possible effect upon him. He had the misfortune of living on a northern branch of the Great Western, and he could confidently affirm that a more unsatisfactory line to dwell upon there could not be. He said nothing about the main line of the Great Western, for he knew nothing about it. So far from showing any undue bias in favour of the Great Western, he might call the attention of the House to Question 341, which he (the Earl of Dartmouth) put to a witness—Mr. Kenyon—which was in these words—

"I daresay it is your experience that the Great Western Railway have very good reasons to give for not giving additional accommodation."

In print, of course, the irony of that question was completely omitted. He (the Earl of Dartmouth) put it ironically, and the witness to whom he ventured to put it took it up ironically. He repudiated for the whole Committee, as well as for himself, any other wish than that of doing justice to the public, and to prevent the creation of unnecessary branches by an impecunious and almost insolvent Company.

LORD ABERDARE said, it might be objected to the noble Duke who moved the re-commitment of the Bill (the Duke of Westminster) that, being personally interested, he was not entitled to be heard. He (Lord Aberdare) wished to say that he was wholly disinterested; and he said so, because he inhabited a portion of the Principality, and some people considered that Wales was a sort of geographical unit or area, where everybody knew everybody else, and where the actions of one part of the Principality are known to the other. Living at Glamorgan, he was ashamed to say that he never heard in his life of the Wrexham, Mold, and Connah's Quay Railway until the other day, when a friend of his called his attention to the facts of the case, and asked him to look into them, as he thought that the circumstances were very unusual. He did look into these facts, and what did he find? Living as he did in the centre of a mineral district, he was, perhaps, very sensitive as to the amount of accommodation required for the mineral traffic; but he found a railway in existence from Wrexham to the River Dee, which was doing very little business. At one end of the Dee it had a connection, and at the other end it was not connected with the other railways. Wrexham was a town of 20,000 inhabitants; but it was surrounded by a girdle of mining villages, and it was of the utmost importance that there should be a number of branches in order to make the place useful. Now, into the merits of the case he did not go for a moment. In his opinion, when a Committee saw that a Bill was promoted under such circumstances, they should hear all possible evidence. If they were of opinion that the evidence was insufficient to pass the Bill, they were more than justified in stopping the evidence. But what did he find here? He found, in the first place, that out of 13 railways, three were carried, those three all connected with the branches. That would be like setting up a trunk without the branches. There was one opponent, Mr. Freeme, who objected to certain lines; and the announcement was made that the Committee was favourable to the granting of those lines; but Mr. Freeme's Counsel said that he should not, after what had fallen from the Committee, make any observations, but reserve them for "another place;" and that was the usual thing. With respect to the feeders of the line, he (Lord Aberdare) said, in his opinion, the Committee were not justified in treating the evidence as they did. At a very early period, when 10 only out of 40 witnesses had been examined, the Committee cleared the room, and called for engineering evidence. The engineering evidence they appeared to be satisfied with; and having heard 10 out of 40 or 50 witnesses, they held that those portions of the Bill—one of them the most important of all for the purposes of the Bill—should not be passed. What was the consequence? The whole of the district was up in arms. With the exception of the Great Western Railway, there was not a man but who was for this line. He (Lord Aberdare) was told that the line was impeccable. He could not understand a railway, existing as it was, being otherwise. But, at any rate, he had the positive assurance of gentlemen of capital and respectability that they were ready to find £170,000 for the purposes of this railway at once. He did not think that anyone present would think that the Committee had acted under any pressure; but, nevertheless, he considered that, under the circumstances, there was a case to justify the re-committal of the Bill. He cast no reflection upon any Member of the Committee. There was no person who questioned that they were acting in the interest of the public, and not of any particular railway. He (Lord Aberdare) was a shareholder in the Great Western. Most of the Directors were his personal friends. His interests, as an owner of minerals, would lead him to wish success to the Great Western; but he had examined this matter, and could come to no other conclusion than that the Committee were not justified in rejecting the most important portions of the line without hearing the whole of the evidence bearing upon them. He, therefore, supported the Motion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Westminster).

EARL DE LA WARR said, the question was not whether the Bill was a desirable one; that question could not be settled by their Lordships now, for it was impossible for them to know whether it was desirable to make the line or not; but the question was, as he understood it, whether the pro-motors of the Bill had had a fair hearing before the Committee? It appeared that, although the Bill was supported by all the owners and occupiers of land with one exception, though it was supported by all the landed interest of the country, though they brought forward a large number of witnesses in support of their case, yet when the matter came before the Committee only one-fifth of those witnesses were examined before the Committee. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Methuen), acting as the Chairman of the Committee, stated that no evidence which could be produced before them could alter the decision of the Committee. Now, he (Earl De La Warr) would put it to their Lordships that inasmuch as there was only one-fifth of the witnesses called, how could it be possible that nothing—no number of witnesses that might be produced—could alter the decision of that Committee, seeing that those witnesses were prepared to give important evidence? Therefore, he would ask their Lordships whether the promoters of the Bill, upon that ground alone, could have had a fair hearing of their case before the Committee? He thought the character of their Lordships' House was also concerned in the matter, and, for the reasons he had given, should most certainly support the Motion of the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Westminster).

EARL GRANVILLE said, he came down to the House that evening quite ignorant of the merits of the question; and he hoped his noble Friend (the Duke of Westminster) would forgive him, when he (Earl Granville) said that he came down not inclined to vote with him on a Motion to re-commit a Bill when the Committee had unanimously decided on a certain course. From what he had heard in the debate, however, he was inclined to alter that view. At the same time, he gave no opinion as to the abstract merits of the question. He thought it was quite possible that the Committee might be right, and that it was not desirable that the Bill should be passed. But whether they were or were not right in taking that course, there appeared to be a fact stated which was not denied, that the course which the Committee adopted was not to allow the promoters' case to be heard. That being so, without any feeling of disrespect to the Committee, he thought that so important, that, as a matter of principle, the Bill should be re-committed.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK, in opposing the Motion, said, knowing nothing about the matter except that it was a Motion to re-commit the Bill to another Select Committee, he must say that he thought that it was one that their Lordships should hesitate in supporting. He must say that he himself could not vote for it; because it was not—as had been represented by every noble Lord who had spoken—the re-committal of the Bill to the Committee to hear further evidence; it was a Motion that the Bill should be referred to another Select Committee. He could not imagine any stronger Vote of Censure on a Select Committee of their Lordships' House than passing a Motion in those words; and he thought the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Westminster) had altogether failed in producing such a precedent as would justify their Lordships in adopting the course recommended in the Motion. It appeared to him to be a very extreme mode of dealing with the matter, inasmuch as it would appear on the Notices of their Lordships' House, and could not but for all time be viewed as a Vote of Censure upon a Committee who had acted to the best of their ability for the public good. Viewing it in that light, without in any way knowing anything of the merits of the Bill, and knowing how strongly he (the Earl of Limerick) should have felt it, if he had been a Member of that Committee and such a course had been taken—in fact, he should not have felt justified in sitting on a Select Committee again, he should not be able to vote for the Motion brought forward by the noble Duke.

LORD WENLOCK said, that in supporting the Motion of the noble Duke (the Duke of Westminster)—and he felt bound to do so—he might premise by saying that he appeared in this case as an interested witness. He himself was looking forward to the decision of the Committee upon the Bill, and he could barely express the feelings of those who were promoting it, when he said that great disappointment was felt when they found that the Committee had thrown out the Bill. From a statement in their Lordships' hands, their Lordships would see that the evidence that the Committee thought fit to take was such as hardly justified them in coming to their decision. The fact that public meetings had been held in Wrexham and the district showed the general disappointment which had been felt at the decision of the Committee; and he knew that he could speak for the promoters of the Bill as to the great disappointment which they had felt. It had been moved by the noble Duke that the Bill should be referred to a fresh Committee; and he (Lord Wenlock) could not help thinking that that was the only solution. The old Committee had lost one of its Members by death, and that offered additional facility for the appointment of a fresh Committee. He did not wish to impugn the reasons on which the Members of the Committee acted; but for the promoters and for himself he should feel it very unsatisfactory if the Bill were to go back before the same Committee. They would feel bound to justify their former decision; and if they passed the Bill they would only stultify the opinion they came to before. Therefore, he hoped that their Lordships would support the Motion of the noble Duke. He need hardly say that the British public had the fullest confidence in their Lordships' House; and he could only say that that evidence had been shaken by the manner in which the Committee had arrived at their decision. He appealed to their Lordships' sense of justice, and to the knowledge of the magnitude of the interests involved that they now possessed, and trusted that they would support the Motion of the noble Duke.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES): My Lords, I feel that this is a very difficult question. There is no doubt that it is most important that decisions of Committees of this House should be supported. In this case we have a most distinct statement from the Chairman of the Committee, and by another Member of that Committee, of the manner in which they were satisfied with regard to the decision to which they came; and it is a very difficult matter for us to decide how we are to treat questions of this sort, which are brought forward in the manner in which this question has been put before the House. If because those persons, who are interested in a particular measure, and are dissatisfied with the decision of the Committee, are to come before the House and ask a Bill to be re-committed because they are dissatisfied with that decision, it seems to me to be establishing a precedent of a very dangerous character, and one which, if we do not take care, may lead to very injurious consequences indeed. And I may say, and I cannot help noticing, that it is unfortunate that the Motion and the support of it comes from parties distinctly interested in the matter. In the instance quoted, and almost the only one in support of it, is that one which is mentioned with regard to the Thames Watermen and Lightermen Bill. In that case, the Motion for a re-committal of the Bill was moved by the then Lord Chief Justice of England (Lord Campbell), who had inquired into the case, and he was dissatisfied with the course adopted. His Motion was to refer it back to the Committee, in order to hear further evidence. From what passed in the House, however, in the remarks from the different Members of the Committee, it was thought not to be expedient to refer it back to the same Committee; and it was, therefore, referred back to another Committee. But the question was brought forward before the House in a very different manner from the way in which this question has been introduced, which, in my opinion, is one which requires very careful handling. There is one point to be taken into consideration, and that is the action of the promoters of the Bill. When the Committee said that they were ready to allow the Bill to pass in a certain form, the promoters said that it would be useless for them unless they had the entire provisions of the Bill; and they, therefore, desired to withdraw the Bill. There was practically a withdrawing of the Bill by the promoters themselves; and if the action had been taken upon the withdrawal of the Bill, the Motion for its re-committal could not have very well been made. The Committee came to the conclusion that, after that statement, it was more desirable not to put the parties to further expense, and then they decided on the terms with which these gentlemen are not satisfied. Upon that a Motion is made for the Bill to be re-committed. There may be an impression in the minds of many a noble Lord that further evidence should have been heard; but whether that was so or not I shall not discuss. I confess, for my own part, taking the manner in which the question has been brought before the House and the consequences, if this Motion is to be adopted, that persons interested in a measure who are not successful, are to seek to re-commit a Bill by bringing it before the House itself, it is, I think, under these circumstances, that it would be attended with such danger that I shall not be disposed to vote with the noble Duke.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I am quite as desirous as the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees to support a Committee of this House, and I am sensible that a great deal of inconvenience would result to the House if Motions were made by persons interested, merely because they were dissatisfied with the decision of a Committee, or, I will add, by anybody else, who chose to re-open the question by referring the matter back to a Committee. But the very importance of preserving the public respect for, and confidence in, the decisions of the Committees of your Lordships' House makes it equally necessary to attend to any representations which may be made, if by inadvertence—and I do not doubt the very best and most upright intentions—there has been a deviation in substance from the rules which, according to the established principles of justice, ought to regulate the proceedings of your Lordships' Committees. Now, the short ground on which it appears to me that an error of that kind has been inadvertently made—and, as I say, I do not doubt with the very best intentions—on this occasion is this. The promoters had opened their case, and when they had produced some evidence in support of their Bill, but with the greater part of their witnesses remaining unexamined, the proceedings were suddenly stopped by the Committee declaring a foregone conclusion, and that, my Lords, not against the whole scheme, but in favour of a certain part of the scheme which, as I recollect, related to some branch railways to connect the lines with the sea, and against those other parts of the scheme which related to other short railways by which the line was to be fed. I think that was a most unfortunate course. It is said in the Paper which has been circulated by the promoters of this scheme, that they had not had any opportunity of producing the greater part—if, indeed, they had produced any part—of the evidence in support of those portions of the scheme which the Committee were disposed to reject. I am unable to distinguish this case on any principle which I can understand from the precedent referred to by the noble Duke (the Duke of Westminster). The only distinction is, that here, before the promoters had had an opportunity of submitting their whole evidence in support of the scheme, the scheme was suddenly rejected; whereas, in the other case, the same thing happened to the opponents. The opponents had called some evidence, after which they were stopped by the Committee, who decided against them. This House thought that was a mistake which required correcting, and not only did this House think so, but the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees (the Earl of Redesdale), who used arguments as strong as those of any other person on that subject, said—

“A chief consideration in this matter was the effect it would produce on the public at large, as to the character of their Lordships' proceedings. It was impossible, after what they had heard from the Members of the Committee, to doubt that the Committee had decided without hearing the counsel for the opponents, and he did not wonder, therefore, that they should have complained.”—[3 Hansard, cliii. 1621.]

My noble Friend said that the Motion on that occasion was made by the then Lord Chief Justice of England (Lord Campbell); but on what principle? Not because he took an interest on the one side or on the other side; but because it was important to preserve the regularity of the proceedings of your Lordships' House, and not to have decisions pronounced until the parties were heard. This is what he said—

“He regarded this Motion as very similar to what was well known in the Courts of Law—namely, sending back an award to be reconsidered by the arbitrator;”

and then he gave his reasons for altering the original form of his Motion, which was to re-commit the Bill to the same Committee. He said—

“When he heard one Member of the Committee say that the onus was entirely on the petitioners and another, that his mind was made up, and a third that he had conclusively made up his mind, he (Lord Campbell) was disposed to change his Motion and move for a new Committee.”—[Ibid. 1623.]

The noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, at the same time, said this—

"After what had fallen from the noble Lords who formed the Committee, it would be useless again to refer the Bill back to them, and he therefore should support the appointment of a new Committee."—[Ibid.]

I think, under these circumstances, it is no disrespect at all to the Members of the Committee, in the present case, to adopt the same course of proceeding. I think it is not so invidious as to call upon them to hear the case again. Of course, I very much regret to have to take this course; but under the circumstances I see no other way than to re-commit this Bill to another Committee.

LORD METHUEN: My Lords, after what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne), and from four or five of your Lordships, I do not think it would be for the public interest that I should divide the House.

Motion agreed to; Bill re-committed accordingly: The Committee to be proposed by the Committee of Selection.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF MR. PARNELL AND OTHERS CONFINED UNDER THE ACT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD, in rising to draw attention to the recent release of "suspects" imprisoned under the Coercion Act, and to move for any Correspondence connected therewith, said: My Lords, I had some time ago a Question upon the Paper relating to this subject; but I withdrew that Question, as I was informed that the Prime Minister had stated, in "another place," that he would take into consideration whether or not he would be able to produce the Correspondence, or some of it; and I thought if further information was likely to be forthcoming, it would be better to wait until that information was before your Lordships' House. But now I am informed that the Prime Minister has refused to produce that Correspondence; and I think both your Lordships and the country require, and it is most desirable, that some further information should be given upon this most serious matter. Indeed, I may say it is positively necessary, because the extraordinary and dangerous disclosures which have been made—disclosures which have been most damaging to the Government, and which are a source of the very greatest danger, to my mind, to this and all future Governments in Ireland—require some further light thrown upon them than has yet been the case, and cannot be explained away by a simple denial; and the greatest doubts and anxiety exist in England, and the gravest danger may arise in Ireland, if what has been called "the information" placed at the disposal of the Government by the Land League, and "the information placed at the disposal of the Land League by the Government," cannot be more clearly defined than it is at present. The country has been told by Mr. Gladstone that there has been no compact and no terms of compromise; that the Government have given nothing and have received nothing in return; but, at the same time, the information received was sufficient to induce Her Majesty's Government to entirely reverse all their former policy, to make them sacrifice their Chief Secretary, and also to bring in a Bill amending an Act which was of late so sacred in their eyes that they absolutely passed a Vote of Censure on your Lordships' House for having appointed a Committee to inquire into its administration. What are the disclosures which I have referred to? The first of them was caused by Mr. Parnell reading a letter in "another place," originally written by him and addressed to Mr. O'Shea for the purpose of being laid before the Cabinet. Mr. Parnell read that letter with a view of clearing himself before the people of Ireland, and he omitted or suppressed the most important paragraph in that letter, because it would, if it had been read, have had exactly the contrary effect, for it would have proved that he was prepared, upon certain terms, to place his services at the disposal of the Government. The Members of the Cabinet who sat by and heard that letter read must have been well aware that the most important paragraph was omitted, a paragraph so important that it caused Mr. Gladstone to write a letter to Mr. Forster upon it, saying that it would not be right for him to accept Parliamentary support from the Land League, at any rate, at the present time; but not one of them thought fit to rise in his place and draw attention to the omission which had been made; and unless Mr. Forster had produced a full copy of the letter, feeling that his honour was imperilled, no one would have had any idea of the overtures made by Mr. Parnell to the Government; and it is not difficult to understand why the Government thought it better not to correct that omission. I do not wish to say anything to which Members of the Cabinet may take exception; but, at the same time, I think it very extraordinary that they should have sat by and allowed the letter to be read with that most important paragraph omitted. But Mr. Forster laid down three stipulations, upon any one of which, if it had been fulfilled, he said he would have been prepared to remain in the Government, and yet to allow the "suspects" to be released. The first of these stipulations was, that a promise should be given by the Land League Leaders that they would obey the law, without any promise being given in return on the part of the Government. The second was, that Parliament should be prepared to grant further powers for the prevention of crime in Ireland. And the third was, that Ireland should have assumed such a tranquil condition that the "suspects" could be released without danger. In my former Question I alluded to the "negotiations" which have taken place, and which, I believe, resulted in what has been called out-of-doors the "Treaty of Kilmainham;" but I believe Her Majesty's Government have the greatest objection to call them negotiations. My reason for using that word was that I thought, and still think, it must be clear that negotiations did take place, as Mr. Forster, who conducted part of those negotiations, having had most to do with them at the beginning, called them by that name when he said, upon hearing that Mr. Sheridan was to be employed—

"I was very sorry I had had anything whatever to do with the negotiation, although all I had to do with it was to try to get from the hon. Member for the City of Cork a promise not to break the law. I felt I would have nothing more to do with it."—[3 Hansard, cclxix. 791.]

I ask your Lordships, if that promise was given, as Mr. Forster says it was, without a corresponding promise in return on the part of the Government, in the shape of what Mr. Forster called blackmail, what was his reason for leaving the Government, because he distinctly stated that he would have agreed to the "suspects" being released, and would have still remained in the Government, if such a promise was given, provided there were no promises given in return by the Government; and, therefore, I think it seems clear that though this one of his stipulations was complied with, it was complied with in such a manner as to leave the impression upon Mr. Forster's mind that it was impossible, as a man of honour, that he could accept it, or remain in the Government that did accept it. Again, another of the stipulations made by Mr. Forster, by which he could have continued in his position as Chief Secretary and opened the prison doors, was that further powers should be granted by Parliament for the prevention of crime in Ireland; and this was referred to by the noble Earl the Leader of your Lordships' House (Earl Granville), when he stated, in a touching speech which he delivered when a heavy and deep sorrow cast a gloom over this country, in moving the adjournment of your Lordships' House, in consequence of those awful murders in the Phoenix Park, that a Bill for strengthening the administration of justice in Ireland had been before the Cabinet during the week previous to the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish, and that with a few finishing touches it would be introduced in the week following. I would now ask the noble Earl, whether the Bill he then alluded to is the same Bill, or anything like the same Bill—the Bill for the Prevention of Crime, which, I am told, will shortly come before your Lordships' House, because, if that Bill is the same, surely it would be amply sufficient and strong enough to fulfil all the expressed wishes of Mr. Forster, and, therefore, to allow him to retain his position in the Government and still be able to set the "suspects" free. Therefore, if a promise was given by Mr. Parnell without any promise on the part of the Government in return, and a Bill, such as I have described, had been prepared with Mr. Forster's knowledge and sanction, two out of the three stipulations laid down by Mr. Forster had been fulfilled; and I cannot understand, if that was the case, why Mr. Forster should have resigned, as he stated that, if one alone of those conditions had been fulfilled, he would have been able to retain his position in the Government. We must, therefore, suppose—and it is the only reason I can see—that Mr. Forster was under the impression—and who could be a better judge?—that a compact had been arrived at, which, he believed, would tend to the encouragement of crime, and would seriously weaken the power of this and all other Governments in Ireland, with which, as an honourable man, he could have nothing to do, or countenance by remaining in the Government. That, as far as I can make out, is the only explanation of Mr. Forster's leaving the Cabinet. But it seems that further communications had taken place between the Government and the Land League—communications of a character which would make it appear to the mind of any unprejudiced person, not in the secrets of the Cabinet, that the Government were prepared to make use of what Mr. Forster called the "outrage-mongers" of the Land League for the purpose of putting down outrages in Ireland; or what is the meaning of the remarkable passage in the minute taken down by Mr. Forster after his conversation with Mr. O'Shea, which minute he forwarded to the Cabinet, with his own remarks relating to the operations of Mr. Sheridan in Ireland, and which was to this effect—

"That the conspiracy which had been used to get up 'Boycotting' and outrages would now be used to put them down?"

Mr. Forster goes on to say—

"I said to Mr. O'Shea, it comes to this—that upon our doing certain things he (Mr. Parnell) will help us to prevent outrages."

The question, then, which I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government is, have the stipulations contained in Mr. Parnell's letter been fulfilled, and are the Land League in a position

"To make use of exertions, strenuously and unremittingly, to put down outrages and intimidation of all kinds, and to co-operate cordially for the future with the Liberal Party in forwarding Liberal principles?"

Mr. Gladstone stated that he acted on the information he had received; and, so far as the information is before your Lordships', according to the minute which was circulated among the Cabinet, which is all we know about it, the information he received was to the effect that if he would do certain things the Land League would do certain other things. Well, the Prime Minister has done most of the things specified; but we are not aware that the Leaders of the Land League have either the will or the power to carry out the programme which Mr. Parnell laid down for them, and we want to know whether they can? I do not think, judging from the speeches which Mr. Brennan delivered on the 2nd of June, and which Mr. Davitt delivered in Ireland, that we can say that they, at any rate, are prepared to carry out the programme, or are ready to coalesce with the Government in the forwarding of Liberal principles. Mr. Dillon, in a speech which the Prime Minister described as "heart-breaking"—although, if there was no compact, I cannot understand why the Prime Minister should have expected Mr. Dillon to make a speech in any other terms than those he had used so often before—Mr. Dillon declared that he was not at all disposed to denounce these outrages. Mr. Parnell, certainly, the next day, made a moderate speech, and attempted to explain away some of the remarks made by Mr. Dillon; but, at the same time, he led the House to believe that he had had no communication with that Gentleman; therefore, I do not see how Mr. Parnell could have known better what was in Mr. Dillon's mind than Mr. Dillon himself. Of course, we have the statement of the Prime Minister that there was no compact and no compromise; and that is sufficient proof that, whatever had been the result of the negotiations, at any rate, in his mind it did not amount to what he understands as the meaning of the word "compact." But what we want to know is, what did it amount to? There is not the slightest doubt that it has produced the greatest and most marked difference in the policy of the Government, and some difference also in the policy of Mr. Parnell, as shown by a former speech of his upon the second reading of the Bill to which I have referred before as being shortly about to come before your Lordships' House, in which, though differing from the Government—as from his position in Ireland he was bound to do—about the necessity for such legislation, he yet spoke of the Prime Minister and the Attorney General for Ireland, who had lately said that he (Mr. Parnell) was steeped to the lips in treason, in such admiring, and almost affectionate terms that it would lead one to believe he was soon about to join them, and become one of the most ardent supporters of the Government; but how this difference has been brought about is what we wish to understand. The change of policy has in itself been sufficient to cause the most extraordinary reports to appear in the newspapers, and has, I believe, had the most injurious effect upon the state of Ireland; and, in my opinion, except for the report of an understanding having been arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the Leaders of the Land League, the awful and horrible murders in the Phoenix Park would never have been committed, for there can be no doubt that report was the direct cause of their occurrence. There is an extreme Party in Ireland, who, whether attached to the Land League or not, look upon the Leaders of that movement as having the same aims and objects in view as themselves, and that is nothing less than the dismemberment of the Empire. That extreme Party, believing that they had been sold by Mr. Parnell, and not wishing to bring about separation by so curious a process as an alliance with the English Government, resolved to make it quite clear that no compromise was possible, and, therefore, they carried out their bloody and infamous work. If it had been clear to these men that no compromise at all had taken place, I do not, for one moment, believe those murders would ever have been committed. My Lords, the position we have arrived at is, that disclosures have been made which point out that there were negotiations between the Government and the Land League; and, whether those negotiations resulted in what has been called the "Treaty of Kilmainham" or not, we have a proof in the resignation of Mr. Forster that he, at any rate, believed that they resulted in a compact. I have been informed that upon the same date upon which Mr. O'Shea visited Mr. Parnell there was another gentleman, who has been described to me, and who visited Mr. Parnell directly afterwards, and there is, I believe, no record of his visit in the book of the gaol; therefore, if this be true, it would appear that, at any rate, he must have been authorized by the Government to attend at Kilmainham. I should like to know from noble Lords opposite whether there is any truth in the report that another gentleman visited Kilmainham by the direction of the Government; and, if so, whether noble Lords opposite will tell us who that other gentleman was? I look upon it as a positive necessity that we should have full and clear information about the whole of these transactions. My Lords, I think it a most terrible thing that there should be an idea in the minds of the people of Ireland, and in the minds of the people of this country as well, that it was possible that any arrangement could have been come to by the Government of this great Empire with the Leaders of a conspiracy whom the Government themselves have denounced as traitors, whom they have imprisoned for treasonable practices, and who they have, over and over again, declared are mainly responsible for the murder, mutilation, and anarchy which exist in Ireland. But facts are stubborn things, particularly if no explanation be given; and the publication of this extraordinary Correspondence, coupled with the resignation, in the circumstances I have named, of Mr. Forster, is likely to lead everybody to the belief that there was an arrangement of some kind or other between those who are responsible for administering the law of the land and those who, the Government themselves have said, have set their unwritten law above the law of the land, and who have enforced the decrees of that unwritten law by outrage and mutilation. Well, my Lords, we have no information except Mr. Parnell's letter and Mr. Forster's minute; the Government have vouchsafed nothing to us, or to the country, except an indignant denial of any compact; we do not know whether negotiations are still going on or not. We do not know anything with regard to the position of the Government in the former negotiations. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, I do not think that a simple denial is sufficient for the people of England. If there is nothing to hide, why should not the whole Correspondence be made public? It is not like a Correspondence with foreign nations; therefore, why should not the full Correspondence be produced, so that the Government can distinctly show the people of Ireland that they are entirely wrong as to their belief that any surrender has been made by the Government to traitors, and to clear up all the doubt and anxiety which exist, at present, largely among the people of England? My Lords, in the interests of all future Governments in Ireland, in the interests of the good government of this great Empire, and in the interests of Her Majesty's present Government themselves, I trust that if this Correspondence can bear the light of day the Government will agree to my Motion, and be prepared to give us the information we require. The noble Marquess concluded by making the Motion of which he had given Notice.

Moved, "For correspondence respecting the release of certain persons imprisoned under the Act."—(The Marquess of Waterford.)

EARL COWPER: My Lords, I wish to say a few words upon this Motion, and I think, perhaps, it will be more convenient if I do so before the noble Earl (Earl Granville) rises from the Front Bench to reply. I was still Lord Lieutenant when these men were released; but I wish to explain that my resignation had been accepted some days before, and from the time that my resignation was accepted I considered myself to be virtually no longer a Member of the Government as filling the position of Lord Lieutenant; and, therefore, I knew no more of all this than any Member of your Lordships' House. I wish to explain that before I signed the document for the release of these three Members of Parliament I sent a telegram begging that it might be left to my Successor, and I only signed the release on the distinct understanding that it was a matter of form, and that I did not commit myself to its policy. I feel, therefore, that I am as much entitled to express an opinion on these facts as any one of your Lordships. I confess that when I received the telegram, announcing the intention of the Government to release the Members, it took me so completely by surprise that I could hardly believe it, and I must say that I thought it a most grave step. Such was not only my opinion, but was the opinion of everybody; and I saw a great many people whom I came across—and I wish distinctly to say that, in alluding to other people's opinions, I am not alluding to any of the permanent officials, because, if I did so, I should be falling into what I consider to be the great mistake made by the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury) in alluding to a man who is dead, and in attributing to him opinions which, I feel sure, have caused great pain to his relatives; and I think also that by them a slur has thus been cast on a public man whose character is beyond reproach. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that I cannot believe Mr. Burke ever made use of such language as has been imputed to him. He was, I believe, the very last man in this world to employ such language, or say a word against those under whom he served; and I feel sure that any previous Lord Lieutenant would agree with me. The noble Duke (the Duke of Marlborough) is not present; but I think he would agree with me that Mr. Burke was the last man who would say such things to anybody. I also know he was not particularly intimate with Mr. Staples; therefore, he was not likely to say anything to him of this nature. I think, therefore, that the statements attributed to Mr. Burke are in the highest degree improbable. I also know Mr. Staples to be a man of great honour, who would not willingly lend himself to anything that was wrong; and I feel confident in my mind that there has been some mistake, and I am sorry that the noble Marquess should have called public attention to the matter. I say this to clear myself from being supposed to refer to any of the permanent officials; but all the professional men I met—Judges, lawyers, military and naval officers, landlords, agents, the clergy of all denominations—everybody, I believe, was completely astonished at this sudden step. It was its suddenness which, in my opinion, constituted its chief evil; and I am bound to say that I think the anticipation which we all felt of the evils which would follow has been accomplished. I do not refer to the tragedy in Phoenix Park. We know as yet too little about that deplorable occurrence to say from what motives it arose; but I refer to the effects produced locally in every part of Ireland which had not previously been at all disturbed. It is notorious, and was made so by every bonfire which was lighted on that occasion, both publicly and privately, by what appeared in the Press, and from all channels of communication, that it was looked upon at the moment as a complete surrender; that its effect was most disastrous, and will be to stimulate disaffection, and to make the pacification of Ireland and the restoration of law and order more difficult than it was before. I have spoken of what I consider the great evil of what was done by the release. I also am sorry that the question of arrears has been mixed up in the matter. I am not going to refer to the Bill before Parliament; but I think I may say, without being out of Order, that it is a very delicate matter, and everybody admits that it is most unusual, and contrary to a great many principles which many of us are accustomed to consider sacred. As it is, however, it will be defended successfully or unsuccessfully—perhaps successfully—by the necessities of the occasion; but that it should in any way be supposed to be a sop to the people, to induce them to come forward in the cause of law and order, I cannot admit for a moment. I have said this much openly as to what my judgment is on the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government; but I certainly do not wish to associate myself with those men of extremely violent views who have made imputations and remarks almost personal in their character upon the Government. I cannot see that there is much force in what has been so often said about an agreement. It has been denied by men of the highest honour, and I am perfectly willing to believe what they have said, that there was nothing in the shape of an agreement. I am also perfectly willing to believe, and I am perfectly willing to admit, that these men could not have been kept in prison for ever. They must have been let out sooner or later, at some time or other; and when the Government received information which induced them to believe that these men would no longer stir up the country, or be instrumental in causing disturbance, there was, I will admit, a difficulty in confining them any longer. They were confined in prison on reasonable suspicion of being the cause of that disorder, and for that reason only. Therefore, there is more, as I have said, in the way it was done than in the doing of the act itself. I was anxious to be able to make this explanation, and am much obliged to your Lordships for the patience with which you have listened to me.

The Marquess of Waterford

LORD CARLINGFORD: My Lords, my noble Friend the noble Earl who has just sat down (Earl Cowper) is fully entitled to refer to the release of the "suspects" in whatever terms he pleases, and to define and limit his responsibility in the matter. I am not inclined to make any comment on that part of his speech; but with respect to the evil consequences which he supposes—I do not understand upon what grounds or on what authority—have followed upon that decision of the Government, I am bound to differ from him. I know of no reasons whatever for that opinion. Her Majesty's Government know of no reason for it; and both with respect to the release of Mr. Parnell and his Friends under the particular circumstances of the case, and with respect to the prospect of good to be done in Ireland by the measure dealing with the arrears of rent, which I hope will before long come before your Lordships; on both of those subjects I can only say that Her Majesty's Government, according to their information and my noble Friend's Successor in the Office of Viceroy, upon whose information the Government to a great extent depend, differ from the opinion just expressed. I now come to the Motion of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Waterford), and I confess I find it difficult to deal with the cloud of questions which he has raised. The whole thing resolves itself into this—that the noble Marquess thinks that there is some great mystery—of which we and Parliament know nothing—that there are some great revelations which might be made if only the Government were inclined to make them. All I can say is, that there is no mystery, and that there are no revelations to make. Parliament already knows all that can be known as to the release of the "suspects;" and when the noble Marquess asks mysteriously about the certain other visitors and other communications made to Mr. Parnell in Kilmainham, I can only say I do not even know to what he refers. I cannot speak positively upon the matter, for by whom Mr. Parnell might have been visited I do not know; but my impression is that there was no other visitor whatever of such a kind as that alleged by the noble Marquess, and most certainly there was no visit on the part of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: Would there not be a record of the visits which took place in the gaol books?

LORD CARLINGFORD: I have never heard the story before. I am not, however, surprised at the speech of my noble Friend, because we have heard of so many similar speeches made elsewhere. My noble Friend's first Notice, which was given before Whitsuntide, I heard many people describe as a bad joke; and I must say that his speech to-night gave such a description of these transactions, and drew such a picture of them, that I can only describe it as a travestie or caricature of the facts. As regards the release of the "suspects," it is hardly necessary for me to remind your Lordships of the situation of these Gentlemen at the time they were confined in Kilmainham, and of the rights and duties of the Government in respect to them. One would have supposed, to hear the noble Marquess, that these Gentlemen were prisoners under sentence, and that the Government had weakly and indulgently released them, and set them free from the remainder of their sentences. I need hardly say that the position was a totally different one to that. These persons were put in prison under a most exceptional law, entirely and absolutely as a matter of precaution, because we believed their conduct was dangerous to the tranquillity of the country. It was necessary, at the time of their arrest, that that conduct should be put an end to. But if the Government, at any time, had reason to believe that that danger to the public tranquillity no longer existed from these persons being at large, it was evidently their bounden duty to consider such circumstances, and to consider whether they were entitled — even legally entitled under the terms of the Act — to keep these persons in confinement. And if they had reason to believe that these persons had the intention, and were ready to announce that intention, to refrain from dangerous agitation in the future, that obligation upon Her Majesty's Government was, of course, greatly increased. The question then arose in that way — namely, whether the time had come or not when these Gentlemen should be released. I should like to know how long the noble Marquess opposite intended to keep Mr. Parnell and his friends in prison? Well, the question arose whether the time had come when it was still necessary or unnecessary to keep them under arrest; and the matter was treated, not as a matter of negotiation, but as an administrative question, and as a most serious administrative question, in the exercise of their exceptional powers by the Government under the Act of last year. That question has been dealt with by the Government upon the best knowledge they could obtain, under all the circumstances of the case, in view of the whole situation, and with a single eye to the public interests and to the restoration of tranquillity in Ireland. We have heard a good deal about "negotiations," "treaty," and so on; but I do not accept any of those terms, and for one simple reason—that after all this took place, the Government were absolutely free to deal with every Irish question as they thought best. We were under no engagements whatever which bound or hampered our conduct; but I can very well imagine that these proceedings might have taken a form which might have been called by the name "negotiations," and which yet would have been totally harmless. I can imagine, for instance, Mr. Parnell asking what declaration on his part would have been held sufficient, and that would have amounted to something which might be called negotiation; indeed, I do not understand how any step could have been taken for the purpose of obtaining a pledge from these Gentlemen, which was the view taken by my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster), in opposition to his Colleagues, without something which might in some sense be called a negotiation taking place. But it so happens that that was not the course the Government chose to adopt; and, at the eleventh hour, they found themselves bound to differ from the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, and they did not adopt that process. An intimation was first made by Mr. Parnell through a friend, and afterwards a letter was written by him, which he himself read in the House of Commons. The fact was that the communications from Kilmainham came absolutely uninvited — proffered voluntarily to the Government, and, therefore, suddenly, as my noble Friend has termed it. I have a right to ask whether the Government were to pay no attention to such declarations on the part of these detained persons? The Government believed that they were bound to pay attention to these communications so volunteered, and that they were bound to make inquiry in order to ascertain whether the reports which reached them as to what Mr. Parnell said were accurate, as they were at first not under the hand of Mr. Parnell; and the whole of their action in the matter was directed to the point of ascertaining the authenticity of these documents and of knowing what Mr. Parnell intended. They took those declarations as being what they were—namely, those of a Gentleman—and they were regarded by the Government in view of the whole situation of affairs in Ireland at that time. There was much then, as there is now, in the state of Ireland to cause anxiety; but the Government saw how different the state of the country was from the condition of things last September, when Mr. Parnell and his friends were arrested. We were convinced, speaking broadly, that the “no rent” policy of the Land League had broken down; and we were also convinced that among the Irish tenantry—probably the bulk, certainly the best of them—there was a desire for quiet and tranquillity; a desire to return to a state of law and order, and to devote themselves to their industry under the greatly improved tenure which Parliament had conferred upon them. The Government also had regard to the communications in connection with the Bill, and the debate upon the Bill introduced into the House of Commons by Mr. Redmond and Mr. Healy, and upon the back of which was the name of Mr. Parnell himself—we saw, in that Bill and in the debate upon it, a willingness on the part of the Land League to make the best of the settlement of the Land Question upon which Parliament had decided, and to withdraw from the violent attitude exhibited by them last autumn. We took the declarations which were proffered from Kilmainham in connection with all these facts, and we made up our minds that the time had come when it was safer to put an end to the detention of these Gentlemen than to keep them in prison any longer. That is about the whole history of the matter. But my noble Friend says, “You now give the Land League this Bill dealing with arrears;” and he seems to think that there is something disgraceful in the fact that the Government should have brought in an Arrears Bill, with regard to which they agree with Mr. Parnell and the Land League. Now, Mr. Parnell is, no doubt, very anxious that this critical question of arrears should be effectually settled; but we did not require any negotiation, if the noble Marquess insists upon the word, or any communications from Kilmainham, in order to ascertain that fact. We knew it from the introduction of the Bill, on the back of which was the name of Mr. Parnell, and which gave rise to the debate in which the Prime Minister gave his public adhesion to the propriety of a settlement of the arrears question. That, it should be noted, is the only promise of any kind, either public or private, that has been given by the Prime Minister. But Mr. Parnell did not invent the question of arrears. It has been felt by us for months past to be a most serious question, and one which must inevitably be dealt with by the Government. Parliament made an attempt to deal with it last year, in the Land Act; but, unfortunately, the attempt has proved to be a failure; and the very fact of that failure increases the obligation of the Government to endeavour to provide a remedy. Surely the noble Marquess will not condemn the decision of the Government to deal with the question of arrears, simply because on that point they are in agreement with Mr. Parnell and the Land League.

Lord Carlingford

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD: I never mentioned arrears at all in my speech.

LORD CARLINGFORD: I beg pardon. I was under the impression that my noble Friend had done so in connection with this question. If he has not, he is certainly the only person who has attacked the Government on this matter without dragging in the Arrears Bill. But the agreement of Mr. Parnell in that measure is not a condemnation of it, and ought not be one; for I should like to remind the noble Marquess that there is another question of far more permanent interest—namely, the question of the purchase of the property of the landlords by their tenants, in which Mr. Parnell was also very much interested, and upon which the noble Marquess and his Friends appeared to me to be pretty much at one with Mr. Parnell himself. They have made a proposal which would, if carried out, abolish landlordism in Ireland to a great extent, and they, like ourselves, have not been deterred in this matter by the fact that they are in agreement with the Land League on that point. Whether the Government will be able to follow them closely in that direction, whether the Government will be able to proceed on that road as far as Mr. Parnell and noble Lords opposite, is a question which remains to be solved. The Government, upon that and all other matters relating to Ireland, are absolutely free to follow the course which their duty may require them to take. The noble Marquess has made great use of that particular sentence in Mr. Parnell's letter in which a hope is held out of his acting at some future time in concert with the Liberal Party, and also of certain expressions which passed between Mr. O'Shea and Mr. Forster, and which, I understand, were Mr. O'Shea's words and not Mr. Parnell's. The noble Marquess has singled out that expression about the Liberal Party as being the most important sentence in the whole letter. We, on the contrary, think it the least important. [Laughter.] I confess I am not surprised at the opinion expressed by my noble Friend, for he has the highest authority for that opinion—namely, another noble Marquess opposite, who pounced upon this particular sentence in Essex the other day, and said, "That is the whole explanation of the conduct of the Government," and who did not take the slightest notice of anything which the Government had said when giving an account of their own motives and actions. But, whatever my noble Friend may think, I can tell him that that passage in the letter, and those expressions in the conversation between Mr. O'Shea and Mr. Forster, instead of explaining the motives which led the Government to their decision, were, in the opinion of the Government, obstacles in their way. They knew very well the use that would be made of such expressions as those. [Laughter.] I do not quite see the cause of that laughter; but, certainly, our expectations have not been disappointed in this respect. I say, however, that those expressions and the contents of that letter, good and bad together, were volunteered to the Government. The Government did not ask for them. They had no control either over their phraseology or their contents. The Government had simply to take them as they stood, and to make up their minds upon the course to be followed; and they did make up their minds. They knew very well the additional difficulty that would be caused by these particular expressions; but they would have been weak indeed if they had been deterred from taking the course which appeared to them to be the best in the public interest, and in the interest of Ireland, by the thought of the embarrassment and Party attacks that might be brought upon them. They made up their minds that in those expressions there was nothing which really changed the circumstances of the case—nothing to change the conclusion at which they were prepared to arrive. In spite of, then, and not on account of these expressions, they made up their minds that the time had come when it was better for Ireland that Mr. Parnell and his Friends should be released from prison, than that they should remain there. Nothing, I am bound to say, has happened since to cause the Government to change their opinion. Something has been said by my noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant (Earl Cowper) of a connection between the dreadful tragedy in the Phoenix Park and the conduct of the Government in releasing the "suspects." No such connection can rightly be traced. All probability goes to show that that dreadful deed had been planned some time before, and it had been resolved that a blow should be struck by the conspirators at the Heads of the Executive in Ireland. If there were any connection between the action of the Government and the tragedy in Phoenix Park, it would be this—that the most dangerous men in Ireland feared the good effects of the policy of the Government to such an extent that they were ready, by that fearful atrocity, to endeavour to destroy them. The Government are confident that no harm has been done in Ireland by the release of these Gentlemen. On the contrary, they believe that both the measures of repression and the measures of reform intended for Ireland have a better prospect of success than they would have had if we had continued to detain the "suspects." But the Government do not depend upon the action of Mr. Parnell or the Land League for the restoration of peace in Ireland. They welcome any assistance from any quarter for that great object; but they rely upon their own determination and that of the Lord Lieutenant to restore peace to that country. They rely for that object upon the authority of the law and all the means within their power, including those contained in the Bill now passing through Parliament. At the same time, the Government hope that the settlement of the question of arrears, by a Bill which I trust will be very soon before your Lordships, will tend very effectually to quiet the minds of the masses of the Irish peasantry and to help the prospects of the restoration of law and order in Ireland. Of course, I need hardly tell my noble Friend and your Lordships that we have no documents to produce. The idea of documents—as if this were a treaty between two Powers—is, of course, nothing but a joke. But my noble Friend will lose nothing by not obtaining the documentary evidence he wishes for, for this simple reason, that there is no mystery, there are no engagements which can be disclosed, no secret motives which actuated our conduct. As to that conduct, and those motives as we have described them, and as we assert them to be, we confidently leave both the one and the other to the judgment of the country.

Lord Carlingsford

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that the Lord Privy Seal concluded his speech by saying that he had no documents to give to the House, and he objected to the use of the word “documents” as utterly inapplicable to the case. Now, not very long ago, the Prime Minister, in reply to a Question put to him in the other House—a Question similar in nature to the Motion now before the House—said he did not see any reason why the documentary evidence as to the release of the Members of Parliament should then be produced. The Prime Minister considered the term “document” to be applicable to the case. As the Prime Minister did not consider there was any reason for producing it at that moment, the natural inference was that there was documentary evidence to be produced at some future time. The Lord Privy Seal, however, said everything that could be known was known, and that nothing more could be laid before the country. But it was possible there might be letters, evidence, correspondence, and conversations, which the Lord Privy Seal himself was not aware of. He said he could give no information about a matter which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Waterford) referred to—namely, that some persons had been admitted to Kilmainham Gaol without their names being recorded in the books, because he knew nothing about the circumstance. He hoped the Lord Privy Seal would inform himself on the subject, and that the House would be put in possession of any information which could be given. He hoped, too, the Members of the Government would inform themselves whether there was any further documentary evidence of any kind that could be laid before Parliament. To judge by the speech of the Lord Privy Seal, it would be supposed that the noble Marquess made a speech objecting to the release of the prisoners. He (the Earl of Dunraven) did not know whether the noble Marquess did so object; but the speech of his noble Friend was not directed to the fact of their release, but to the method in which it had been conducted—to certain negotiations which had preceded it. He objected that the release was made apparently conditional upon a certain line of action being adopted by the “suspects;” and that they, in their turn, made that line of action conditional upon the adoption of a certain programme by Her Majesty’s Government. He did not know how that was to be described except as a bargain. In the ordinary affairs of life it would be considered a bargain by men of honour, though not signed and sealed and delivered as a legal document. Mr. Parnell appeared to have entered into the provisional engagements. He declared in his letter that, if a certain programme was adopted, he and his Party would be able to throw their weight on the side of law and order; and he confidently believed that Her Majesty’s Government, by the end of the Session, would be able to dispense with any coercion in Ireland; and, he added, he would be able to support the Liberal Government. These were the two advantages which the Government might hope to gain from the arrangement with Mr. Parnell, and the advantage which he was to get was the adoption of a certain programme. Mr. Chamberlain also put the matter very clearly. He wrote a letter to Mr. O’Shea, in which he said that, if Her Majesty’s Government were to be bound to show great consideration for Irish opinion, the leaders of Irish opinion must show greater consideration for English and Scotch opinion. “Bound,” was the word used by Mr. Chamberlain, and he could not have used a stronger term. If that meant anything, it partook of the nature of a bargain between two parties. It came to this—"If we are to take your opinion into consideration, you must take ours." That might be an excellent mode of conducting business, but it did not appear quite suitable to the dignity of the Government of a great country. If the Government considered that a certain line of action would be beneficial to Ireland and the United Kingdom, they should adopt that policy without making conditions as to the value to be received for it from Mr. Parnell or anyone else. He would like to know whether it was likely that Mr. Parnell and his Friends would consider themselves bound to carry out their part of the bargain, or whether the introduction of the Coercion Bill might be held to relieve them from their obligations? The Prime Minister said that the Coercion Bill was not brought in in consequence of the terrible murders in the Phoenix Park, that it had been determined upon before; but that the Government thought it better to allow a very few weeks after the release of the prisoners to elapse before introducing the Bill. The difference between Mr. Forster and the Prime Minister was very small then, because Mr. Forster was prepared to allow that the "suspects" should be released if the Government were armed with further powers, and Mr. Gladstone was prepared with a Coercion Bill to be introduced "a very few weeks" after the release of the prisoners. It was very strange that such a slight difference should have led to the resignation of Mr. Forster. Now, he would like to know whether Mr. Parnell was aware that one of the strongest Coercion Bills ever introduced was to be brought in within two or three weeks of the release of the prisoners; and, if he were not, whether it was not possible, and even likely, that Mr. Parnell might consider he had not been fairly dealt with, and that he was not bound to show himself on the side of law and order, and to consider English and Scotch opinion? There was a passage in Mr. Chamberlain's letter which suggested terrible consequences that might ensue if Mr. Parnell did not consider English and Scotch opinion. Mr. Chamberlain commented on the fact that the leaders of Irish opinion did not sufficiently consider Scotch and English opinion, and on the disastrous effects of such a course, and said that in consequence nothing could be easier than to stir up an anti-Irish agitation in England almost as severe as the anti-Jewish agitation in Russia. It was positively frightful to contemplate anything like such an agitation being got up because Mr. Parnell did not sufficiently consider Scotch and English opinion. He did not agree with Mr. Chamberlain on that matter. It appeared to him that the attitude of the English people had been magnificent, superb; that they had maintained an amount of self-control which set a good example to the rest of the world. He did not believe that an anti-Irish agitation could rise spontaneously. Mr. Chamberlain, however, said that nothing would be easier than to get it up. He did not know whether Mr. Chamberlain was an authority upon the matter, or whether he knew much about the machinery and organization by which such things were got up. He should like to know whether the Members of the Government in that House shared the opinion of their Colleague, and, if they did, whether they had taken, or were about to take, special measures against any such agitation? Being an Irishman, he felt strongly on the subject. After the murders in Phoenix Park, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Davitt, and Mr. Dillon issued a manifesto, in which they denounced and commented upon the cowardly murder of "inoffensive and friendly strangers" in Ireland. But, so far as his knowledge went, these Gentlemen had not denounced in that manner any of the murders that had taken place before. And he would like to know whether any of their Lordships, who had interests in Ireland, when they went over to that country, were to be regarded as coming under the category of "inoffensive strangers" or not? If anyone who was possessed of property in Ireland, or who was partly Irish, was to be persecuted in Ireland because he was not a stranger, and was to be subject to this frightful agitation in England because he was an Irishman, his position would not be enviable. He would suggest that, under the circumstances, some asylum should be arranged where those who might consider themselves as part Irish, part Englishmen, might take refuge and regard themselves in some measure safe. The whole transaction surrounding the release of the "suspects" was so mixed up with much that was doubtful and extraordinary, that he sincerely hoped the Government would, if they had any further information, or if they could discover any, lay it at once before Parliament. He also hoped they would give their opinion whether, under the circumstances, Mr. Parnell and his Party were going to consider English and Scotch opinion; whether, if they did not, the consequences suggested by Mr. Chamberlain—an anti-Irish agitation in England like the Russian agitation against the Jews—was likely to occur; and, if so, he should like to know what measures Her Majesty's Government intended to take to meet such a contingency?

The Earl of Dunraven

LORD ABERDARE said, he fully concurred with the noble Marquess opposite that a bargain such as he had described would enormously increase the difficulties of government in Ireland, and the course taken by the Opposition in this matter tended to increase that very danger; but when Her Majesty's Government, in the strongest and clearest terms, and in accordance with the most natural construction that could be placed upon the whole matter, repudiated any such compact, he could not understand how the Opposition could persist in their tactics. What good result was to be obtained by regarding the affair, in spite of these declarations, as a dangerous and iniquitous compact? In his time he had worked with most of the Ministers who formed Her Majesty's Government, and he knew them to be utterly incapable of stating what was not the fact; and when, with the full responsibility of their position and character, they denied that any such negotiation had taken place, it was not unreasonable to expect that they should be believed. What had, in fact, occurred? A Bill was introduced by certain Members of the Land League into the House of Commons, proposing to amend the Land Act, although up to that moment they were opposed to the measure altogether. They had hitherto done their best to frustrate the advantages to be derived from the Land Act, and to prevent the people having recourse to its provisions. They had sought to widen the gulf of separation between England and Ireland by every possible means. For the first time they now showed a desire to co-operate with the Government, and they came forward with certain propositions for the amendment of that Act. One of the most important questions with which they proposed to deal was that of arrears. Long before the introduction of that Bill this subject had undoubtedly occupied the popular mind, and all agreed that it was absolutely necessary to deal with it. The Prime Minister, on hearing the speeches of the introducers of the Bill, at once stated that the Government would be prepared to consider the question. A communication then reached them from Mr. Parnell, who felt convinced that no course would more effectually contribute to the pacification of Ireland. That was precisely the feeling in his own mind at the time—that there was no longer any reason for keeping Mr. Parnell in prison, and that nothing would so conduce to the future prosperity of Ireland as legislation on the question of arrears, with the imprisoned Members in their places. The attempt that had been made to put a sinister construction on these circumstances had clearly failed, and he regretted only that in making the attempt the Opposition had assumed a dangerous and unpatriotic attitude.

LORD DUNSANY said, he considered that all Mr. Gladstone's Irish measures had been failures. They were all introduced with admirable speeches, and with sophistry that had no equal; but he thought no one would be so extremely ironical and sarcastic as to congratulate the Prime Minister on the success of his Irish legislation. The right hon. Gentleman's policy, which seemed to consist of alternative coercion and conciliation, was not likely to give the Irish people confidence in the justice of the Government. There were many Irishmen living under such terror that they dare not pay their rents and do other things they were entitled to do. Was it likely that the terror which the Land League had managed to inspire would be lessened by the fact that these dangerous individuals were at large? As to there being cheerful accounts from Ireland, he did not receive them, and one of the last incidents he had read of was a nocturnal visit paid by 100 "Moonlighters." That did not look like the arrival of a millennium; and he could not help thinking that nothing would have been lost, and much might have been gained, if the dangerous individuals had been detained a little longer, and if the most objectionable of the "suspects" had not been selected for early release. But why such men should have been selected as the recipients of the clemency of the Government surpassed his comprehension, although it was in accordance with Mr. Gladstone's commendation of Mr. Dillon, just after that Gentleman had shocked public feeling by his speech upon maiming cattle.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, the noble Marquess behind me (the Marquess of Waterford) may not have succeeded in eliciting from the Government any of the documentary evidence to which the Prime Minister alluded, but he has, at all events, succeeded in producing a very interesting debate; and among the speeches which we have heard, none has been more interesting than the vigorous denunciation of the policy of the Government which was delivered by the late Viceroy. Though the noble Lord has very fairly and rightly limited his own responsibility, nobody can mix him up with the transactions which have recently taken place; and the very fact that they came upon him with such suddenness, and were such a surprise, shows what a sharp turn in the policy of the Government must have taken place at that precise crisis in their history. Whether the cause of that sharp turn was or was not the information which was conveyed by means of messengers and letters from Mr. Parnell to the Government, is a matter about which each one of us must form his own conclusion. In the course of his observations, the noble Lord opposite (Earl Cowper) made one reference to myself which I cannot suffer to pass unnoticed; he condemned the revelation of the opinions of Mr. Burke upon the causes of the present Irish troubles, and he condemned me for having quoted these disclosures when they had appeared. I must say I cannot see that there is any shadow of condemnation to be attached to the conduct of Mr. Staples for giving the opinion of an experienced public servant upon a matter of vital public interest, at a moment when the usefulness of that public servant could in no way be affected by any disclosure made respecting his opinion. Undoubtedly, the public servants of this country are in a peculiar position; they have to serve with successive Governments, with politicians succeeding one another, who have strongly opposed one another. They have to render equally loyal assistance to each in its turn; and, consequently, it is impossible for them to express in public their opinions of the policy under whom they have to serve, because if they did so they would not only compromise their own future official career, but they would make it very difficult for them to go on serving satisfactorily the Chiefs of the various Parties whom they have to assist. But none of these considerations apply in this case. Mr. Burke had passed away from the possibility of either his official career being affected, or any difficulty being interposed in the way of his serving successive political Leaders; and the observations which he made privately to Mr. Staples—because Mr. Staples is distinct as to the effect of what was said to him—must be taken as absolute proof, entirely sweeping away tons of argument from antecedent probability and a priori conclusions as to what Mr. Burke was likely to have said. We know from Mr. Staples what Mr. Burke actually said, and ingenious conclusions drawn from his character by others who knew him cannot be accepted as countervailing evidence to that testimony. Mr. Staples, in disclosing what Mr. Burke said, in no degree whatever placed any hindrance in the way of the conduct of the Public Service. Limitation is placed upon the language of our public officials; reticence is imposed upon them merely that the Public Service may not be hindered; but when it can no longer be hindered, the cause for that reticence has entirely disappeared. On the other hand, was there no ground for informing the people of this country, who, after all, have most interest in the matter, what opinion had been formed with reference to the cause of Irish troubles, and the capacity of their Rulers, by the man who, of all others, was most qualified by experience and knowledge to form an impartial opinion on the subject? As to myself, I have nothing to defend, for the statement was publicly made, on unimpeachable authority, by an honourable man, and it became matter of public history. I know not what evidence I should be allowed to appeal to in discussing the sacred character of Mr. Gladstone's Administration if I am not allowed to appeal to that which is already public property. Another noble

Lord opposite (Lord Aberdare) appeared as a witness to character, and delivered his testimony with the greatest energy, and conferred all that advantage upon the case for which he was summoned which witnesses to character usually do. But the noble Lord, in exhorting us to believe and accept implicitly the account which he, no doubt, most sincerely gave of these transactions, omitted to think whether that account was itself consistent with the account which we have received from the Government themselves. As I understand the noble Lord, the fact which suddenly flashed upon the Government, and caused them to reverse their previous policy and to release Mr. Parnell, was the discovery that Mr. Parnell, having been hostile to the Land Act, was now favourable to it. I think that is a very sorry comment on the discretion of the Government in the use of the vast powers placed in their hands. Having been given the power of suspending the liberty of the subject and imprisoning Members of Parliament, if it be really true that they shut up a Member of Parliament for nine months because he was hostile to the policy of an Act of Parliament to which they were particularly attached, nothing that any Member of the Opposition ever suggested has conveyed a deeper censure on the action of the Government. And that was the defence made by the noble Lord. But a very different account of the matter was given by the Lord Privy Seal; and though it was ingenious and plausible, I venture to think it was historically weak. The noble Lord represented it to us that Mr. Parnell was released because the "no rent" policy failed. Well, then, I presume he was imprisoned because the "no rent" policy was threatened. As a matter of fact, the "no rent" circular was never issued until Mr. Parnell was safe within the walls of Kilmainham. The noble Lord tells us the state of things was very different in May from what it had been in the previous October, when Mr. Parnell was shut up. But Mr. Parnell was not imprisoned, as the Lord Privy Seal seemed to think, on a Warrant drawn in October for offences committed in October. Mr. Parnell was in Kilmainham on a Warrant that was drawn, I think, on the 12th of April, and he was released early in May. He was imprisoned on a Warrant charging him with being reasonably suspected of treasonable practices. The Act of Parliament had provided for the possibility of a change of circumstances. It had carefully anticipated the contingency that the causes for which a man had been originally incarcerated might, in course of time, disappear, and the justice of the incarceration might no longer be manifest; it had provided that every six months each case should be wholly reconsidered, and, I believe, a new Warrant had to be issued by the Lord Lieutenant in order to continue the incarceration of Mr. Parnell; so it was not for his conduct in October or upon any conclusions formed then that he was further imprisoned; but it was on account of circumstances which presented themselves with complete and absolute vividness to the minds of the Government in the middle of April, that Mr. Parnell was further detained. And the change of circumstances, if change there was, must have occurred between the middle of April and the first few days of May. If that was the case, is it unreasonable to suggest that the real change of circumstances must have been some undertaking, some profession, some compact, that came from Mr. Parnell, and of which we may or may not have all the articles and undertakings? The noble Lord seemed to treat it as a light matter that they should have come to an understanding with Mr. Parnell. It is difficult to find a phrase which, in the minds of noble Lords opposite, will precisely express the conveyance of ideas between their minds and that of Mr. Parnell; they are sure that there were no negotiations; but, at all events, there was information which was mutually exchanged between the parties. They seem to think this a light thing. Has it occurred to them that it is an absolutely new thing in English history? We have had the Habeas Corpus Act suspended again and again in England and in Ireland; but I have never heard of an instance—and I think I can safely defy the production of one—in which a person arrested under a recent Warrant on reasonable suspicion of treasonable practices was released on having announced that he would do his best to stop certain crimes, complicity with which he was not accused of, and that he would follow the Liberal Leaders. This transaction has been compared with the Lichfield House compact with Mr. O'Connell. That was always thought to be at once a disgraceful and a fruitless transaction; but there is a difference, like light and darkness, between that and the present transaction. Mr. O'Connell was a free and an unaccused man. He bartered Parliamentary support for a promise of legislation and of political patronage, and it was not usually thought the most creditable thing in his career, or in the career of the Government with which he bartered; but there is no comparison in that case with a Government bargaining with a man in prison under their own Warrant, on suspicion of treasonable practices. Much has been said in the present debate about conciliation and the value of conciliatory measures to Ireland. I am very far, indeed, from disputing that view or from wishing to adopt any other tone in dealing with the Irish Question. I am fully aware of the enormous superiority of methods of conciliation over methods of coercion, where methods of conciliation can be successfully applied. But, unfortunately, conciliatory legislation and deterrent legislation differ in another most material particular. Conciliatory legislation is infinitely superior; but it depends for its efficacy on the circumstances under which it is used, and on the manner in which it is applied. Deterrent legislation, if vigorous and strong, at least deters, whatever the value of that process may be. But conciliatory legislation only conciliates where there is a full belief on the part of those with whom you are dealing that you are acting on a principle of justice, and not that you are acting on motives of fear. Where there is a suspicion or a strong belief that your conciliatory measures have been extorted from you by the violence which they are meant to put a stop to, all the value of that conciliation is taken away. Now, the peculiarity of the action of Her Majesty's Government has been throughout that they have so contrived their conciliatory measures that, whatever their own motives in their own minds may have been, they have done their very utmost, by the time and the manner of applying those conciliatory measures, to enforce and strengthen the belief that they had been extorted from them by apprehension, and are used by them as a means of buying off outrage and crime. In no transaction in the course of their government has this fatal mistake been so strongly manifested as in this unlucky Treaty of Kilmainham; and the justification of my noble Friend for desiring to throw the most brilliant and the clearest light on all the details of this transaction, and to bring forth its true character to the light of day, is that, if it is innocent, its real character cannot be too widely known. The belief which Her Majesty's Government have contrived to impress on the Irish peasantry is not a belief which will hamper fair legislation or hinder their policy alone. The measures of the last two years have so deeply impressed on the minds of all—whether they are loyal to England or the reverse, whether they approve the policy of the Government or the reverse—that each successive step of concession has been extorted by a constantly rising demand of agitation and of outrage, that for years and generations the impression will remain. It will be a shadow that will fall not only on the path of this Government, but on the path of many future Governments that will succeed it. It will hinder every effort at conciliation. It will make the necessity of coercion again and again a lamentable incident in English policy; and, therefore, the Treaty of Kilmainham—not only of itself, but as the culminating point, and the typical incident of the system on which the Government have proceeded in their legislation towards Ireland—will long be remembered as the cause of constantly-increasing evils in Ireland, and as threatening with serious danger the connection which is of vital importance to both countries.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in the few words I shall address to your Lordships, I shall begin by saying that I agree with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) in saying that he is glad the noble Marquess below the Gangway (the Marquess of Waterford) has brought on this discussion. It appears to me that this discussion will be of great use, not only in this House, but with the public, in dispelling many of those insinuations which have been made, I am sorry to say, by men in very high stations—insinuations which have absolutely no foundation in fact. The noble Marquess opposite paid a very great compliment to my noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and described his speech, though not with perfect accuracy, as a strong condemnation of Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The policy of Her Majesty's Government.

EARL GRANVILLE: Of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, the noble Earl's speech was certainly not one entirely in favour of Her Majesty's Government, and it condemned certain things which had been done by them; but, at the same time, it repudiated, in the strongest manner, all the principal charges which have been brought, more particularly by the noble Marquess, against Her Majesty's Government. There was one part of the late Lord Lieutenant's speech which the noble Marquess did not like at all, for he devoted about 10 minutes to an elaborate defence of himself because the noble Earl had expressed his regret at the way in which the noble Marquess had introduced a hearsay story which the noble Earl believed to be entirely without foundation. The noble Marquess defended himself by a reference to the unfortunate death of Mr. Burke. We do not complain that Mr. Burke, having done an unofficial act, mentioned it in conversation to a friend; but we do complain that the noble Marquess, with that impulsive feeling which always makes him think any stick is good enough to beat a dog with—when Her Majesty's Government are concerned—introduced this hearsay story into a speech at a moment which all admit is a critical one, and one of great importance, and that, while the noble Marquess does not make any attempt to turn Her Majesty's Government out of power, he does everything he can to tarnish and damage them, and to weaken them in the important task they have to perform. It is precisely because Mr. Burke is dead and cannot contradict the interpretation which has been put upon the story, that we object to it. It is a singular thing, and I hear it from various quarters, that all persons who knew Mr. Burke well think that the condemnation he is said to have given of Mr. Gladstone is quite contrary to his habit of expression and line of thought. The noble Marquess then complained of my noble Friend behind me coming forward as a witness to character. Well, my Lords, I think character is of some importance. Perhaps more than anybody in this House I have lived in close intimacy with public men during the last 30 or 40 years; and, whatever the noble Marquess's experience may have been, I state most positively that I have not known one who did not think it right to apply the rules of private morality also in public life and who would not be utterly ashamed, either for himself or for his Colleagues, to publicly state things which were contrary to the fact. I regret that my noble Friend (the Earl of Dunraven) should have continued that sort of insinuation, asking us to inform ourselves, and find out. We believe that we know all that passed, and we know what passed among ourselves; and when you talk of "compact" I deny it. The noble Earl asked whether Mr. Parnell was aware that the Prevention of Crime Bill was about to be introduced? I answer him "Certainly not," for the simple reason that Mr. Parnell was not informed by the Government of one single step, right or left, they meant to take. It was not a question of policy or expediency, but one of common sense. We have such difficult problems to solve in Ireland at this moment, that when information was volunteered to us of an important character we were bound to act upon it according to our light. The noble Earl was astonished at the difference of opinion between us and Mr. Forster. The only difference between us and Mr. Forster was, that Mr. Forster indicated the three modes in which he would have consented to the release. I am very glad to remark that both the noble Marquess and the noble Earl did not really question that it was desirable to release the "suspects." The difference between Mr. Forster and ourselves was this—that Mr. Forster wished that the Prevention of Crime Bill should pass, or that we should get a perfectly explicit and public declaration from the "suspects" that would satisfy him. He may have been right or wrong; but it appeared to us that we should by such a course be adopting that very arrangement, that compact with Mr. Parnell, which we succeeded in avoiding. Information was given to us. The noble Earl has spoken of a communication with Mr. Chamberlain as a communication with the Government; but does the noble Earl think it really bears that character? I read Mr. Chamberlain's

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 5th June, 1882.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILLS (by Order) —
Considered as amended—Forth Bridge Railway *; Ramsgate and Margate Tramways *.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Criminal Lunatics * [192].

Second Reading — County Courts (Advocates' Costs) [188].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]
 —R.P. [Fourth Night]; Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers [153] — R.P.; Partnerships (re-comm.) [179]—R.P.

Report—Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * [162]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [152]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) * [155]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [150].

Considered as amended — Judgments (Inferior Courts) [44].

Third Reading—Artillery Ranges * [183]; Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment * [133], and passed.

Withdrawn — Rating of Places of Religious Worship * [32].

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

STANDING ORDERS.

Standing Order 129 amended, in lines 9 and 10, by leaving out the words "the Report of the Examiner on such Bill," and inserting the words "the Examiner shall have given notice of the day on which the Bill will be examined" instead thereof.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—APPOINTMENTS IN THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary of State for War, If the report be correct that Colonel Sir Andrew Clarke, R.E. is to be promoted to the rank of Major General over the heads of several senior Colonels of the Royal Engineers, and appointed Inspector General of Fortifications; and, if so, whether such appointment has been hitherto held by one of the actual general officers of the corps; whether

Sir A. Clarke has not been absent from corps duties for about twenty-eight years, having been during that period on the seconded and supernumerary lists for civil employment; and, on what grounds the claims to the highest appointment in the Royal Engineers, of such distinguished officers as Major Generals Lennox, V.C., C.B.; Graham, V.C., C.B.; C. G. Gordon, C.B.; Cooke, C.B.; and Wray, C.M.G., are passed over in favour of an officer who has been practically a civilian, and has done so little corps duty during his career; also on what grounds Lieutenant General Gallwey, R.E., has been selected for the appointment of Governor of Bermuda, such appointment having become vacant by the death of a general officer of the Royal Engineers who had held the same for five years; and further, whether it is true that Colonel Ewart, R.E. is to succeed Sir Andrew Clarke as Commandant of the School of Military Engineering at Chatham; if so, whether, under Clause 79 I. of the Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion, that officer should, on completing five years' service in his present rank of Regimental Colonel on the 21st October next, be placed upon the full-pay list of the Royal Engineers, unless he elects to retire from the Army; and, on what grounds such regulation is not to be followed in Colonel Ewart's case?

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether it is true that Colonel Sir Andrew Clarke, Royal Engineers, has been appointed Inspector General of Fortifications; if so, whether he will state the date when Sir Andrew Clarke ceased to perform any active Military duty prior to April 1st, 1881, and why he has been selected in preference to many distinguished officers of the Royal Engineers who have continuously performed Military duties in connection with that corps?

MR. CHILDERS: I will answer together the three Questions of my hon. Friend and that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Ayrshire, as they relate to cognate matters. General Gallwey has been appointed by Lord Kimberley Governor of Bermuda. I recommended him for that office, General Gallwey having been employed in several important duties under and at the War Office, his last appointment being that of Inspector General of Fortifications. Sir Andrew Clarke has been appointed to succeed General Gallwey; but he has not, as the hon. Gentleman imagines, been promoted to the rank of major-general over any senior officer, nor was it ever proposed to promote him, although he will hold that rank locally and temporarily while Inspector General. His successor as commandant at Chatham has not been appointed; and I hope the House will support me in deprecating discussions as to the claims of supposed candidates. As to Sir Andrew Clarke, the Questions of both my hon. Friend and of the gallant Member evidence an entire misapprehension of the office for which he has been selected. If they will refer to The Army List, they will see that it is not an appointment in the Military Department under the Commander-in-Chief, but in the Ordnance Department under the Surveyor General. The Inspector General exercises, it is true, certain military functions, but they constitute a small portion of his duties; and Sir Andrew Clarke has been appointed because he is an engineer of great eminence, and has shown the highest qualities as an administrator, and because, as at the present time proposals of great importance are expected from the Royal Commission on Colonial Defences and the Committee on the Defence of Mercantile Harbours, we require to be advised by an officer of the very highest engineering, administrative, and financial capacity. Sir Andrew Clarke was selected by the Duke of Somerset for duties under the Admiralty as Director of Works, analagous to those of Inspector General and Director of Works at the War Office. He held that appointment for nine years, and was promoted in it to the rank of colonel. He was subsequently selected by Lord Salisbury as Public Works Member of the Viceroy's Council in India, under the Act of 1874, and then for five years discharged duties similar to those he will now have. I am sorry that my hon. Friend should have mentioned the names of other officers, and advocated their claims on the grounds of seniority. This is eminently an office in the selection for which seniority should be far less regarded than comparative fitness, and I have no doubt whatever that the selection of Sir Andrew Clarke is a wise one.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE MAGISTRACY—LICENSING MAGISTRATES AT PETERHEAD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is a fact that, at a meeting of the Licensing Committee for the burgh of Peterhead on the 15th May, there being no quorum present, certain magistrates granted an illegal and invalid certificate of confirmation, purporting to authorise the applicants to sell excisable liquors at their own risk; whether the provost is correctly reported to have encouraged this infraction of the Law by saying, that and, whether the persons whose certificates were in question have acted on the advice thus tendered?

“He did not think there was much fear of them, and if it were him he would take the risk, and give a fellow the drink he wanted;”

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have made inquiry into this matter, and my information is, that at a meeting of the Joint Committee for the confirmation of licences for the burgh of Peterhead, held on the 15th of May, applications were presented for the confirmation of three licences which had been unanimously granted by the magistrates; two of the applicants already held licences for the sale of porter and ale, which expired on that day. There was not a quorum of the Committee, only three members out of a total number of six being present. The following deliverance was pronounced:—

“The Joint Committee confirmed, so far as they had power (a quorum not being present), the above three certificates, subject to the parties taking the risk of the Court not being complete, and in respect of no one appearing to oppose the confirmation; and further, that the magistrates unanimously granted the certificates at the Licensing Court.”

The votes of the members of Committee present would have insured the confirmation of the licences if the whole Committee had attended. I am further informed that the report of the expression attributed to the Provost is substantially correct; but that the Provost, who is an experienced and highly respected magistrate, explains that he used these words in jest, and that they were so understood by the persons present. I am further informed that the applicants have been selling intoxicating liquor since the Confirmation Court was held, letter, and I think it is an excellent letter. But does the noble Earl really think that there is a compact between the Government and "suspects" in prison, because, in answer to a letter from a Member of the Liberal Party who has constantly supported Her Majesty's Government, asking for a more sympathetic treatment of the Irish Members, Mr. Chamberlain answered that some responsibility rested upon the Irish Members not to do that which gives offence to the whole of England and Scotland? This is the sort of nonsense which is talked when we ask for evidence about the Government compact with Kilmainham. The noble Marquess has expressed his views about repressive measures and measures of conciliation. He said it was a historical fact that deterrent measures had always succeeded.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: The expression I probably used was that, when properly administered, they had always deterred.

EARL GRANVILLE: My knowledge of history is not so extensive as that of the noble Marquess, but I am not perfectly certain that his facts in this case are more accurate than some of his information about the Government. I agree with him that measures of conciliation depend upon the mode and time at which they are done. My limited historical recollection brings to mind many measures of conciliation which have lost all their force, all their grace, and all their efficacy in consequence of having been delayed too long. I have only, in conclusion, to say that I am really grateful to the noble Marquess for giving us the opportunity of debating this question.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that he was not aware that there was no Correspondence on the subject, or he should not have gone on with his Motion.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there might be the order for release. The noble Marquess might, no doubt, see that if he wished.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ENTAIL (SCOTLAND) BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY, in presenting a Bill to amend the Law of Entail in Scotland, said: My Lords, I am very sorry to bring the House down from the somewhat spicy personalities of the last discussion to the prosaic level of a discussion upon a Scotch Bill. The nature of the House at this moment does not encourage me to think that any protracted statement such as I should have thought it perhaps necessary to make under other circumstances would be favourably received at the present moment; and, under these circumstances, I shall, with your permission, confine myself to lay before your Lordships, as briefly as possible, the proposals of the Government on this somewhat important subject. I would not even have done this; I would have postponed the Notice which I have on the Paper, had it not been for the fact of the numerously-signed requisition—signed both by Scotch Conservatives as well as by Scotch Liberals—which has been presented, asking Her Majesty's Government to bring in, as quickly as possible, a measure which is loudly demanded by the great mass of public opinion of Scotland, and which will be of great advantage. Of course, the whole fabric of entail in Scotland, which has not yet lasted in a legislative form for two centuries, has been piece-mealed and worn away by successive enactments. The last great enactment which dealt with the question in the form of the Act under which we at present exist in Scotland was the Rutherford Act. The Act, while dealing in a stringent manner with entails existing at the passing of the Act, did not in the same way give free trade to persons affected by entail after the passing of the Act. It is with the view of redressing that condition of things that Her Majesty's Government propose to bring in the Bill on the present occasion. They propose, in the first place, to put the heir of an entailed estate made subsequent to the Rutherford Act in the same position as an heir of entail before the passing of that Act. The 3rd clause of the Bill which I propose to lay on the Table provides—"That heirs under new entails may disentail by the same consent as an heir of an old entail"—that is to say, that with the consent of the three next heirs, whoever they may be, the heir of entail in possession will be entitled to disentail his estate. The next provision which is of importance is that under the Entail Act of the year 1875 power was given to force, as it is technically called, the consent of two of the next heirs, but not of the nearest heir—that is to say, by paying them the value of their interest in the succession, and getting rid of their consent. The Bill which I shall submit to your Lordships will go one step further. It will propose to buy out the interest of the nearest heir, as well as of the two others, if necessity is shown, and in that way to get rid of the necessity of obtaining his consent so long as his interest be compensated. The third and leading provision is this—that the tenant of entail will be enabled to sell the estate which he holds under entail, and to convert the same into money or Consols, to be held under the same trust as the entail of land. With regard to this, it will be lawful for an heir who wishes to sell his estates to apply to the Court of Session for permission, and the Court shall order intimation to be made to the heirs of entail affected by this announcement, and such heirs and creditors shall be entitled to appear for the purpose of seeing that their respective interests are protected; but they shall not be entitled to oppose the application. The next step will be that the Court shall procure a report of the value of the estate, and, unless it shall appear that any pecuniary interest is involved injuriously, they shall have power to order it to be sold. Then there are clauses as to the way in which the money shall be paid into the Court of Session, as if it were paid into the Court of Chancery, and the way in which it may be held under the same trusts as the land is held. There are other minor provisions which enable the heir in possession, or a minor with the consent of his curators, as if he were an heir of entail in possession, and of age, to make this application. There will be also provisions for curators to appear on behalf of persons suffering legal incapacity of another kind. And, lastly, there will be clauses enabling the Court to dispense with the consent of an heir who has been absent from this country for a certain time. We know there are estates in Scotland of which the possessor has been absent 30 or 40 years, and it is thought, under these circumstances, there should be some power to administer without his consent. I shall not further detain your Lordships at this hour of the evening, except to ask you to give a first reading to this Bill, because I believe it would be a great boon to the community at large in Scotland, not merely to the class affected, whom it will, indeed, directly benefit, but it will be a great benefit to the owners of the land, and will benefit the occupiers, who will find landlords able to effect improvements on their estates which in their present hampered condition they cannot do; and, in the third place, it will be a boon to the community at large, as promoting that free circulation of land which is desirable in every country. I beg to ask your Lordships to read the Bill a first time.

Earl Granville

Bill to amend the law of Entail in Scotland—Presented (The Earl of ROSEBURY).

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY did not wish to criticize the measure, but to make a suggestion. When a Bill such as that presented by the noble Earl contained matters of a complicated character, it was ordinarily accompanied by a memorandum explaining its practical effect, which was drawn up, of course, by a legal gentleman. The difficulty, of course, in this case was that the law was not very clearly understood by a large number of Members of the House, and being a Scotch law it was still less understood. If ever there was a case where a memorandum would be advisable, this was one, although the impression was that the Bill was an innocent one.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that though there was some speciality in the Scotch law on which it might be well to receive proper information, the more important part of the Bill, which related to the power of sale, was really in substance what was proposed, as to settled estates in England, to be given by his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) in the Bill now before the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF ROSEBURY said, he knew the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had a fancy for memoranda, and on this occasion he would provide him with one.

Bill read 1^a; and to be printed. (No. 115.)

PARLIAMENTARY OATHS ACT (1866)

AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866—Was presented by The Duke of ARGYLL; read 1^a. (No. 111.)

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 5th June, 1882.

MINUTES.] — PRIVATE BILLS (by Order) —

Considered as amended—Forth Bridge Railway *; Ramsgate and Margate Tramways *.PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Criminal Lunatics * [192].Second Reading — County Courts (Advocates' Costs) [188].Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Fourth Night]; Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers [153] — R.P.; Partnerships (re-comm.) [179]—R.P.Report—Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * [162];

Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) *

[152]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) * [155]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) *

[150].

Considered as amended — Judgments (Inferior Courts) [44].Third Reading—Artillery Ranges * [183]; IrishReproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment * [133], and passed.Withdrawn — Rating of Places of Religious Worship * [32].

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

STANDING ORDERS.

Standing Order 129 amended, in lines 9 and 10, by leaving out the words "the Report of the Examiner on such Bill," and inserting the words "the Examiner shall have given notice of the day on which the Bill will be examined" instead thereof.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

ARMY—APPOINTMENTS IN THE ROYAL ENGINEERS.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the Secretary of State for War, If the report be correct that Colonel Sir Andrew Clarke, R.E. is to be promoted to the rank of Major General over the heads of several senior Colonels of the Royal Engineers, and appointed Inspector General of Fortifications; and, if so, whether such appointment has been hitherto held by one of the actual general officers of the corps; whether

Sir A. Clarke has not been absent from corps duties for about twenty-eight years, having been during that period on the seconded and supernumerary lists for civil employment; and, on what grounds the claims to the highest appointment in the Royal Engineers, of such distinguished officers as Major Generals Lennox, V.C., C.B.; Graham, V.C., C.B.; C. G. Gordon, C.B.; Cooke, C.B.; and Wray, C.M.G., are passed over in favour of an officer who has been practically a civilian, and has done so little corps duty during his career; also on what grounds Lieutenant General Gallwey, R.E., has been selected for the appointment of Governor of Bermuda, such appointment having become vacant by the death of a general officer of the Royal Engineers who had held the same for five years; and further, whether it is true that Colonel Ewart, R.E. is to succeed Sir Andrew Clarke as Commandant of the School of Military Engineering at Chatham; if so, whether, under Clause 79 I. of the Royal Warrant for Pay and Promotion, that officer should, on completing five years' service in his present rank of Regimental Colonel on the 21st October next, be placed upon the full-pay list of the Royal Engineers, unless he elects to retire from the Army; and, on what grounds such regulation is not to be followed in Colonel Ewart's case?

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the right hon. Gentleman, Whether it is true that Colonel Sir Andrew Clarke, Royal Engineers, has been appointed Inspector General of Fortifications; if so, whether he will state the date when Sir Andrew Clarke ceased to perform any active Military duty prior to April 1st, 1881, and why he has been selected in preference to many distinguished officers of the Royal Engineers who have continuously performed Military duties in connection with that corps?

MR. CHILDERS: I will answer together the three Questions of my hon. Friend and that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for South Ayrshire, as they relate to cognate matters. General Gallwey has been appointed by Lord Kimberley Governor of Bermuda. I recommended him for that office, General Gallwey having been employed in several important duties under and at the War Office, his last appointment being that of Inspector General of Fortifications. Sir Andrew Clarke has been appointed to succeed General Gallwey; but he has not, as the hon. Gentleman imagines, been promoted to the rank of major-general over any senior officer, nor was it ever proposed to promote him, although he will hold that rank locally and temporarily while Inspector General. His successor as commandant at Chatham has not been appointed; and I hope the House will support me in deprecating discussions as to the claims of supposed candidates. As to Sir Andrew Clarke, the Questions of both my hon. Friend and of the gallant Member evidence an entire misapprehension of the office for which he has been selected. If they will refer to The Army List, they will see that it is not an appointment in the Military Department under the Commander-in-Chief, but in the Ordnance Department under the Surveyor General. The Inspector General exercises, it is true, certain military functions, but they constitute a small portion of his duties; and Sir Andrew Clarke has been appointed because he is an engineer of great eminence, and has shown the highest qualities as an administrator, and because, as at the present time proposals of great importance are expected from the Royal Commission on Colonial Defences and the Committee on the Defence of Mercantile Harbours, we require to be advised by an officer of the very highest engineering, administrative, and financial capacity. Sir Andrew Clarke was selected by the Duke of Somerset for duties under the Admiralty as Director of Works, analagous to those of Inspector General and Director of Works at the War Office. He held that appointment for nine years, and was promoted in it to the rank of colonel. He was subsequently selected by Lord Salisbury as Public Works Member of the Viceroy's Council in India, under the Act of 1874, and then for five years discharged duties similar to those he will now have. I am sorry that my hon. Friend should have mentioned the names of other officers, and advocated their claims on the grounds of seniority. This is eminently an office in the selection for which seniority should be far less regarded than comparative fitness, and I have no doubt whatever that the selection of Sir Andrew Clarke is a wise one.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE MAGISTRACY—LICENSING MAGISTRATES AT PETERHEAD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether it is a fact that, at a meeting of the Licensing Committee for the burgh of Peterhead on the 15th May, there being no quorum present, certain magistrates granted an illegal and invalid certificate of confirmation, purporting to authorise the applicants to sell excisable liquors at their own risk; whether the provost is correctly reported to have encouraged this infraction of the Law by saying, that and, whether the persons whose certificates were in question have acted on the advice thus tendered?

“He did not think there was much fear of them, and if it were him he would take the risk, and give a fellow the drink he wanted;”

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have made inquiry into this matter, and my information is, that at a meeting of the Joint Committee for the confirmation of licences for the burgh of Peterhead, held on the 15th of May, applications were presented for the confirmation of three licences which had been unanimously granted by the magistrates; two of the applicants already held licences for the sale of porter and ale, which expired on that day. There was not a quorum of the Committee, only three members out of a total number of six being present. The following deliverance was pronounced:—

“The Joint Committee confirmed, so far as they had power (a quorum not being present), the above three certificates, subject to the parties taking the risk of the Court not being complete, and in respect of no one appearing to oppose the confirmation; and further, that the magistrates unanimously granted the certificates at the Licensing Court.”

The votes of the members of Committee present would have insured the confirmation of the licences if the whole Committee had attended. I am further informed that the report of the expression attributed to the Provost is substantially correct; but that the Provost, who is an experienced and highly respected magistrate, explains that he used these words in jest, and that they were so understood by the persons present. I am further informed that the applicants have been selling intoxicating liquor since the Confirmation Court was held,

Tuite, of Cloonragh, in the county of Longford, who were arrested more than three months ago under the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act, on the charge of intimidating others to prevent them paying their rents; whether they are still in prison; the one in Monaghan, the other in Enniskillen Gaol; whether it is the fact that no body of tenants, and no individual tenant in the whole parish in which these men lived, had refused to pay rent; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will recommend the release of Mr. Fitzsimons and Mr. Tuite?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has just had the cases of Messrs. Fitzsimons and Tuite under his consideration, and is happy to find that the state of their district will now admit of their release, which has been ordered accordingly.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—CAPTAIN HILL.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Captain Hill, one of the Inspectors of Irish Prisons, a short time ago visited Derry Gaol, while a number of his tenants were undergoing imprisonment there in default of giving bail, and, in the presence of the gaol officials, abused his tenants for not having paid their rents, and denounced them for having taken part in the land agitation; and, if this statement is correct, whether the Irish Government will take any notice of such conduct on the part of Captain Hill?

MR. TREVELYAN: Mr. Hill, the Inspector of the Prisons Board referred to, informs me that in July, 1881, he saw a few of his tenants in Londonderry Gaol, but that he neither abused nor denounced them in any way whatsoever.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. DOLAN AND HANLY.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there are any special reasons for the continued imprisonment of Messrs. Dolan and Hanly, Poor Law Guardians of the Roscommon Union, now that other gentlemen, arrested at the same time and under the same circumstances, have been released?

Mr. Justin M. Carthy

MR. TREVELYAN: Messrs. Dolan and Hanly were released on the 31st of May.

ARMY—SENIOR MAJORS.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will extend the special and temporary allowance which the two senior majors of infantry battalions receive under Article 185-1 of the Royal Warrant of 25th of June 1881, to those majors of cavalry who were the senior captains of their regiments on 30th of June 1881?

MR. CHILDERS: The hon. and gallant Baronet was probably not present when I answered this Question, put to me by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Leitrim (Colonel O'Beirne) on the 24th of April. My answer gave the reason why this extension could not be made.

ARMY—COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS—WEST INDIAN REGIMENTS.

MAJOR MASTER asked the Secretary of State for War, Why at the Civil Service Examination December 1881, were the three West India appointments given to the three unsuccessful candidates for the Line (Nos. 71, 72, 73) rather than to the three highest candidates for West India Regiments, in face of War Office Memorandum (extract dated December 1880), and applicable to November and December Examination 1881, saying

"There will be 105 Cadetships to be competed for, of which five will be for candidates for West India Regiments?"

MR. CHILDERS: I have inquired into the subject of the hon. and gallant Gentleman's Question, and I find that the rule has been always observed of offering to the highest unsuccessful candidates on the list West Indian commissions if a sufficient number of West India candidates did not succeed in the competition. The wording of the Memorandum to which he has called my notice, and which is of old date, is a little obscure, and I will have it made clearer in future.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOSEPH HUBAN AND OTHERS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Messrs. Huban, John Sweeney, and Thomas Cunningham, of Loughrea, were arrested in June 1881 on the same charge; and, whether, as the state of the district permitted the release of the first-named gentleman, the other two will be released forthwith from prison?

MR. TREVELYAN: I find that in April last, Joseph Huban made an urgent appeal for release for a week on parole on the ground, among others, that a near relative was at the point of death. He offered rigidly to observe whatever conditions might be imposed upon him, and the Lord Lieutenant, after inquiry and consideration, was pleased to order his release. His Excellency fears that he cannot at present order the release of Messrs. Sweeney and Cunningham; but he has not yet arrived at a final decision on their cases, which he has now before him for consideration.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, their release was recommended by the Catholic Bishop of the district.

LICENSING ACTS (IRELAND)—CASE OF MRS. KELLY.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the circumstances under which Mrs. Kelly, of Athenry, mother of Mr. Patrick C. Kelly, a suspect at present confined in Galway Gaol, was fined two pounds, with marking of her licence; whether the offence charged was of too trivial a character to merit so extreme a step; whether Mrs. Kelly has received notice that the police are to be removed from the barracks of which she is landlady; and, whether, in view of the loss Mrs. Kelly has already undergone, he will order the mitigation of so severe a sentence for a slight offence against the Licensing Laws?

MR. TREVELYAN: I learn from the local constabulary that Mrs. Kelly's public-house has been kept in a very irregular manner. In April, 1879, she was summoned for a breach of the Licensing Laws; but, as she pleaded ignorance, the Bench, acting leniently, dismissed the case against her, although at the same time fining three persons found on her premises during prohibited hours. She was again summoned in October of the same year, and fined £1, and again in October, 1880; but the case was then dismissed. In February last she was summoned for having her licensed premises open during closing hours; the case was proved, and she was fined £1. She was also summoned for sale of intoxicating liquors during prohibited hours, and was fined £1 and her licence was marked. I am informed that this was a light sentence, and that the penalty in these cases for a first offence might have been £10. With regard to the removal of the police from the barrack, of which she is owner, the facts are these. Owing to the disturbed state of the Athenry district, it has been found necessary to increase the police force. The old barrack is no longer large enough to contain the men. A new house, much larger and in every way better suited for a barrack, has been obtained, and the usual three months' notice of surrender has been served on Mrs. Kelly. If she wishes to memorialize the Lord Lieutenant he will, I have no doubt, consider whether there is anything in her case calling for a mitigation of the penalty inflicted on her in petty sessions.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the persons found on her premises were there only for a few minutes.

[No answer was given.]

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—EDWARD BARRETT.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Edward Barrett, of Craughwell, county Galway, has been imprisoned as a suspect in Galway Gaol for nearly twelve months; whether other suspects from the same district have been released; and, whether the improved condition of the locality justifies the immediate release of a suspect who has already suffered so lengthened an imprisonment?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant has reconsidered Mr. Barrett's case, but finds that he cannot at present order his release.

INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT—PAY OF SURVEYING OFFICERS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he has had time to consider the application of the Inland Revenue surveying officers for an increase of pay and leave of absence?

MR. COURTNEY: Yes, Sir; the application has been considered, and an answer has been sent to the Board of Inland Revenue.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In the affirmative?

MR. COURTNEY: I think, Sir, it is better that these officers should receive the answer from their own official superiors.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—SALARIES.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the Treasury Minute of the 27th of April 1882, granting increases of salary to out-door officers, watermen, and boatmen of Her Majesty's Customs, is not made to apply to the watermen of the Port of London; and, whether these watermen will be granted increases of their salaries on the conditions laid down in the Minute referred to?

MR. COURTNEY: There is no such Treasury Minute of April 27, 1882; but my hon. Friend probably refers to a Minute of January 28 last, under which the salaries of the out-door officers, and watermen, and boatmen throughout the United Kingdom are made uniform. This uniformity was obtained by raising the maximum salaries at the out-ports to the London scale for out-door officers, and for watermen and boatmen. There is, therefore, no intention of raising the salaries of the London staff.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

MR. BOURKE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Papers down to a recent date upon Egyptian Affairs will soon be presented to Parliament? At the same time I should like to ask the hon. Baronet a Question of which I have given him private Notice with respect to a document—called in the House an Ultimatum—which was presented on May 25, by the Diplomatic Agents of England and France at Cairo, to the Turkish Council of Ministers, and in which three propositions were made. The first was for the temporary removal from Egypt of Arabi Pasha, allowing him to retain his rank and pay; the second, the sending of Ali Fehmy and Abdulla Pashas into the interior of Egypt, equally with the retention of their rank and pay; and the third, the resignation of the present Ministry. Authorized by their respective Governments, the Consular Agents recommended these propositions to the serious consideration of the Council of Ministers and their Colleagues, and intimated that, in certain eventualities, they were authorized to exact the fulfilment of these conditions. I wish to ask whether these conditions have been fulfilled; and, if not, whether their fulfilment will be exacted? At the same time, it may be convenient that I should ask whether the Sultan has rejected the idea of a Conference; whether, if the Sultan has rejected the idea of a Conference, the Note is abandoned; whether the Conference can take place at Constantinople without his invitation; whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to support the present Khedive; whether the Sultan has ordered the preparation of the earthworks at Alexandria to be stopped; whether, in the event of Arabi Pasha refusing to stop the preparation of the earthworks, the Sultan has asked the English Government to stop their preparation by force; and, if so, what answer has been returned; whether the British residents at Alexandria have applied to the British Consulate for protection, and what answer has been given; and, whether any number of British residents have left Alexandria for their safety? If the hon. Baronet is not prepared to answer these Questions to-day, I will repeat them to-morrow.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In answer to the Question on the Paper, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with the French Government as to the publication of the further Papers which we desire to lay on the Table with as little delay as possible, and have received from the French Government an answer which is favourable, but not final. Generally speaking, they express no objection to the publication of the Papers; but they make certain reservations, and we shall have to discuss with them those reservations which they make.

MR. BOURKE: When can that be done?

Lord George Hamilton

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It will take some days before we are quite certain. Upon that subject, I say, the answer is favourable; because I think it will be possible to come to an agreement.

MR. BOURKE: Up to what date would the Papers go?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Up to the present time. If they are laid at all upon the Table, it will be up to the present time. With regard to the other Questions, the right hon. Gentleman draws a distinction between the earlier and the later Questions. He says he gave me Notice of the earlier Questions; but it was Notice of a kind hardly entitled to be called Notice at all. He did tell me that he would ask me a Question as to the Ultimatum; but he did not say what it was. He knows that when he held the Office I now have the honour to occupy, I asked him a good many Questions, and always when it was possible I gave him a week's Notice. It is exceedingly inconvenient, as he knows, to be called on to answer Questions without Notice, and that it is especially difficult when these Questions relate to a subject regarding which we have to weigh every word we say, and the different points of which ought to be the subject beforehand of communication with Foreign Powers. With regard to this Ultimatum, the right hon. Gentleman could have given me Notice beforehand; because there is nothing in the Question which has come to his knowledge recently. The facts were in his possession 10 days ago. He said the word "Ultimatum" was used in this House. It was not used by me, and I protested against its use on behalf of the Government. Without going into further reasons, I may say that if the question were debated, I should describe an Ultimatum as proceeding from one Sovereign to another Sovereign, which was clearly not the case in this instance. With regard to that document, I have said, in general terms, that Her Majesty's Government, as on former occasions, do not intend to go back from the statement they have made respecting their Egyptian policy. The right hon. Gentleman asks whether the Turkish Government has rejected the idea of a Conference? No, Sir; they have not done so; they have not answered us up to the present time. He then asks, if the Conference at Constantinople is refused by Turkey, would it be held elsewhere?

MR. BOURKE: No; that is not my Question. I asked, could it be held at Constantinople without the Sultan's invitation?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That would be a question to be considered. Certainly it could be held elsewhere. He then asks me whether the Sultan has asked the British Government certain Questions as to what would happen if these fortifications at Alexandria were not discontinued? No; the Sultan has not done so. Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with Sir Edward Malet and Admiral Sir Beauchamp Seymour upon the subject of the earthworks at Alexandria, and Her Majesty's Government are quite agreed with them as to the steps to be taken, and they have complete confidence in the power of the Admiral to maintain the safety of the ships under his command. It would be, however, undesirable to make any statement as to the steps to be resolved upon. We have heard to-day that very strong orders have been given by the Sultan immediately to discontinue the building of these forts. Arabi Pasha, it is announced, has been ordered by the Khedive to discontinue arming them, and the Khedive has also ordered all warlike preparations at Alexandria to be discontinued. With regard to the last Question, as to the European residents leaving Alexandria, we have received representations from them. It was in consequence of representations made by them, and made through Sir Beauchamp Seymour and the Consul at Alexandria, some days ago, that the Squadron at Alexandria was considerably strengthened. With regard to their leaving Alexandria, we have heard nothing officially; but privately we have heard that a good many have left.

MR. BOURKE: Where for?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have not heard, except that they were leaving by the various mail steamers.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Are we to understand from the answer that has just been given that the proposal for the Conference is still before the Porte, and that no answer has been received to the invitation?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir. The official answers from the Great Powers have only just begun to come in. We have received informal answers from the Great Powers, and some indirect communication from Lord Dufferin on the subject; but nothing direct from the Porte.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER—THE HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE STRANGERS' GALLERY.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the First Commissioner of Works, If any extension of the Gallery of the House can be made, so as to afford more accommodation to the large and increasing number of persons that apply for admission?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, he had carefully considered the plans of the House, and found it was totally impossible to increase the accommodation for strangers; and, in fact, if increase were possible, he thought Members of the House would have the first claim.

COPYRIGHT (WORKS OF FINE ART, &c.) BILL.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the honourable Member for East Worcestershire, Whether, notwithstanding the lateness of the Session, and the declaration recently made by the President of the Board of Trade, he intends proceeding this year with the Copyright (Works of Fine Art, &c.) Bill?

MR. HASTINGS: This Bill having been read a second time, it is my intention to again ask the House, at the earliest available opportunity, to go into Committee upon it. I trust that the hon. Member for Portsmouth will withdraw his block, to enable me to take the sense of the House, and thus give me the fair opportunity of replying to his observations when he talked out the Bill on the 17th of May last.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he was unable to comply with the hon. Member's request.

SOUTH AFRICA (THE TRANSVAAL)— ATTACKS BY THE BOERS ON NATIVE TRIBES.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether accurate information has yet been obtained by Her Majesty's Government from their representative in the Transvaal as to the alleged attack of Boers on Montsicc in January and February last; whether it is a fact that one of the two cannon used in the attack was supplied by Commandant Jan Vilgoen, of Marico, and the other by Commissioner Hendrick Grieff, of Lichtenburg; whether the Government have ascertained that Joubert visited Marico in the month of March last, and exacted a fine of 3,500 head of cattle from a chief named Gassebi, living beyond the borders of the Transvaal, who had protected the English during the war; whether the beacons set up by Colonel Moysey, R.E. in September 1881, to mark the western boundary of the Transvaal, have been knocked down by Moshetti and the Boers; and, what steps, if any, Her Majesty's Government propose to take in reference to these matters?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY answered the first Question of the hon. and learned Member in the affirmative. Captain Nourse had been sent by our Resident in the Transvaal to inquire into the facts in the early part of this year; and the Papers on the subject would be laid on the Table. The attack upon Montsicc was made by another Chief named Moshetti, and the Boers who helped him were volunteers, really hired by Moshetti to carry on the war. Montsicc's territory was outside the Transvaal border, so that any direct interference on the part of the Boers would be contrary to the Convention; but it was their duty to preserve the neutrality of the border, and prevent the volunteers from crossing. The Colonial Office knew nothing about the cannon referred to in the second branch of the Question. As to the third Question, the fact was, that in the early part of this year, the Resident in the Transvaal, Mr. Hudson, received information that the Chief Gassebi had invaded the Transvaal border, and made an attack on a smaller Chief, killing three men, and General Joubert was instructed to exact a fine of 4,000 cattle and the surrender of the murderers. The Chief acknowledged he was in the wrong, but pleaded that the fine was excessive. What our Resident said was, that the Boers were breaking the terms of the Convention by taking those steps without, first of all, consulting him. The Resident thereupon communicated with the Chief, and begged him to come up to Pretoria with all the evidence, and pay 1,000 head of cattle in advance by way of fine. The last news the Colonial Office had was, that the Resident was awaiting the answer of Gassebi. As to the fourth Question, the Government knew nothing about it. With regard to the fifth Question, the Government were in communication with the High Commissioner and the British Resident on the matter.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. GORST asked whether the Government did not know by whom the two cannon were supplied?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, they did not even know that cannon were used at all.

MR. GORST said, that perhaps the Government would make inquiries whether they were not supplied by a Government officer?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY said, that in consequence of that Question they had already sent out to their Resident, asking him to state all the facts of the case.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE BRITISH SQUADRON.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, The names, calibre of guns, number of bluejackets, Marines, and non-combatant men on board of each vessel now in the port of and on the way to Alexandria; also draught of water of each vessel; if the whole are of sufficiently light draught to enter Alexandria Harbour or pass through the Suez Canal; and, are they all fitted with torpedoes, if so, of what description?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: My hon. Friend asks me to give a public and detailed statement as to the fighting strength of the ships now at Alexandria. I am sorry that I must decline to do so. The House will agree—and I think my hon. Friend will himself on reflection see—that it would be contrary to the public interest that such a statement should be made at this moment.

MR. GOURLEY: I disagree with the opinion which has just been expressed, and I shall take an early opportunity of calling attention to the subject.

AFRICA (EAST COAST)—SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, The number and names of steam and sailing cruisers now engaged in the suppression of the Slave Trade on the East Coast of Africa; if it be correct that the steam cruisers are not only too slow, but also deficient in fuel capacity, and that both steam and sailing vessels are of too heavy a draught for inshore chasing; that there is no Government coaling station between the Cape and Aden, and that the cruisers have to obtain fuel from French Government depôts and private firms at exorbitant prices; and, further, if it be correct that some of the vessels are very often withdrawn from slave cruising operations for the purpose of carrying minor diplomatic despatches?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, a corvette and a gun-vessel, belonging to the East Indian Squadron, are at present engaged on the East Coast of Africa for the suppression of the Slave Trade. The boats of the London, dépôt ship at Zanzibar, are also constantly employed cruising where larger vessels cannot act; and at the request of the local naval authorities two schooners have recently been despatched as an additional force for this purpose. It is hoped that the entire force thus constituted will prove sufficient. As regards the supply of coal, there is at Zanzibar a Government coal depôt, with covered storage accommodation for 3,300 tons, and there are several places in those waters at which coal is obtained at prices which are not exorbitant. With regard to the last Question of my hon. Friend, the vessels employed on the East Coast are rarely interfered with, and never when it can possibly be avoided.

MR. GOURLEY: Are these schooners sailing vessels?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT — SALARIES OF COLLECTORS.

MR. JACKSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any decision has been arrived at with respect to the Memorial, dated November 1880, and signed by 100 collectors of Customs, drawing attention to the anomalous position in which they are placed with respect to the improved scale of salary granted to their subordinates, the examining officers and clerks; which Memorial the late Secretary to the Treasury stated, in answer to a question on the 26th July last, was then under the attentive consideration of the Treasury?

MR. COURTNEY: The great changes which have been in progress during the past year in the Customs Department have precluded for the present the consideration of the case submitted by the collectors. The matter cannot in any case be urgent, as the position of the collectors was considerably improved so recently as 1873. But the Treasury and the Board of Customs are in correspondence on the matter.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. PARNELL.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, on the day on which Mr. O'Shea had an interview with Mr. Parnell in Kilmainham, any other visitor was admitted to an interview with Mr. Parnell; if so, whether the name of every such visitor was entered in the prison books according to the ordinary rule; if not, if he would state why not?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I have no knowledge or information whatever of any visitor seeing Mr. Parnell in Kilmainham, except that which I have in common with every other Member of the House — namely, what has been stated in the House.

FRANCE—THE BIMETALLIC CONFERENCE AT PARIS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Sir Louis Malet and Lord Reay relative to the Bimetallic Conference at Paris?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: These Reports have been laid on the Table of the House, and are now, or very shortly will be, in print.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—VOLUNTEER CORPS.

MR. RANKIN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether a Volunteer Corps in any district is or is not a part of the territorial regiment of that district; and, if it is, will it be numbered as a battalion of that regiment and be required to assimilate its uniform, and will the Volunteer Officers be liable to be called upon to serve on Regimental Courts Martial?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; an Infantry Volunteer Corps is part of the territorial regiment. But, as to the numbering and uniform of the battalions, I am anxious not to make changes in advance of the general wish of the Volunteers themselves, and I do not propose to do more than we have done until those wishes are generally expressed. When Volunteer Officers are subject to Military Law they are undoubtedly liable to serve on courts martial. But, as a matter of practice, they would probably not be detailed so to serve unless known to possess the necessary knowledge of the law.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. BIDDELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has obtained reliable Returns of the number of tenants and the amount of their arrears of rent which would come under the cognizance of the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill; and, if so, will he place them before the House; and, if he has not such Returns, will he at once take steps for obtaining them?

MR. GLADSTONE: We are using the best efforts we can to get as particular information as possible about the number and amount of arrears in Ireland; but I cannot say absolutely that we shall be able to succeed in obtaining it in a very formal manner. We have, of course, no authority over private persons to require them to make any disclosure. We have proceeded on the principle of covering whatever uncertainty there may be by a very large margin. But we shall do the best we can.

MR. GREGORY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he will provide for the remission of tithe rent-charge, quit rent, Income Tax, and any other charge which may be payable to the Government in respect of any holding with regard to which arrears of rent will be cancelled by the operation of the Arrears Bill now before Parliament, and for the period for which those arrears are cancelled?

MR. GLADSTONE: I know the attention which the hon. Member has given to this question; but he will not expect me to go in detail into it at the present time, because it will come up for discussion in Committee. But as to the item of Income Tax, I may say that it is already settled by the present law.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE
—THE CARRIAGE DUTIES.

MR. COCHRAN - PATRICK asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is intended to impose the new increase of the Carriage Duty in those counties in Scotland in which the maintenance of highways by assessment will not come into operation till 1833?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): There is no intention of asking the House to impose a carriage duty in certain counties, and to exempt certain other counties; nor do I believe it possible to work a law upon that principle. The question in what way the incidence of the duty—if it please the House to vote it—may be adapted to the different cases of the different parts of the country that may or may not have taken over the maintenance of highways by assessment is, of course, a question for consideration when we come to the measure.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
BILL—MEMORIAL OF IRISH JUDGES.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, What answer has been given to the memorial of the Irish Judges protesting against the abolition of trial by jury in Ireland; whether any resignations in the Irish judiciary have been sent in; and, if he can state by whom the two vacant judgeships will be filled?

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot find on inquiry that in any Department there was any formal communication of the Memorial of the Irish Judges to the Government. There has been no answer to that Memorial or any correspondence upon it that has come to the knowledge of the Government. It was not forwarded to us in any way. As to resignations in the Irish Judiciary, there is no resignation properly so called; but there has been a removal by the promotion of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, which creates a vacancy, of course. As to the vacancy in a Judgeship recently caused by death, the regular course is that the Viceroy communicates his view on the subject, when he has made up his mind, to the Prime Minister, in order that the Queen's pleasure may be taken in filling up the vacancy. I have not yet received any communication from the Viceroy on the subject.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that there is no truth in the statement relative to Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, for it was to that my Question was principally directed?

MR. GLADSTONE: There is no truth in that statement.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Prime Minister a Question of which he had given him private Notice. It was, Whether the Prime Minister had seen a telegraphic statement in one of the leading Liberal organs of the day from the correspondent of that newspaper in Cairo, to the effect that there was now no Khedive, no Government, and no Ministry in Cairo, and that everything which the English and French had declared they would not allow had been done there; whether that statement was correct; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government would take to prevent the continuance of such a state of anarchy?

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not know that there was any occasion for the hon. Member to have given me Notice of the Question, or that my answer could have been improved by Notice. I take that statement to be a sort of summing up—very effective, rather figurative, and, perhaps, a little poetical—of a situation which is undoubtedly grave and formidable, but which can only be treated in reference to a statement of particulars a little more exact than that very general statement. I hope that in a few days satisfactory information will be given on some of those particulars.

PRISONS (ENGLAND) ACT—PRISON WARDERS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to an opinion given by Mr. Justice Lopes at the Central Criminal Court, on May 24, when the learned Judge stated—had in their possession such murderous weapons as those presented in court. It was said that the means of communication was a whistle; but it might occur that the warder was rendered insensible. It was worthy of attention whether this system could not be altered, so that a small number of convicts should be together under the charge of one warder, or that the number of warders should be increased;"

“He could not think that forty convicts should be in charge of only one warder, armed with a short sword, while they (the convicts)

and, whether he will consider the propriety of altering the system complained of?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I have inquired into the matter of which the hon. Member speaks. It appears to have arisen from a want of vigilance on the part of many of the warders. I have directed that in future precautions must be taken to prevent such an occurrence again taking place.

LICENSING ACTS (IRELAND)—CORK RACES.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it be true, as reported in the Cork daily papers of the 29th May, that a duly convened meeting of the City Magistrates was held on the previous day, at which it was resolved that, following the precedent of last year, no occasional licences for the sale of intoxicating liquors should be granted for the Cork Races on the 7th June; whether one magistrate has defeated the objects of the proceedings of the meeting by signing the necessary certificates for such licences; the other two magistrates on the Bench at the time, one of whom was not present at the meeting, stating they could not be parties to ignoring the resolution arrived at; if it be true that, on the last occasion when these licences were issued, a serious riot, which endangered the peace of the City, originated in one of the drinking tents; and, whether he will communicate with the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who are empowered to grant such licences, when they consider that doing so will "conduce to public convenience, comfort, and order," before they act on the certificates?

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts are quite correctly stated in the Question of the hon. Baronet. The attention of the Government has not been drawn to the matter by the magistrates; and in the absence of any representations on the subject from those who are the responsible authorities for preserving the peace of their City, I do not consider that any action is called for on the part of the Executive Government.

NAVY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD H.M.S. "SWIFTSURE."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he could inform the House whether a gun had burst on board Her Majesty's ship Swiftsure; whether the accident had been attended by loss of life or limb; and if he would also state the nature of the gun which had burst, where manufactured, and whether any other guns of the same character and manufacture, of larger or smaller calibre, were now embarked on board any other of Her Majesty's ships?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I regret to state that it is unhappily true that an accident of the nature mentioned, and attended with fatal results, occurred on board Her Majesty's ship Swiftsure, at Madeira. The only information the Admiralty have received is contained in a telegram from the captain, dated the 1st of June, to this effect—

"Arrived evening 31st. When saluting, breech-piece 25-pounder was broken off, killing Charles James, hurting three others, not seriously. Am inquiring into case."

With regard to the nature of the gun, I think it would be better that my right hon. and gallant Friend should repeat his Question in a few days, as we have at present no reason to suppose that the accident was due to any fault in the gun; and we shall then have received a full Report on the subject.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Has the hon. Gentleman any objection to laying the official Report of the accident upon the Table of the House as soon as it is drawn up?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: When I see the Report I will answer that Question.

COLONEL NOLAN wished to know what possible objection there could be to saying what class of gun it was that had burst?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN replied, that the only reason was this—that he had read to the House all the information the Admiralty possessed; and if he were to proceed to state what nature of gun it was, it would throw suspicion upon that particular kind of gun. [Colonel Nolan: Hear, hear!]

Until they had the Report on the accident before them, stating that there was some fault found in the gun, it would be unwise to do this.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought it quite right that suspicion should be cast on this particular class of gun. He gave notice that to-morrow he should ask the Secretary of State for War what class of gun had lately been supplied to the Navy? He should also repeat his Question to the Secretary to the Admiralty.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would answer the Question addressed to him at once. Only a few days ago he gave very detailed information as to the guns which had been supplied to the Navy.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE RECENT DIVISION.

MR. MAC IVER: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any special significance is to be attached to the absence of eight Members of Her Majesty's Government from the division of last Friday night, on the question whether the words "treason or treason-felony" were or were not to be included in the Prevention of Crime Bill—namely, the President of the Board of Trade, the Vice President of the Council, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, the Secretary to the Treasury, and the Secretary of State for War. I do not know that I need enumerate further. [Cries of "Go on!"] I do not know that the list is complete.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question, I should like to ask him whether he attaches any special significance to the fact that the majority in favour of the insertion of these two words, "treason or treason-felony," consisted almost as largely of Conservatives as Liberals?

MR. GLADSTONE: It was my hope that both these questions would have conveyed interesting and detailed information to the House; but I am sorry to find that the statements of fact are rather vague. The hon. Member for Birkenhead has not been able to give us a complete list; and the hon. Gentleman who has last spoken is, I believe, very imperfectly informed indeed, for, if I am not much mistaken, considerably more than a moiety of the majority was composed of Liberals. With respect to the Members of the Government who were not present at the division, I have not attached special significance to the instances, of which, indeed, owing to the failure of the hon. Member in the latter part of his list, I am not yet fully informed. There is no exemption to any Member of Her Majesty's Government from voting in the divisions of the House of Commons in which the Government is concerned; but I should be very sorry if it were a uniform rule to take to task Members who were not present at any division, as I am afraid very severe censure would frequently be bestowed upon me.

MR. MAC IVER: I am informed that the Secretary to the Admiralty was one of the absentees.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: I am afraid the hon. Gentleman has been misinformed, so far as I am concerned.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. MACFARLANE inquired of the Prime Minister, Whether the second reading of the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill would be taken after Progress had been reported on the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that it would be taken after Committee on the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill and on the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill.

PARLIAMENT—RULES OF DEBATE— AMENDMENTS—PRECEDENCE IN COMMITTEE.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Speaker, Whether any particular precedence attached to Members of the Government in placing Amendments on the Notice Paper; and whether if, after a private Member had placed on the Paper Notice of an Amendment in Committee, a Member of the Government put the same Amendment in different words, he was entitled to precedence?

MR. SPEAKER: Supposing two Amendments substantially the same are brought to the Table—one in the hands of the Member in charge of the Bill, and the other in the hands of another Member—precedence is given to the Amendment of the Member who has charge of the Bill.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:O:—

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 2nd June.]

[FOURTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Clause 1 (Special Commission Court).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 29, after the word "warrant," insert the words "and which shall be situated in the county or county of a city, as the case may be, in which the offence was committed."
—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MARUM said, that, before entering upon a discussion of the Amendment, he thought the discussion itself might be curtailed, or its necessity done away with altogether, if he were allowed to address a few observations to the Home Secretary. The question raised by the Amendment had reference to a change of venue; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, in another part of the clause, proposed to move a Proviso—

"That nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, unless a judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."

This Amendment was certainly more in harmony with the views he (Mr. Marum) entertained, and was much better than the Bill as it now stood. The Amendment which he had proposed restricted the trial of an offender to the county or city in which the offence was committed, and if the Amendment of the Home Secretary were accepted in substitution, he should propose to add, after the first word "offence" in the Home Secretary's Amendment, further words to effect the object he had in view. The Proviso would then read—

"Nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, in the county or county of a city as the case may be, in which the offence was committed, unless a judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."

He thought it would be a much better place for inserting his Amendment than the place at present selected, and he hoped the Home Secretary would be able to adopt it. It would enable the Special Commission to try an offender at any place at which he could now be tried by an ordinary Commission or by the ordinary law. The Amendment of the Home Secretary would enable the Special Commission to try any person who was at present triable in the ordinary course of law by an Irish Judge and jury; and the addition he proposed to add would simply restrict the venue to the locality in which the offence would now be tried under the ordinary law. He wished to point out to the Home Secretary, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman saw his way to the adoption of the principle he (Mr. Marum) advocated—namely, that there should be a locality in the venue—that this would be the best mode of carrying it out; and he should, in that case, feel disposed to withdraw the present Amendment, and wait until the one of which Notice had been given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was brought forward. When it did come on, he would move the addition of these words. He thought it would be very hard upon poor persons that their witnesses should be required to travel some 200 or 300 miles to give evidence in their behalf.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member that it would be more convenient to discuss this proposal when his own Amendment came before the Committee; but he was afraid that it would only mislead the hon. Member if he were to hold out any hope that he should be prepared to accept the proposal. As he had explained on Friday, the object of his Amendment was altogether a different one. It was suggested that it was not made sufficiently clear in the clause that the jurisdiction of the Special Commission was only to be such jurisdiction as could now be exercised by a Judge and jury in Ireland. That having always been the intention of the Government, they desired to make the matter perfectly clear, and he proposed to introduce the Proviso of which he had given Notice at the end of the clause. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) wished to go further, and to say that the principle of localizing the trial should be enforced in this particular case. He would venture to point out to the hon. Member that the whole reason why the Government proposed to create a special tribunal at all equally militated against the adoption universally of any principle in regard to the locality of the crime. It might happen that at the place where the crime was committed they would not be likely or able to secure a fair and impartial trial because the district might be in a disturbed state, and popular feeling and prejudice might deter witnesses from coming forward to give evidence on the part of the Crown. Witnesses residing in the district might be under influences that would make them afraid to give evidence. He did not mean to assert that in all cases that would be so; but it might be in many, and the Government were bound to make adequate provision to prevent witnesses from being intimidated. Of course, the Government would have no inducement to change the venue unless there were special reasons which rendered such a course necessary. The power would only be exercised in cases in which it was felt that it was impossible to obtain a fair and impartial trial in a particular county or in a particular district, and in such a case the Judges would have power to sit elsewhere. He certainly should not like in this Bill to exclude the possibility of that course being taken, and adequate provision would always be made to prevent injustice being done to the accused person.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to put a question, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would give him his attention. In the case of a warrant being issued, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman give a pledge that it should not be issued for the trial of prisoners until the Crown were quite ready to proceed with the trials? This was a matter which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was fully capable of appreciating. Either the Attorney General for Ireland, or whoever was responsible for the trial, would know whether the Government were ready to proceed with it. This was no sentimental grievance; but already the Government had acted in the worst possible manner in regard to these political prosecutions. Only at the last Winter Assizes at Cork the Government brought up some 60 persons for trial; and after keeping them in Cork Gaol, with their witnesses, to the number of 300, hanging about the purlieus of the gaol for many days, they decided upon postponing the trials. It was all very well for the Home Secretary to say that the expenses of the witnesses in such a case were paid by the Government. That was no answer to the complaint, because it was well known that the Crown never paid the absolute expenses to which a witness was put. He had said that 300 witnesses were brought up at the last Winter Assizes to give evidence in regard to certain alleged movements in the county of Cork; but he found that the number was nearer 400 than 300. He held in his hand a statement to that effect, drawn up by the solicitor for the defence, who was further prepared to prove that the evidence against the prisoners had been got up by a common informer, who had himself committed both perjury and wilful murder. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman give a guarantee that he would not allow words to be inserted in the Bill which would prevent a similar occurrence in future, and provide that the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant should not be issued until the Crown were ready to go to trial?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, it would be impossible to do to that, for this reason. A case might be perfectly ready for trial, and yet the Crown might be unable to proceed with it in the absence of a material witness through illness. But no trial would be postponed by the special tribunal except upon affidavit that from some adequate cause it could not take place. In a case of that kind it would be for the Judges to decide whether the trial was to be postponed, and the three Judges would have to be satisfied on affidavit that the application for a postponement was a reasonable one, and that it was absolutely essential for the interests of justice that the trial should not be proceeded with. The absence through illness of a material witness for the defence would be as good

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—:0:—

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 167.]*(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)*COMMITTEE. [Progress 2nd June.]

[FOURTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Clause 1 (Special Commission Court).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 29, after the word "warrant," insert the words "and which shall be situated in the county or county of a city, as the case may be, in which the offence was committed."
—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. MARUM said, that, before entering upon a discussion of the Amendment, he thought the discussion itself might be curtailed, or its necessity done away with altogether, if he were allowed to address a few observations to the Home Secretary. The question raised by the Amendment had reference to a change of venue; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, in another part of the clause, proposed to move a Proviso—

"That nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, unless a judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."

This Amendment was certainly more in harmony with the views he (Mr. Marum) entertained, and was much better than the Bill as it now stood. The Amendment which he had proposed restricted the trial of an offender to the county or city in which the offence was committed, and if the Amendment of the Home Secretary were accepted in substitution, he should propose to add, after the first word "offence" in the Home Secretary's Amendment, further words to effect the object he had in view. The Proviso would then read—

"Nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, in the county or county of a city as the case may be, in which the offence was committed, unless a judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."

He thought it would be a much better place for inserting his Amendment than the place at present selected, and he hoped the Home Secretary would be able to adopt it. It would enable the Special Commission to try an offender at any place at which he could now be tried by an ordinary Commission or by the ordinary law. The Amendment of the Home Secretary would enable the Special Commission to try any person who was at present triable in the ordinary course of law by an Irish Judge and jury; and the addition he proposed to add would simply restrict the venue to the locality in which the offence would now be tried under the ordinary law. He wished to point out to the Home Secretary, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman saw his way to the adoption of the principle he (Mr. Marum) advocated—namely, that there should be a locality in the venue—that this would be the best mode of carrying it out; and he should, in that case, feel disposed to withdraw the present Amendment, and wait until the one of which Notice had been given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was brought forward. When it did come on, he would move the addition of these words. He thought it would be very hard upon poor persons that their witnesses should be required to travel some 200 or 300 miles to give evidence in their behalf.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member that it would be more convenient to discuss this proposal when his own Amendment came before the Committee; but he was afraid that it would only mislead the hon. Member if he were to hold out any hope that he should be prepared to accept the proposal. As he had explained on Friday, the object of his Amendment was altogether a different one. It was suggested that it was not made sufficiently clear in the clause that the jurisdiction of the Special Commission was only to be such jurisdiction as could now be exercised by a Judge and jury in Ireland. That having always been the intention of the Government, they desired to make the matter proposed. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary refused to give in upon so very small a matter, he could not see what hope there was for hon. Members who sought to amend the Bill in more important particulars. The course now taken certainly presaged very badly for any material alteration of the Bill, seeing that the Home Secretary refused to give way on so small a point. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the experience which was gained in reference to the Winter Assizes Act at the last Munster Winter Assizes; and, indeed, at all of the Winter Assizes in Ireland. In doing so, he wished to state his own opinion, that last winter that Act was grossly abused by the Crown Prosecutor. It was used for purposes for which it was never intended. It was originally intended to be a merciful Act—an Act for a general gaol delivery. The Act itself was passed by Sir Colman O'Loughlen—a lawyer of considerable experience, and a most humane man—who brought it in for the purpose of preventing the unnecessary detention of prisoners in gaol for an indefinite period. But the Act had been used by the Crown in Ireland, not for a gaol delivery, but for the purpose of getting rid of bail cases; and particularly for the purpose of bringing about a change of venue. That power they now sought to deprive the Government of in reference to this Bill. What took place at the Munster Assizes? Scores of persons were brought into Cork from all parts of Munster. They were detained in Cork Gaol for weeks and for months, away from their friends; and they were, consequently, deprived of the merciful provisions of the 13th section of the Prisons Act of 1877, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would very well recollect. Prisoners awaiting trial were to be treated differently from convicted prisoners, and were to be allowed to feed themselves. But one of the consequences of the working of this Winter Assizes Act was that these persons were taken away to a distance from their homes, and from their friends; and, therefore, it became impossible to feed them, and they were compelled to live upon prison fare. And not only that, but all the witnesses who were necessary for the defence were left for weeks in the city of Cork without any support from the Crown. These people—these poor, humble witnesses—were obliged to pay their own fare from different portions of the Province of Munster. They were not only obliged to do that, but they were also obliged to pay for their own sustenance when they arrived in Cork; and they were not even informed by the Crown at what period, or at what approximate period, it was likely their case would be brought on. Some 400 witnesses were kept in the city of Cork previous to Christmas, day after day and week after week, at their own expense, without the Crown being willing to grant them one farthing. In point of fact, the Crown absolutely refused to grant them 1s. towards their support. Nothing whatever was paid by the Crown until Christmas. The state of affairs then became too hot for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Mallow (Mr. W. M. Johnson). They had been kept there without any sustenance from the Crown, and the Crown Solicitor then sent to tell them they would not be wanted, although he had previously been repeatedly applied to to know whether the case in which they were interested would be brought on before or after Christmas. The consequence was that many of these poor people, having waited in Cork up to Christmas, were then obliged, on the adjournment of the Assizes, to go home, many of them to a distance of 50 or 100 miles, at their own expense; and to return again, at their own expense, to the adjourned Assizes after Christmas. He knew, also, that many of the witnesses were contemplating going into the workhouse and applying to the Union for relief, because they had been refused support from the Crown. Now, if this portion of the Act, and this power with regard to changes of venue, were to be worked in the same way as the Winter Assizes Act was worked, all he could say was that it would inflict the grossest cruelty and hardship upon persons who might be tried before this tribunal, and their witnesses. He could not imagine why the Government should seek to retain this power in the Bill. It was not likely they would ever find it necessary to use it. Why should they retain a power which could only be used for the purpose of inflicting injustice upon untried prisoners—men who were innocent in the eyes of the law—and make it difficult for such prisoners to make proper arrangements for their defence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that, in reference to the last Winter Assizes at Cork, he could not understand how the facts could be as they were stated by the hon. Member. There was no reason why they should have been so. Any witness there could at once have applied to the Judge, and, upon convincing the Judge that he was a necessary witness in the case, and that he intended to give evidence on behalf of the prisoner, the Judge would have directed the Crown Solicitor, on the spot, to advance him his necessary expenses. He had known the Crown Solicitor who was concerned in the case all his life, and was able to say that he was a most competent and able, as well as humane man; and he (the Attorney General for Ireland) was sure that if there had been any miscarriage, and the smallest representation had been made to the Executive Government or to himself, instant redress would have been afforded. Therefore, if the facts of the case were as they had been stated by the hon. Member, it was the fault of the persons themselves who had submitted to very harsh treatment which they ought not to have undergone at all. What the hon. Member asked the Committee now was to force the Government to abandon a portion of the law that was essential to the administration of criminal jurisprudence. Generally speaking, persons were tried at the place where the offence was committed. There were very good reasons for that, because all the persons connected with the case were upon the spot. Nevertheless, cases might arise where it was impossible that that could be done. Accordingly, the law provided—and in this respect there was no distinction between the administration of the law in England and Ireland—that where it became necessary, what was technically called the venue—that was to say, the place of trial—should be changed. There was express power in the Courts, both in England and Ireland, to change the venue upon a sufficient case being made out for it upon affidavit. It was done frequently, and with that object he had at this moment directed a case to be removed from the county of Kerry to the Court of Queen's Bench. In that case if the venue was changed express provision would be made, not by an order of the Judge, but in the ordinary administration of the law for the payment of the expenses of every witness who might be necessary for the defence of the prisoners, who were unable to bring up their own witnesses, whether the prisoners were convicted or not. There was, therefore, not the slightest necessity for making any change in the Bill in regard to the payment of the expenses of any witnesses who were necessary to establish the defence of a prisoner. Of course, he took it for granted that the general law would be followed in all these cases. As far as possible the cases would be tried where the offences were committed; but if local circumstances existed which rendered that inadvisable, if, for instance, the state of the country was such that terrorism could be exercised, and they could not expect persons to come forward to give evidence under personal apprehension, it would be necessary to try the case elsewhere, and that could not be done without changing the venue. But in all such cases provision would be made to indemnify the witnesses for any additional expense entailed upon them by the change of venue.

MR. PARNELL remarked, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had entirely begged the question. No objection was raised to the ordinary law as it stood. The ordinary law required an affidavit to be made before the Judge, before whom the case was sent for trial; but in this case it was left entirely to the Lord Lieutenant to decide whether the Commission should be issued, in the first instance, in the locality or county to which the prisoner belonged, or whether it should be issued in some entirely different county. Now, that was altogether a different case. Let the Commission be issued, and if there were any prisoners to be tried by the Commission, then let the application be made in the ordinary way, and if it were considered a fair application the Judges themselves would change the venue. But here the Government sought to do an entirely different thing. They asked that power should be given to the Lord Lieutenant to direct that a Commission should be issued wherever His Excellency pleased for the trial of a prisoner, no matter what part of the country he belonged to; and it was only natural to suppose that the Lord Lieutenant would be very much guided by the convenience of the official class of Ireland who were to take part in the trial. He could well understand, in the case of a Commission being issued for the county of Mayo, that the Lord Lieutenant might consider it more convenient for the officers connected with the law to hold the Commission nearer Dublin, in the absence of any good hotel in Mayo, and the general discomfort which would unfortunately exist in that poverty-stricken county. It was only natural that everybody connected with the administration of the law should desire that they should not be taken down to Westport or Castlebar for the purpose of sitting upon a Commission for the trial of these offences. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would leave it, as he stated just now, to the Judges themselves assembled on the Commission to decide whether the venue in particular cases should be changed or not, he (Mr. Parnell) would have no objection in the world; but he did object to give this summary power to an official class in the Dublin Office of the Lord Lieutenant, believing that it was a power that was liable to the most extreme abuse. If the power were given at all, it was a power that certainly would be abused; and he could foresee the immense hardship that would be inflicted upon a large number of poor and humble persons, who might not be in a position to advance the expenses that would be necessary for their witnesses. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had not ventured to say that the money would be advanced beforehand. On the contrary, he said that a case would have to be made out to the satisfaction of the Judges that all these persons were necessary as witnesses. But all the expenditure would have to be incurred in the first instance; and in what position would a poor person be to defray it? What he contended for in this case was that the decision in regard to the change of venue should be practically in the hands of the Judge, and not left to the arbitrary will of the Lord Lieutenant.

Mr. Parnell

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he quite agreed that when a case was removed for trial from the county in which it occurred, it should only be upon a direct application to the Judges, upon a sworn affidavit, that the removal was necessary in the interests of justice. There might be cases in which the state of circumstances was such that it was absolutely necessary to leave a discretion somewhere, in order to insure a fair and impartial trial. He was bound to say that two voices were heard from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House. It was said in the first instance, that there was too much power given to the Judges; but now an Amendment was proposed that it should be altogether left to the Judges to say whether or not there should be a change of venue. The view taken by the Government in the matter was exactly that which induced them to oppose the Amendment, which proposed to give to the Judges the power of deciding whether or not a warrant for a Commission should issue at all. The reason why the Government opposed that Amendment was that a knowledge of the state of the country was necessary, and must be in the mind and breast of the Executive; and the Executive must be held responsible for acting properly upon that knowledge. If they transferred that responsibility to the Judges, they would defeat the control and responsibility of Parliament, which hon. Members opposite alleged to be so very desirable. They could make the Lord Lieutenant responsible; but they could only make the Judges responsible by addressing both Houses of Parliament to receive them. Therefore, if they wanted responsibility for the exercise of this extraordinary power, they must keep it with the Executive, and not transfer it to the Judges, because otherwise they would lose all control over it. The same reason that induced the Government to refuse the Amendment upon the question of the issue of the warrant equally induced them to refuse this Amendment because the same statement of facts which justified the issue of a warrant for a Special Commission would justify the removal of a trial from a disturbed district, where the witnesses were not likely to give their evidence without fear of personal consequences. That was a fact which must depend upon the knowledge possessed by the Executive of the state of the district; and it must naturally rest with the Lord Lieutenant, who would be responsible. He could not believe that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) seriously ground for postponing the trial as the absence of a witness for the prosecution.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would probably recollect the case of the 60 men referred to at Cork, and the 300 witnesses there. In that instance all that the counsel for the Crown said was that they were not ready to go on with the case. He certainly thought that was not a sufficient answer. If, as a general rule, an affidavit was required in order to obtain the postponement of a trial, he presumed that the Government would have no objection to agree to an Amendment to the effect that no trial should be postponed of any man mentioned in the warrant unless upon a sworn affidavit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that was the regular practice now. He thought the hon. Member was under a misapprehension in reference to the case at Cork. His recollection was that the postponement was made on affidavit, stating facts which showed that in the interests of justice the trial ought to be postponed.

MR. HEALY asked who made the affidavit?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was unable to recollect; but what fixed the matter in his mind was, that there was one indictment which included all the cases, and thus one affidavit was made applicable to the whole of the cases. Otherwise it would have required as many affidavits as there were prisoners for trial.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have any objection to put that in the Bill, and provide that where a warrant was issued for the trial of any prisoner there should be no postponement on the mere ipse dixit of the Crown Prosecutor?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not think that the case the hon. Member wished to guard against could possibly take place. There must be an affidavit, and the Judge must be satisfied that in the interests of justice the trial could not take place.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, there was another point of some importance. Was the warrant issued by the Lord Lieutenant to supersede the warrant of general gaol delivery? Suppose that a person was in custody, and the Judge came round on a general gaol delivery, would he not be authorized to try that person, or could the trial be held over for an indefinite period? He should like to have that matter made clear, because any person in custody charged with an offence, at general Common Law, had a right to be tried at a general gaol delivery.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was able to answer the question the other way. The General Gaol Delivery Commission would not supersede the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant for a Special Commission.

MR. PARNELL asked what rule the Government proposed to adopt in such a case in reference to the payment of witnesses? Would the same rules with regard to the payment of the expenses of witnesses be adopted as those which were adopted in the case of an ordinary Winter Assize?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) replied in the affirmative. He believed that the intention was that the principles of the rules in regard to a Special Commission should be those applicable to the case of a Winter Assize. Where the witnesses were brought out of their own county for the purpose of trial, it would be necessary that the expenses of the witnesses both for the prosecution and the defence should be paid.

MR. PARNELL said, he wished to draw the attention of the Committee to the manner in which the rules had worked in the case of the last Winter Assizes at Cork, and the Committee would then be able to judge what it was they were now asked to sanction. Under this clause the Bill gave power to try persons for certain offences in an exceptional manner. The poor people who might be accused were either innocent, or they were not. Of course, the law presumed that every man was innocent until he was proved guilty. These poor people might be taken out of their own county, and, with their witnesses, compelled to attend in some distant part of Ireland; and what was now asked was that that course should not be taken, but that they should be tried in their own county. He was surprised that the Government did not agree to the very reasonable Amendment which had been proposed. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary refused to give in upon so very small a matter, he could not see what hope there was for hon. Members who sought to amend the Bill in more important particulars. The course now taken certainly presaged very badly for any material alteration of the Bill, seeing that the Home Secretary refused to give way on so small a point. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to the experience which was gained in reference to the Winter Assizes Act at the last Munster Winter Assizes; and, indeed, at all of the Winter Assizes in Ireland. In doing so, he wished to state his own opinion, that last winter that Act was grossly abused by the Crown Prosecutor. It was used for purposes for which it was never intended. It was originally intended to be a merciful Act—an Act for a general gaol delivery. The Act itself was passed by Sir Colman O'Loughlen—a lawyer of considerable experience, and a most humane man—who brought it in for the purpose of preventing the unnecessary detention of prisoners in gaol for an indefinite period. But the Act had been used by the Crown in Ireland, not for a gaol delivery, but for the purpose of getting rid of bail cases; and particularly for the purpose of bringing about a change of venue. That power they now sought to deprive the Government of in reference to this Bill. What took place at the Munster Assizes? Scores of persons were brought into Cork from all parts of Munster. They were detained in Cork Gaol for weeks and for months, away from their friends; and they were, consequently, deprived of the merciful provisions of the 13th section of the Prisons Act of 1877, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would very well recollect. Prisoners awaiting trial were to be treated differently from convicted prisoners, and were to be allowed to feed themselves. But one of the consequences of the working of this Winter Assizes Act was that these persons were taken away to a distance from their homes, and from their friends; and, therefore, it became impossible to feed them, and they were compelled to live upon prison fare. And not only that, but all the witnesses who were necessary for the defence were left for weeks in the city of Cork without any support from the Crown. These people—these poor, humble witnesses—were obliged to pay their own fare from different portions of the Province of Munster. They were not only obliged to do that, but they were also obliged to pay for their own sustenance when they arrived in Cork; and they were not even informed by the Crown at what period, or at what approximate period, it was likely their case would be brought on. Some 400 witnesses were kept in the city of Cork previous to Christmas, day after day and week after week, at their own expense, without the Crown being willing to grant them one farthing. In point of fact, the Crown absolutely refused to grant them 1s. towards their support. Nothing whatever was paid by the Crown until Christmas. The state of affairs then became too hot for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Mallow (Mr. W. M. Johnson). They had been kept there without any sustenance from the Crown, and the Crown Solicitor then sent to tell them they would not be wanted, although he had previously been repeatedly applied to to know whether the case in which they were interested would be brought on before or after Christmas. The consequence was that many of these poor people, having waited in Cork up to Christmas, were then obliged, on the adjournment of the Assizes, to go home, many of them to a distance of 50 or 100 miles, at their own expense; and to return again, at their own expense, to the adjourned Assizes after Christmas. He knew, also, that many of the witnesses were contemplating going into the workhouse and applying to the Union for relief, because they had been refused support from the Crown. Now, if this portion of the Act, and this power with regard to changes of venue, were to be worked in the same way as the Winter Assizes Act was worked, all he could say was that it would inflict the grossest cruelty and hardship upon persons who might be tried before this tribunal, and their witnesses. He could not imagine why the Government should seek to retain this power in the Bill. It was not likely they would ever find it necessary to use it. Why should they retain a power which could only be used for the purpose of inflicting injustice upon untried prisoners—men who were innocent in the eyes of the law—and thought that the Lord Lieutenant, or anybody connected with him, would exercise this power for the purpose of inflicting injury upon a prisoner. The power itself was only likely to be exercised in very rare cases, where it was considered impossible to get a fair trial in the district in which the offence was committed. It would be perfectly understood that a case might arise in which it would be dangerous for a witness to go into Court at all, owing to a number of people outside intimidating him. In such a case it was only proper that the trial should be withdrawn to a place where it could be conducted fairly and impartially, and efficient protection given to every witness. He trusted that the hon. Member opposite would be content with the security that the Government would not be likely to remove a trial, and incur considerable additional cost, unless it was absolutely necessary, and unless there was a real and substantial fear that injustice might otherwise be done.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. SYNAN said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had misapprehended the objection which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had raised. The objection of the hon. Member was not to the Judges, nor to the decision of the Lord Lieutenant; but it was founded upon this—that in the case of an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, or to any Judge, to remove the venue from one place to another, it was done according to the ordinary law in open Court in the face of the public with due notice to the parties concerned, and with notice to the person who was to be put upon his trial. If the same opportunity were given to a man who might be put upon his trial under this Special Commission, and to all the parties concerned, to approach the Lord Lieutenant and express their views upon the application, then the case would stand upon the same level; but it was impossible to approach the Lord Lieutenant. It was impossible for a prisoner, or his witnesses, or the public to approach the Lord Lieutenant; and the change of venue under this Bill would be carried out in secret and in private. Nobody would know anything about it, and the venue would be removed away from the place where the trial ought to take place, without the knowledge of any of the parties concerned. That was the ground of the objection, and it had not been removed by the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland.

MR. O'KELLY said, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland ought to explain how the prisoners were to obtain the first cost of bringing up their witnesses. Take, for instance, the case of a prisoner removed from the county which he represented (Roscommon) to Dublin. If he were a poor man, how was he to obtain the means of bringing up his witnesses, or to show the Court that they were necessary for his defence? Where was the money to come from? What machinery were they going to provide in order to enable a prisoner to obtain the money necessary to defray the first cost of his defence? It was perfectly idle to tell an unfortunate man, placed in such a position, that if he brought up his witnesses and then satisfied the Judges that such witnesses were necessary for his defence, he would obtain the money for the payment of their expenses. It would be utterly impossible for a man to bring up the witnesses in the first instance. There was another point upon which he wanted information—namely, at what intervals were these Commissions to be issued? The Committee were told they were to supersede the general gaol delivery; but he wanted to have some information as to the time a man might be in prison awaiting trial under this Commission. There was another point upon which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had based the necessity for this change of venue—namely, the intimidation of witnesses. He looked upon that ground as simply absurd, because everybody knew that if a witness was to be intimidated in a district, he would be intimidated before the trial, and not at the moment it was going into Court. Witnesses were intimidated before they went into Court, or they were subjected to violence afterwards; and the change of venue would be no protection at all, whereas the removal of the trial would be a very great hardship in the case of a poor man. It would be absolutely impossible for a poor man to bring up the witnesses that might be necessary, and who might be essential to establish his innocence. It must not be forgotten that in serious cases under this Bill a man might be put upon trial for his life; it was, therefore, desirable that some explanation should be given upon these points. How had they been met? They had not been met except by statements which anybody who knew anything about Ireland knew to be wild and sensational assertions as to the intimidation of witnesses. As he had already pointed out, if witnesses were to be intimidated at all they would be intimidated before they went to the trial, and they would be as much afraid to give their evidence in Cork as in Tipperary. The question was, how were the Government going to protect the witnesses after they brought them back from the trial? He thought that was a most important point, and it had nothing whatever to do with the change of venue. He hoped the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would be able to answer the question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not quite understand what the question was.

MR. O'KELLY said, he wished to know how the change of venue was to afford protection in the case of intimidation? The Crown objected to a trial taking place in a particular district, and proposed to change the venue; but his point was, that the intimidation would take place within the district before the trial, or it would assume the shape of an act of vengeance after the witness returned to his home.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that, on the first point put by the hon. Member, it was only reasonable, where a poor prisoner was tried out of his own county, that he should have his witnesses brought up for his defence. It was not a novel case, but it was a case that frequently occurred; and anybody who knew anything about Ireland would know that, over and over again, the expenses of witnesses were provided for. The witnesses could be brought up by the Crown Solicitor, and no Judge would proceed to try a prisoner without the witnesses he declared to be necessary to establish his innocence being in attendance. It had been stated that a general gaol delivery would not supersede a warrant under this Bill. The Home Secretary, however, would take care that a period of limitation in regard to the trials should be fixed, so that no prisoners should be kept in prison for long periods under colour of the Act; but limited periods would be fixed for appointing the Commission Courts. As to what the hon. Member had said about intimidation of witnesses, every care would be taken to give protection to witnesses who gave evidence at the trials.

MR. SHAW said, he merely rose to express his regret that the Government had not seen their way to yield to this Amendment. He thought that in a Bill of this kind, which effected so great a change in the present system of Criminal Law, the object of the Government should be to endeavour, as far as possible, to make it run on the lines of the existing law, and in as few cases as possible to remove it from the known and acknowledged rules of law. An application for a change of venue to one of the Courts of Dublin was a very different case to the proposition here made to leave it to the determination of the Lord Lieutenant. If the ordinary law was to be systematically set on one side, the people generally would not place any great amount of confidence in the new tribunal; and, therefore, it would be a wise thing, even for the sake of the Lord Lieutenant himself, that any change of this kind should be based on reasons stated openly, and for which a good account could be given. He apprehended that the question of removing a trial would be very rarely raised. In most cases the trial would be held in the counties or places where the crimes had been committed. It would be unwise, except in very special cases, where there was unmistakably such an amount of disturbance as to prevent an impartial trial from being had, to change the venue at all. He presumed that one of the great objects of the Government was to give force and effect to the Bill. The result of a trial in the locality would be felt and known all round; whereas, if it were removed, say, 100 or 150 miles away, the people living in the locality where the crime was committed would, practically speaking, know scarcely anything of it, and would have the impression that the trial had been carried on almost in secret, as far as they were concerned. He thought the Government would do well to reconsider their objections to the Amendment, and consent to accept it, as it was certainly in the direction of the present Criminal Law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) contended that the provision of the Bill as to change of venue followed the precedent laid down for England by the Winter Assize Act. The practice in this country was to group certain counties together. A prisoner in Herefordshire was now liable to have his trial removed to Staffordshire without any application in open Court at all; it was done solely by the order of the Executive Government in Council, and it was done in order that there should be no waste of judicial strength. He quite admitted that in some cases it involved hardship upon the prisoner; but that hardship was mitigated as far as possible, and every effort was made to mitigate it. The attention of the House had been called to the matter on several occasions, and every effort had been made to proceed fairly, and to avoid inflicting injustice. No doubt, there might be some inconvenience in certain cases to prisoners by the grouping which took place; but it was considered necessary to follow that course for the sake of general convenience. Indeed, it was not only a matter of convenience, but of necessity, and hon. Members opposite evidently accepted that view, because they only asked that under certain conditions the removal should not take place. The proposal contained in the clause was merely to apply to Irish prisoners exactly the same course of procedure in principle that existed in this country.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had not stated that this power of grouping, to which he referred, applied only to the Winter Assize. He had not made that admission. The present argument of the Government was a most extraordinary one. The Home Secretary complained that hon. Gentlemen in that part of the House were speaking with two voices; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself, and the Members of the Government, were speaking not with two, but with 20 voices. In point of fact, they changed their voice every hour. They were basing their argument now on the intimidation of witnesses; but was not a witness as likely to be intimidated before the case went to the Assizes as he was when he got there? The real point of the Crown was this—they desired to treat a witness as a squeezed orange—to get all the evidence out of him they could, then take him back to his home, if he was willing to go, and leave him to be shot. All they wanted was to bring him up so as to extract his evidence; and having taken him to Dublin, and chambered him with the officials in Dublin Castle, they would send him back again to be at the mercy of a local mob. That was what the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary amounted to. But, going back again to the question of the expenses of witnesses, he believed the matter would turn very largely upon that point. If the Government would give a distinct assurance as to the payment of the expenses of witnesses, and an emphatic pledge that a full opportunity would be afforded to everyone of knowing when the trial would actually be brought on, he believed his hon. Friend would be satisfied. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had stated that no practical hardship occurred at the last Winter Assize. At the previous Winter Assize, he (Mr. Healy) happened to be on trial himself, and he saw many persons who were in attendance as witnesses reduced to the extreme depth of destitution, and in danger of starving in the streets. He had been instrumental, personally, in raising a small subscription among his friends to keep them from starvation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told the Committee that if a witness made an application to the Judge who presided at the Assize it would be promptly attended to. Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman remember that in one case—the case of Sub-Constable Walsh and the Millstreet riots, it took one witness four months, after bringing all the machinery to bear, to obtain the sum of £1? As a matter of fact, he believed that the man's expenses had not been paid yet, but that he had been threatened with a prosecution by the Crown for perjury. He should like to see the face of Judge Fitzgerald if an application of this sort were made to him at any trial over which he presided. Judge Fitzgerald would at once scout such an application out of Court, and tell the man who made it not to take up his time with such an idle matter. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland spoke of the Crown Solicitor as an amiable, well-meaning gentleman, always ready to listen to any application that was made to him. That might be so; but everybody knew how witnesses were treated in Ireland. No matter what representation they made, and however urgent the case might be, they were invariably put off from day to day, and from week to week. He thought that the trials of prisoners should be taken in alphabetical order, so that witnesses might know when they were likely to be required.

Mr. Shaw

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought he saw what it was that hon. Members opposite desired, and he would be willing to consider the subject, and to undertake that a clause should be brought up to provide that the trials should be brought on in such a manner as to prevent the necessity for witnesses hanging about the Court. He would also consider whether or not he could insert a provision that in the case of poor prisoners their witnesses should not be kept away owing to the want of means to bring them to the place of trial. If their attendance was required, he thought they ought to be provided with money to enable them to attend where a prisoner had been removed to a distance from the place in which the offence was committed. He hoped that such an undertaking would satisfy the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He did not pledge himself to the exact words of any provision to carry out these objects; but he would certainly bring up a clause having both of these objects in view—namely, to secure, as far as possible, that witnesses should not be kept waiting for an indefinite period, and that the Law Officers should have power to advance money to defray the expenses of witnesses who were considered necessary for the defence.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was a very fair one, and he was quite ready to accept it. If there had hitherto been any provision to secure the payment of the expenses of witnesses required for the defence of a prisoner, it had certainly not been carried out; and it was only from the personal knowledge they possessed of the real facts of the case that the Irish Members had felt it their duty to press the matter strongly upon the attention of the Government. He hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would put his clauses upon the Paper a few days before they would come on for discussion.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Certainly.

MR. O'KELLY trusted the right hon. and learned Gentleman would attend to the point which he (Mr. O'Kelly) had raised, and which was a most important one—namely, that whenever it was necessary, the witnesses for the defence should receive money beforehand to enable them to proceed to the place where the trial was to take place.

MR. M'COAN asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he would carry his concession one stage further, and provide that the change of venue permitted under circumstances by the Bill should be somewhat analogous to the grouping of counties in connection with the Winter Assizes in England? To remove a trial from Cork to the county of Antrim—and that was not an extreme case—might be the means of imposing great hardship upon an innocent man; and if there was to be a change of venue, it was desirable that the removal should only be to some place within a reasonable distance. By that means not only would the ends of justice be fully answered, but less inconvenience to all parties concerned would be occasioned. In addition, the Government would only be following the analogy of the English practice in regard to the Winter Assizes.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was afraid he could not undertake to limit the power in every particular case; but he thought no real hardship would result, even if a trial were removed two or three counties off, provided that all the expenses were paid. It would be quite immaterial to a witness whether he had to go to a distance of 12 miles or 50 miles, so long as his expenses were provided for.

MR. MARUM said, that with the consent of the Committee he would withdraw the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. WARTON said, that before it was withdrawn he should like to ask if the matter could not be easily arranged by a clause similar to the 30th section of Russell Gurney's Act, which made provision for the payment of the expenses of witnesses in the case of prisoners committed for trial. If the matter were only mentioned at the time a prisoner was committed for trial, the Crown Solicitor would be invested with authority to pay them.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MARUM said, the next Amendment was a consequential one, and, after the decision arrived at, could not be moved.

MR. P. MARTIN had an Amendment on the Paper, in line 32, after the word "appertains," to insert—

"And every such warrant shall specify and set forth the offence or offences respectively charged, with particulars of time and place."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he wished to point out to the hon. Member that if this Amendment were carried, it would prevent the Amendment, which stood lower down, in the name of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum), from being put. He did not know whether the hon. Member had observed that.

MR. WARTON said, he had an Amendment to move before the Amendment of the hon. Member was reached. He wished to move the omission of the words "the charge," in order to substitute the words "any charges." It was quite clear that there might be more persons than one for trial, and it was also clear that against each person there might also be more charges than one. Some such Amendment as this was therefore necessary. The clause, as it stood, empowered the Special Commission Court to sit at the place named in the warrant, and there, without a jury, hear and determine, according to law, "the charge" made against the person committed for trial and named in the warrant, and of doing therein what to justice appertained. His proposal would empower the Court to try "any charges" that might be preferred against any person committed for trial; and he believed that the Amendment was not only necessary, but that it would be a satisfactory one. It was not clear to his mind that it would be sufficient to try a prisoner on a single charge, or even a single prisoner. There might have been two or more engaged in the commission of the same offence, and there might be more than one charge made against the same person in connection with it. He would therefore submit the Amendment to the Committee.

Mr. Warton

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 30, to leave out the words "the charge," and insert the words "any charges."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the charge' stand part of the Clause."

MR. PARNELL said, that there was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons), which would come before that of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), and which, in the absence of the hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Parnell) wished to move. The Amendment raised a very important question, and he hoped he would have an opportunity of bringing it before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) is too late. The Question now before the Committee is that the words "the charge" stand part of the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. and learned Member for Bridport proposed to substitute the plural for the singular. The hon. and learned Member ought to be aware that in all Acts of Parliament the singular included the plural.

MR. WARTON said, he was perfectly aware that that was so under Brougham's Act; but he thought it would be better in this case to insert the plural, so as to prevent the possibility of any mistake.

MR. HEALY wished to ask a question on a point of Order. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) applied to line 30 of the clause; but the Amendment which his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) desired to move, and which he (Mr. Healy) thought he was entitled to move, applied to the previous line. He had certainly not heard the name of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) called by the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did call upon the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons), but he did not respond. The next Amendment upon the Paper was a consequential one, in the name of the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Webster), and I did not call that; but I proceeded to call upon the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), who had handed in an Amendment which was not upon the Paper. The Amendment proposed to be moved by the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), therefore, cannot be put now.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, he should like to know, in reference to the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), whether it was the deliberate intention of the Government to confine the charges against a prisoner to those contained in the warrant? A case might occur in which a person was charged with a particular offence, and committed for trial for that offence. After his committal another charge might be made against him which was not made against him before the magistrate at the time he was committed. It was therefore a subject well worthy of the attention of the Government, whether or not they were determined to shut the door against any charge being made against a prisoner on being brought up for trial except the one which was mentioned in the warrant. It certainly seemed to him that the clause should be so framed as to allow charges of a similar nature to be brought forward at the trial, which might not be known at the time the prisoner was committed. For instance, a case of this description might occur. A man might be committed for trial on a charge of attempt to murder; but it might happen that after the committal, and before the trial, the victim actually died. But murder would not be the charge upon which the prisoner had been committed for trial. The charge against him was only one of attempt to murder, and he must be acquitted of that, because the victim had died. It was very questionable whether, as the Bill was now framed, the larger offence could be proceeded with at all, because it had not been mentioned in the warrant ordering the trial. There ought, therefore, to be an express power to bring forward any other charges for offences committed after the particular offence for which the prisoner was committed for trial. The matter was one which was well worth the consideration of the Committee and of the Government, whether it would be wise to limit the clause to the charge contained in the warrant.

MR. WARTON said, that, in moving the Amendment, he had the same idea in his mind as that which had been expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd). It would be seen that if the words "the charge" were omitted from the clause, and the words "any charges" substituted, a prisoner could be tried upon any offence which he might have committed. If the clause remained as it stood, the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) would arise—whether or not, in justice to the prisoner, the trial should be limited to the charge for which he had been committed, and which was specified in the warrant. He was anxious to secure that justice should be done on both sides. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would be aware that the late Lord Chief Baron Kelly ruled that where a man had been acquitted for assault, and subsequently tried for manslaughter, that the previous trial for assault was no part of the trial for manslaughter. He therefore considered that some amendment of the clause was necessary in the direction indicated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he and his learned Colleagues believed the Bill was perfectly right as it stood. The offence was to be named in the warrant, and the evidence on which it was founded would be the evidence disclosed by the informations.

MR. WARTON said, in deference to the view expressed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, the previous Amendment having been withdrawn, he wished to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons), which raised a very important question. It raised, in fact, the principle of the clause; and he thought it would be convenient if a discussion were taken on that Amendment on the question as to whether the Committee would sanction the abrogation of trial by jury in Ireland without having first ascertained whether they could not, by means of special juries, obtain convictions. The special jury system was well known. The persons on the panel of special juries were gentlemen of considerable fortune and position, and entirely above the motives which it had been said influenced the minds of persons composing the common jury.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. MORGAN LLOYD rose to Order. He wished to know whether, as the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin had been called and not responded to by him, and that Amendment having been passed over and another moved in line 29 of the Bill, it was now competent to the hon. Member for the City of Cork to go back upon the work of the Committee and move the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin?

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the Amendment had been negatived, it would not have been in the power of the hon. Member for the City of Cork to propose the Amendment alluded to by the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris. But the Amendment having been withdrawn by leave of the Committee, the last decision of the Committee became the point of departure, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork would therefore be in Order in moving it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT suggested that it would be better to take the discussion which would be raised by the Amendment proposed to be moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork on the Question "That the Clause stand part of the Bill." It appeared to him that it would be convenient to finish the remaining sub-sections of the clause, the consideration of which need not occupy much time, before the question of trial by special jury was raised; and he put it to the hon. Member for the City of Cork whether he would not proceed in that way. It would be idle, if there was to be a jury, to go throughout the machinery of a Special Commission.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he had not quite understood, from the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, on what particular point of the clause it would be possible for the hon. Member for the City of Cork to discuss the question involved in the Amendment he had proposed to move.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the opportunity would be presented on the Question "That the Clause stand part of the Bill." What he wished to point out to hon. Members opposite was that if the Special Commission Court was not to sit without a jury this clause of the Bill was not wanted at all, the question of change of venue and other details being about to be dealt with by special clauses. All the rest of the machinery of the clause would, in fact, be found in another part of the Bill; and, therefore, he said that the proposal of the hon. Member which related to the one remaining provision of the clause had better be discussed when the clause was put from the Chair.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had consulted his right hon. and learned Colleague the Attorney General for Ireland he would have learned that there had been Special Commissions from the year 1789 to the present time without juries. This question of the Commission sitting without a jury was not the sole remaining question involved in the clause. The question in the clause was that of the Special Commission Court.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there was no question before the Committee. The hon. Member for the City of Cork should proceed, if he intended to do so, or the next Amendment would have to be called.

MR. PARNELL said, he was inclined to think that the suggestion of the Home Secretary was a reasonable one—that the discussion with regard to having a special jury should be taken on the Question "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," and would, therefore, not move the Amendment indicated.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that his attention having been called to an Amendment lower down on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum), which expressed in more ample form the principle of the Amendment which he had himself placed on the Paper with reference to the information to be contained in the warrant, he should not unnecessarily take up the time of the Committee by moving the Amendment that stood in his name. Indeed, since he had given Notice of it he was glad to hear that it had been stated that Her Majesty's Government were not desirous of avoiding publicity; but, on the contrary, that they were anxious that the prisoner should have every information.

Mr. Parnell

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 3, after "Commission," insert "and taken by rotation from the entire number of such Judges."—(Mr. R. T. Reid.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. HEALY remarked, that he had an Amendment to move to Clause 3, which provided machinery with regard to the Special Commission Court, the wording of which was taken out of the Corrupt Practices Act. He thought Her Majesty's Government could not do better than adopt that Amendment, which was to the effect that the Judges of the Irish Courts should meet on or before the third day of Michaelmas Term in each year, and select, by a majority of votes, three of their number for the trial of the offences before-mentioned in a Special Commission Court, under this Act, during the present year. It also proposed that if in any case at their meeting the Judges were equally divided in their choice of one of their number to serve on a Special Commission, the Lord Chancellor should have a second or casting vote, and that in the event of the death or illness of any Judge for the time being on the rota, or his inability to act from any reasonable cause, the Lord Chancellor should fill up the vacancy by placing another Judge on the rota. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that the Lord Chancellorship was a political appointment; and it would be suggested, if the Bill remained in its present form, that he might select for the Special Commission Court three Judges of the character they were, unhappily, so familiar with in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was obliged to confess, speaking for himself, that the arrangement in the Bill was the more convenient arrangement. It was obvious that amongst the Judges there were some who, by their practice at the Bar, and by their health, were more fit than others to go on Special Commissions. On the other hand, he was perfectly conscious of the possibility of its being said that the Judges had been selected on account of their political opinions. If that were so, and a strong feeling of the kind existed, Her Majesty's Government thought that feeling ought to be removed. He was afraid, however, that its removal by having a rota would lead to some inconveniences, because how was that rota to be settled? He did not suppose that, even if the Judges were to settle it themselves, hon. Members would be quite satisfied; and, therefore, he thought, if a rota was to be had, the best way would be to have it taken, as was proposed in a previous Amendment, by ballot, and leave the selection to nobody. He must leave the matter in the hands of the Committee; but, as he had before remarked, he thought the arrangement in this Bill would work conveniently. If the Amendment were pressed the Government were not inclined to oppose it; but, the principle being accepted, he trusted they might, by postponing the matter, be allowed to settle the details of the rotation later on.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after "try," insert "in open court."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MARUM said, he had an Amendment to move, the object of which was to provide that the accused person might peremptorily challenge any one of the Judges of the Special Commission Court, and that he should then be tried by the two other Judges. He was aware that this was a serious proposal; but, at the same time, he thought the total abolition of trial by jury was a serious infringement of the ordinary law. In making this proposition he did not for one moment intend to throw the least imputation on the Judges of Ireland, whom he thought could hold a favourable comparison with the Judges of England, and with the Judges of other countries, whether of the Old World or the New. He grounded his proposal on this—that, according to the Civil and Canon Law quoted in the Codex and the Decretals, challenge of a Judge was admissible. He need not remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that the Civil and Canon Law were part and parcel of the law of England, or to quote Bracton and Fleta to bear out that statement, because Irish Members, in the matter for which he was contending, had a higher authority on their side. He admitted that Lord Coke stated that challenges of Judges went out of practice, and that, at the present moment, those challenges were not admissible. With the permission of the Committee, he would read a few lines on this subject from a book which used to be regarded as an authority upon Constitutional matters, and which was quoted a few days ago, in the discussion upon this Bill, by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Blackstone, treating of this right of peremptory challenge, said it was a provision

[Fourth Night.]

"Full of tenderness and humanity to prisoners, for which our English laws are so justly famous; this is grounded on two reasons; as everyone must be sensible what sudden impressions and unaccountable prejudice we are apt to conceive upon the bare looks and gestures of another; and how necessary it is that the prisoner (when put to defend his life) should have a good opinion of his jury, the want of which might totally disconcert him; the law wills not that he should be tried by any one man against whom he has conceived a prejudice, even without being able to assign a reason for such dislike."

Now, if juries were to be done away with in Ireland, or in any other part of the British Dominions, it was not an unreasonable thing that we should retain as much of the jury element as possible; and, therefore, notwithstanding the novelty of the proposition he was making, he trusted it would, for the reasons he had given, meet with the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government. For his own part, he protested altogether against the abolition of trial by jury in Ireland and elsewhere, and begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 5, after "trial," insert "Provided always, That any such person may peremptorily challenge any one of such judges, and shall then be tried by the two other judges."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was afraid he could not accept this Amendment, which would lead to most awkward consequences. Everybody must feel the difference between the case of challenging a jury and that of challenging a Judge, even where the Judge was called upon to act as a jury. He did not think it would be possible for the Judges to act in this case if they were to be subject to this form of challenge; and, therefore, he trusted that, upon further consideration, the hon. Member for Kilkenny would not feel it his duty to press the Amendment.

Mr. Marum

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA also appealed to the hon. Member not to proceed with his Amendment, which he could scarcely believe had been seriously put forward by him. In a case in which it was expected that the whole of the three Judges should agree, the leaving out of one of them did not appear to him to be either consistent or in favour of the prisoner. It was not to be supposed that one Judge could carry the other two along with him in spite of their own judgment; and he trusted the hon. Member would not occupy the time of the Committee further in disposing of this matter.

MR. MARUM said, he begged leave to withdraw the Amendment in deference to what appeared to be the evident sense of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MARUM said, the next Amendment he had to propose had for its object to prevent the surprise of accused persons, and afford them an ample opportunity of getting their witnesses together. He need say nothing more than this in support of the Proviso, which he now begged to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 5, after "trial," insert "Provided, That fourteen days, at least, before the sitting of any Special Commission Court the Lord Lieutenant, by public proclamation made in the county or county of a city where the offence or offences was or were committed, shall declare the time and place of the said sitting, specifying the names of the persons to be tried, the nature of the several offences of which they are respectively charged, and the names of the judges constituting the Special Commission Court; and, where any such person is in custody, it shall be the duty of the governor or other chief officer of the prison in which he is confined, to furnish him with a copy of such proclamation at the period of the promulgation of the same."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was happy to be in a position to reciprocate the courtesy of the hon. Member for Kilkenny, by saying that Her Majesty's Government were willing to accept this Amendment. It was, in their opinion, very proper that it should be made known in the county when the trial was to take place, and that every facility should be afforded to those interested in getting evidence in favour of the prisoner. He would, however, ask the hon. Gentleman not to press for the insertion of the Amendment at this particular part of the Bill. It was desirable that this clause should remain purely a Jurisdiction Clause; and with that object Her Majesty's Government were prepared to insert, later on, a clause which would provide for the machinery necessary to the working of the Act. He hoped the hon. Member would be satisfied with the assurance given, which, he believed, would dispose also of a considerable portion of the Amendment next upon the Paper, in the name of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), which the Government were willing to accept, except so far as related to laying the warrant before Parliament.

MR. HEALY said, he should be happy to abstain from moving the Amendment referred to, on the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, there was a useful provision in Sub-section 3, that the evidence given on the trial before the Special Commission Court should be taken down by a shorthand writer, who should be sworn to take the same accurately to the best of his ability. In his opinion, the sub-section did not go far enough, and the Amendment he was about to propose had for its object that the reasons given by the Judges in delivering judgment should also be taken down by the shorthand writers, because, where the right of appeal existed, this was of great importance to the parties concerned. It was not his proposition that the Judges should state their reasons, but that their reasons, if any, should be recorded. The Committee would remember that it had been stated in the course of this discussion that the Judges would give reasons according to the usual practice.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 7, after the word "court," to insert "and the reasons if any given by the judges in delivering judgment."—(Mr. Hinde Palmer.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. M'COAN said, he had never given Notice of the next Amendment on the Paper, to leave out Sub-section (4), although it stood in his name. Someone had evidently played a very bad joke at his expense.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, without wishing to exercise any right of pre-emption in this matter, he must point out that the Amendment standing on the Paper in his name, relating to the cost of conveyance of a person acquitted on trial by the Special Commission Court must, for grammatical reasons, take precedence of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. T. C. Thompson), which the Government wished to accept.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 10, after "conviction," insert "and the judges of the said court shall in all cases of conviction give in open court the reasons for such conviction."—(Mr. T. C. Thompson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. TREVELYAN said, the Government accepted this Amendment with something like eagerness, inasmuch as they were extremely anxious that the reasons on which the conviction was founded should be thoroughly known, and the procedure of the Equity Courts adopted so far that the Judge should carefully analyze the evidence before coming to a decision. In the case of acquittal, as had been pointed out, it would rest with the Judges whether they would give reasons or not.

MR. WARTON said, they were getting into a rather awkward position with regard to the amended construction of this clause. They had adopted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln City (Mr. Hinde Palmer), that the reasons of the Judges, if any, should be taken down by a shorthand writer, and they were about to add at the end of the clause that the Judges should in all cases of conviction give their reasons. He submitted that the sub-sections affected by these Amendments should be transposed.

MR. HEALY acknowledged the value of the provision for having the evidence and the Judges' reasons recorded by a shorthand writer. The Government having settled the machinery for this purpose, he presumed the transcript of the shorthand writer's notes would be available for the Press; and, therefore, he begged to ask in what way it was intended to communicate them to the House and the public?

[Fourth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the records would, of course, be published in the ordinary way, although it was not intended that they should be published in the newspapers, so that if, in any particular case, an hon. Member desired to found his Motion upon a Judgment, he would then have an authentic record instead of a newspaper report which might possibly be inaccurate. That was one of the objects of having a shorthand writer in the present case; but the principal object was that in case of appeal the Judges of the Appeal Court should have an accurate knowledge of the evidence, and the reasons upon which the decision of the Court below was founded.

MR. HEALY said, he hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not be unwilling to give a pledge that the shorthand writer's notes would be produced in any particular case in which it might be desirable to refer to them.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, as far as he was concerned, he had no objection to give such a pledge.

MR. MACFARLANE urged that the judgment of the Court, as recorded in the shorthand writer's notes, should be made available to the public, because it was highly desirable that the public should have authentic information on so important a subject. It was especially necessary that the Irish public should possess this authentic information, in order that they might judge for themselves without waiting until a Return had been moved for in the House of Commons of the reasons given by the Judges for their decisions.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government had considered how the case of a person acquitted in a county other than that in which he was committed for trial might best be met, so far as his return home was concerned. They had decided that where the object of the person so acquitted was to get back to his own county, he should be sent there at the cost of the public. He therefore begged to move the Amendment standing in his name, the object of which was to give effect to that decision.

Mr. Healy

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 10, at end, add "Where a person is tried by a Special Commission Court at any place beyond the limits of the county in which he was committed for trial, he shall, if acquitted by such court, be entitled to be conveyed free of cost to any place he selects in the county in which he was committed for trial."—
(Sir William Harcourt.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. HEALY presumed the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not aware, when he put his own Amendment on the Paper, that the Amendment on the same subject of which he (Mr. Healy) had given Notice was taken, word for word, out of the Coercion Act of last year. One would have thought that the Government, being so fond of the Act of last year, would have been willing to adopt this wording. However, the difficulty presented by the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that a man might be committed for trial at one end of a large county and tried at the other, in which case the provision for sending him home free of cost would not apply. In the case of the county of Cork, for instance, a man, after acquittal, might have to travel for perhaps 150 miles through a district in which there were no railways. The expense of this alone would constitute a great hardship; and he was quite at a loss to understand why the Government could not discharge the individual within five miles of the spot at which he was arrested. He thought that the Government should either add words to their Amendment to meet that case, or accept his Amendment, which, as he had before pointed out, was taken from their own Act of Parliament.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should have thought the words on the Paper implied that a man was not to be put to the expense of having to go home on foot.

MR. HEALY urged that the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not come into operation until the prisoner was actually removed from the county where he was arrested. His own Amendment would operate whether the man was removed from that county or not. He repeated that, under the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the case of Cork, the largest county in Ireland, a man might be taken 150 miles away from the place where he was arrested, and, upon acquittal, have to travel back again, at a very considerable expense, seeing that there was no railway there. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that on Report he would alter his Amendment, so that it should apply even where a person was tried in his own county, he should be willing to agree to it.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he should imagine that a man acquitted under the circumstances indicated in the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend was in the position of a discharged convict, so far as the cost of getting home was concerned, and would be treated accordingly.

MR. R. T. REID proposed to add, at the end of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the words—

“Unless he shall himself prefer to be discharged nearer to the prison in which he was last detained.”

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, when a man was tried and acquitted he was absolutely entitled to be discharged; and to detain him as a prisoner in any place after he was acquitted appeared to him to constitute a great injustice.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL pointed out that the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman contained no such word as “discharged.” The words were—“He shall be entitled to be conveyed free of cost.”

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the objection of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would be met if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would consent to leave out of his Amendment the words—

“At any place beyond the limits of the county in which he was committed for trial.”

There were undoubtedly counties in Ireland like Cork, in which a man would have a considerable distance to travel in order to reach his home after being tried and acquitted within the county. It seemed to him only just that a man acquitted under this Act should not be exposed to any hardship on the ground of expense.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, it must not be supposed that because a man was acquitted by a special tribunal he was entitled to more costs than he would be if he were acquitted by any other tribunal.

MR. LEAMY contended that, in the matter of expenses, a man should be treated exceptionally who was acquitted by an exceptional tribunal. If a man was brought before an ordinary tribunal he would be tried according to the ordinary law; but in the present case he would be tried in a special manner. He thought the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) ought to be accepted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, as the point in question was not a very large one, he was willing to make the alteration in the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

MR. MARUM pointed out that, according to the form of the Amendment, it seemed to be assumed that the person had been in custody and tried, and that then, on acquittal, his expenses were to be paid. But he must remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that there were many cases in which men would be out on bail in their own localities. These, he thought, were entitled to their expenses; and, indeed, he did not see how their claims could be resisted. According to this Amendment, also, it was more likely that the person acquitted would be a bail prisoner than otherwise; and, as the principle was admitted that a man's expenses should be paid when he was brought a long distance from his own locality, he considered that there should be some solatium in the case of persons out on bail in their own localities.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words, “at any place beyond the limits of the county in which he was committed for trial.”—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to explain to the Committee on what principle in future the expenses of prisoners, other than those tried under this Act, could be refused to them?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the concession in the present instance was not made on the ground that the prisoner was tried by a Special Commission. If the question were raised with respect to the prisoner's expenses in the case of other tribunals, it would, no doubt, be replied that the provisions of this Bill were of a temporary character, and that the rule with regard to expenses could not consequently form a precedent.

[Fourth Night.]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment," put, and negatived.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. MARUM said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary would take into his consideration the point as to the expenses of bail prisoners in their own localities. He did not wish to put the Committee to the inconvenience of discussing an Amendment on this subject.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had seen no Notice of an Amendment to this clause dealing with the subject. He must, therefore, take time to consider the question.

MR. CALLAN wished to add to the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman just adopted by the Committee words to the effect that a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Evidence and the Judgments of the Judges should be supplied to the party accused or to be tried on application to the proper officer. He hoped the Home Secretary would have no objection to allow these words to be added.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was not, in his opinion, the proper place. The shorthand writer's notes could only be wanted in case of appeal, and, therefore, the Proviso was inadmissible in this sub-section.

MR. CALLAN said, he wanted to have the matter so arranged that the notes might be used for the purpose of appeals. There was no intention that the Proviso should be applied to summary jurisdiction cases; it was only required in cases where a man had been convicted by the Special Commission Court, and meant to appeal. He felt sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman would see the desirability of supplying this most necessary information to the prisoner.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) pointed out that the question raised was one of procedure, whereas this was a clause simply giving jurisdiction. It was desirable, no doubt, where a person was convicted, and an appeal was intended, that the prisoner should have a copy of the Evidence and Judgment to lay before his counsel. His right hon. and learned Friend accepted that view, but considered that the machinery for carrying it into effect would be more properly provided in a clause relating to procedure than in this clause, which was one of jurisdiction alone.

MR. CALLAN appealed to the hon. and learned Attorney General to point out in the Bill any place at which the Proviso would be more apropos than the present sub-section (4), which said that—

"A person tried by a Special Commission Court shall be acquitted unless the whole court concur in his conviction."

And the Committee had just adopted the Amendment of the Home Secretary for the payment of a prisoner's expenses in case of acquittal; he only wanted the sub-section to express that, in case of conviction, the prisoner should be furnished with a copy of the shorthand writer's notes of the Evidence and Judgment; and certainly he could see no better place to make the Proviso than he had indicated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) suggested that the hon. Member should look to page 15 of the Bill, on which the rules of procedure were set out, in the belief that he would find there a much more appropriate place for the Amendment.

MR. MACFARLANE proposed to move that a verbatim report of the proceedings of the Superior Court should be available to the public. The Government had admitted the principle in the case of the Inferior Court. It was sufficient that the prisoner alone should have the report.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the hon. Member for Carlow not to press this matter, because all the ordinary channels of information would be open to the public. Judgment would be entered in precisely the same way as in this country. The hon. Member would have an opportunity of raising his point on the Schedule.

MR. CALLAN said, the Attorney General for Ireland being now in his place, would probably be able to reply more satisfactorily than his learned Colleague the English Attorney General upon the point raised with regard to supplying the prisoner, on conviction, with a copy of the shorthand writer's notes for the purpose of appeal. He (Mr. Callan) wished that these notes should be supplied to the prisoner immediately he was convicted for the purposes of his appeal—not after he had given notice of appeal. The object was that the prisoner should be able to take the advice of his counsel upon the judgment of the Court. He asked the opinion of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland as to the propriety of moving the Proviso at this part of the Bill?

Sir William Harcourt

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) concurred that the best place for the insertion of the Proviso would be found in the Schedule.

MR. CALLAN asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that it should be inserted in the Schedule?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) signified assent.

MR. PLUNKET said, in the absence and at the request of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), he proposed to move the Amendment next upon the Paper. He agreed in the fairness of paying the reasonable expenses of witnesses for the defence; because there was strength in the argument that, inasmuch as the tribunal proposed to be erected by the Bill was an exceptional tribunal, exceptional hardships might be imposed upon the prisoner. To that extent it was fair, no doubt, that the reasonable expenses of the prisoner's witnesses should be provided for. But the case which this Amendment was intended to meet was that of a witness who resided in the same county where the trial was held, and these persons would be put to no more inconvenience or hardship under the Bill than if they were called upon to attend at the ordinary Assizes of their counties. He saw no reason why, in that case, the ordinary practice should be departed from. The question was, from one point of view, rather for the consideration of the Treasury. Still, he put it to Her Majesty's Government to say in what sense the fact of the tribunal being exceptional was to make everything else in the Bill exceptional also. He hoped, if the provision of this sub-section were to be extended to a prisoner tried in a county where the offence was committed, it would not be put on the ground which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary gave at an earlier period in the discussion, because in that case everything in the Bill would be exceptional.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, after "witnesses" insert "resident out of the county in which the trial takes place."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, in England, under certain circumstances, there might be expenses if a witness was within the county, and the extension given in this Bill was very slight indeed. He desired to make all the allowances under the Bill as liberal as possible, and where he could ease the Bill and make it less oppressive he was desirous of doing so.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, there was an additional reason for being as generous as possible in the fact that the Bill was taking away the safeguard to prisoners of being able to place their cases before a Grand Jury.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON proposed an Amendment with the object of enabling the Government to grant expenses in the case of poor persons charged with treason or treason-felony for the payment of counsel. That proposal, he thought, would certainly appeal to the good feeling of the Committee. He could not agree with the view expressed on the other side of the House that prisoners in such cases were not in a different position from prisoners tried in the ordinary way; but he only proposed to extend this Amendment to charges of treason and treason-felony. Everybody acquainted with the law knew perfectly well what difficulties surrounded the charges of treason or treason-felony, and how difficult it was to define those offences. Unless poor people were provided with counsel they would not be able to meet such charges with a reasonable publicity of escape. It might be asked why they should be placed in a better position now than they were in previously? The reason was this—there was a good old principle of English law, that where prisoners were undefended the Judges should be counsel for them; and that principle had been acted upon throughout our Constitution. It prevailed so far as to form one argument used by the Judges against the prisoner's counsel; but now that position was to be destroyed, because the Judges were to be in the position of a jury, and it would be impossible for them, in any sense, to act as counsel for the prisoner. Having put the prisoners in a worse position than before, and taken away the great safeguard of Judges seeing that nothing unfair to the prisoners should be urged, and having left the prisoners undefended, except in so far as they were able to incur the expense of employing counsel, it was only fair, in such cases as these, that the Government should do something in this direction for the protection of the prisoners.

[Fourth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 12, after the word "witnesses" insert "and in the case of poor persons charged with treason or treason felony, for the payment of counsel.—(Mr. T. C. Thompson.)"

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he thought there was some misconception as to the practice in Ireland in such cases. It had always been the practice in cases of murder for the Crown Solicitor to provide the fees for counsel if prisoners were undefended; and the Government did not see why the same practice should not exist in cases of treason and treason-felony. It appeared to them reasonable that the same practice should apply to those cases, and they therefore would accept the Amendment; but he would suggest the insertion in the Amendment of the words "or murder."

MR. PARNELL asked whether it was worth while to make any exception at all? It would be better to extend the principle to all the offences in the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government could go no further. A line had been drawn in the category of offences, and they must adhere to that.

MR. LEAMY asked if there was any objection to extend the principle to cases of manslaughter, for which a man might be sentenced to penal servitude for life? It was much more important for a prisoner to have counsel before three Judges than before a jury; and he thought a prisoner might be allowed to have counsel on a charge of manslaughter, provided, of course, that the Judges were satisfied that he had no means of paying counsel himself. The police would be quite able to ascertain that.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he hoped the Home Secretary would extend the principle to all the classes of offences. There was to be a special and exceptional tribunal; and he thought the same system might be adopted as that which had been, he might say, the uniform practice in the case of all Special Commissions in Ireland. Where circumstances necessitated their issue, the Crown assisted in defraying the cost of the attorney and the fees of counsel retained for the prisoner. That practice was not limited to murder, but was applied to all the offences enumerated in this clause. Some of the gentlemen who were now Judges in Ireland had been sent down to such Special Commissions, and been paid by the Crown to represent prisoners. Under these circumstances, as a special and exceptional tribunal was to be created, he hoped the Government would provide poor persons with the means of being defended by counsel. There existed no grounds for limiting the provision. The reason for its adoption was even greater than in the case of Special Commissions, as the Committee should bear in mind that the venue was to be wherever the Lord Lieutenant might select. He might select a venue where solicitors whom the prisoners might know were not present; and then the prisoners would be obliged to fall back on counsel. In such cases, it would be a subversion of justice for prisoners to be tried before these three Judges without having the assistance of counsel.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped hon. Members would admit that he had shown every disposition to go as far as he could in acceding to requests; but he did not think he ought to go further in this matter than treason and murder.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought one observation by the hon. Member (Mr. P. Martin) was worthy of further attention. A poor man might be taken, say, from Cork to Dublin, and, unless he had the means of engaging counsel in Dublin, he would have to go without any defence. In his own place that man might be able to scrape together a few pounds and engage a solicitor, who, perhaps, had a number of cases in Court, and, in consequence, would take a small fee; whereas, if he was in Dublin, he would not know where to find an attorney, or have the means of paying a large fee. As the Government were setting up a special tribunal, they ought not to hesitate over a few pounds. This Bill was not to last more than two or three years—and, presumably, some of the cases would be taken before juries—and he thought the Government might assent to the Amendment.

Mr. T. C. Thompson

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the contention of the Home Secretary was really a plea for murder; for he could easily conceive the case of a member of the dangerous classes, after having burnt down a house and assaulted the owner, saying he was obliged to murder the owner in order to get counsel, which his own means would not enable him to get for himself.

MR. MOORE said, he hoped the Government would agree to the proposal, for the provisions of the Bill were very stringent, and were calculated to destroy the confidence of the poorer classes in justice; and it would be very hard to make a man in Connemara believe he was going to be fairly tried when he was taken to Dublin to be tried by three Judges without a jury. He trusted the Government would see their way to granting such men every facility for obtaining a fair trial. Very likely he would not get a fair trial in any case. He did not wish to impugn the justice of the Judges; but it was one thing to give a fair trial, and another to convince a man that he had had a fair trial. The proposal would only involve a matter of a few pounds.

DR. COMMINS said, there was another point he hoped the Government would consider, for the sake of the Judges themselves. Their responsibility was about to be enormously increased, and, in proportion to increased responsibility, Judges always desired that prisoners should be well defended. In England, when a man was tried for murder, and could not provide counsel for himself, the Judge assigned him counsel; and for the sake of the Irish Judges themselves, as well as for the sake of the prisoner, it was important that the privilege of having the assistance of counsel should be extended to all prisoners—at all events, in such serious cases as manslaughter, for which penal servitude might be imposed. As for any distinction between murder and manslaughter, that was so small that he could not understand why a distinction was drawn. Judges had said, in summing up, that manslaughter might be so near to murder that practically it was impossible to draw a line; and, therefore, counsel was as necessary in a case of manslaughter as in a case of murder.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to know whether the Government could say how soon after a man had been committed he would be informed that he would be tried before this special tribunal, and where he would be tried; also upon whose directions this would be done, and whether the Attorney General for Ireland would have to go through each case? If so, he presumed that would be done in an alphabetical manner, and could not the Government arrange to inform the prisoner in time to enable him to provide counsel? It was essential that a prisoner should have early advice upon these points, because he might get up a local subscription in his own neighbourhood to enable him to obtain counsel. An hon. Member opposite had raised an objection to the expenses of witnesses being provided, and he presumed there would be a stronger objection to provision for counsel. The reason why this was specially necessary was that, under this Act, the Government would be prompted to bring more men to trial than under the old Act, taking the chance of getting convictions; and, therefore, men would be more liable to arrest.

MR. PARNELL suggested to the hon. Member (Mr. Thompson) that if the Home Secretary would agree to reconsider this matter on Report, the matter might be left with confidence to the right hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he did not think the Government could hold out any hope of reconsidering the Amendment. They had made considerable concessions already in favour of the prisoners.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, there was no doubt that there had been ample funds for promoting the agitation which had led to the present lamentable state of things in Ireland; and he thought it would be only reasonable that those who were connected with the disturbances should provide the means of defending the prisoners.

MR. MOORE rose to Order, and asked whether a discussion of the Land League funds was germane to the question before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member simply to allude to the fact that there was a Land League fund.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, if those funds were available for promoting disturbance, those who administered them should provide the means of defending the persons accused.

MR. HEALY pointed out to the hon. Member that this Bill was to last three years; but the funds of the Land League might run out in three months.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether any person who subscribed for such a purpose would not be liable to such an action for maintenance as was brought against the hon. Member himself?

MR. NEWDEGATE: Which eminently failed.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, after the word "court," insert "and certified as required by such court."
—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PARNELL said, he did not believe the Home Secretary intended this Amendment to be moved, because, during the discussion on the Amendment with regard to prisoners being tried in the districts where the offences were committed, he had intimated his intention to bring up a clause later on dealing with the machinery for providing the expenses of witnesses. This Amendment certainly did not provide for expenses in the spirit of the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, because it was expressly said there should be some provision for the maintenance of witnesses, and for enabling a poor prisoner to get his expenses before he came up for trial. Under the Bill, the witnesses might have to remain for some weeks in an Assize town, or wherever the Commission was held, at their own expense; and it was only reasonable that, after the money had been advanced out of the slender resources of the prisoner, the Court should certify for costs. He would suggest that this matter should be left open for consideration, and that the Home Secretary, having considered the question, should bring up his clause or clauses for effecting what he evidently thought it was desirable to carry out.

Mr. Newdegate

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he perfectly recollected the statement of the Home Secretary; and what he understood to be the course contemplated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was that for some witnesses an application would have to be made officially by the Crown Solicitor. He thought the better way would be to allow this Amendment to pass, seeing that there must be some certificate as to what witnesses were required. He was sure he could promise that the Home Secretary would take care that that was practically carried out.

MR. HEALY asked whether, without this Amendment at all, what the Attorney General had spoken of would not take place? Someone must pay the expenses, and the person paying would require to be certificated. He thought the Amendment unnecessary.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): We must regulate that, which is part of the procedure, or there will be no control whatever.

MR. LEAMY: We are to understand that words will be introduced into the Bill for this purpose?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Yes; certainly.

MR. P. MARTIN objected to the Amendment as likely to create considerable difficulties. He did not think the Attorney General meant that in every case the Judge should certify for costs. What was wanted was some officer to certify; but putting it in the "Court" would throw upon the Judge what he did not think the Attorney General intended. Under the circumstances, it would be better that nothing should be added to the clause at present. As the Government had definitely stated their intention to facilitate and assure the payment of all witnesses that might be fairly required to be produced before those exceptional tribunals, he thought it well to leave the entire matter to be provided for either on the Report stage, or to have new clauses introduced in Committee to regulate the payment of these witnesses. When framing these clauses, in addition to stating in what manner these expenses were to be estimated, it could be determined also who would be a suitable officer to carry out the matter. The adoption of this Amendment would introduce confusion to the Act, and the clause might run counter to the proposed clauses.

DR. COMMINS said, he should not object to an Amendment which would give the Court power to disallow expenses; but to introduce this provision here, and throw the onus of allowing expenses on the Court, was going too far. The Court would have enough to do to try issues, without being required to consider the question of allowing expenses. It would be sufficient to give the Court power to disallow the expenses of a witness who misconducted himself, or stated what was untrue, or tried to deceive the Court. What was wanted was an inducement to witnesses to come forward, in order that justice might be done; but this Bill seemed to tend towards inducing witnesses to come forward for the Crown, and the same provision should be made for the defence. In England it was the practice that, unless the Court disallowed expenses for some good and sufficient reason, every witness was entitled to a fixed allowance. There was no reason why that system should be departed from, for the intention of this Act was to induce those who could speak honestly and truthfully to come forward whether for the Crown or the prisoners. Therefore, the proper course would be to give some power—or rather, to omit this passage altogether—and then the present law would apply to witnesses on both sides, the Court having a power of disallowing expenses.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, a witness for the defence was not entitled to his expenses, as a matter of course, unless he was a necessary witness, and his expenses allowed by the Court.

DR. COMMINS said, a witness for the Crown in every criminal case was entitled to his expenses, and the defence ought to have the same provision.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the practice was, that where a prisoner in an ordinary case was too poor to get witnesses, the Crown Solicitor brought them up for him, and settled the expenses; and then the Judge decided the matter.

MR. HEALY remarked on the inconvenience of discussing this question without the Amendment of the Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) stated that the Amendment to be brought up by the Home Secretary would be of a different character from this. This Amendment dealt with witnesses before the Court; and the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would deal with witnesses for the defence in order to bring them into Court, which was a totally different thing.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 14, at end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, unless a Judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. HEALY said, he had made a suggestion that only offences committed in Ireland should be tried by this Court, and the answer was that that would exclude offences on the high seas. This Bill, however, was not brought in for offences committed on the high seas, but for offences in Ireland, and he did not see why the Government should not assent to his suggestion to confine the Bill to Ireland. The Bill was not, he supposed, intended to deal with offences in Hong Kong. The Home Secretary had said the Irish Members were speaking with two voices; but was not this proposal of the Government an instance of speaking with two voices? They had brought in a Bill to try crime in Ireland; but who was going to settle the question whether a Judge and jury would have jurisdiction to try an offence? The Attorney General would probably say the Lord Lieutenant would decide; but the Irish Members had their suspicions, and it would be mighty little satisfaction to a man to tell him that a Judge and jury would have power to try him, and leave him to go to the Appeal Court and dispute that. The Home Secretary should accept the logic of the situation, which was that it was in Ireland alone that crime had to be dealt with. Therefore, he was not satisfied with the scope of the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained that the words "in Ireland" were omitted, because it was intended to give the same jurisdiction as could now be exercised by the Courts in Ireland; and if the words were inserted, to put an extreme case, a man who wished to murder another might take him out to sea a short distance in a boat and there murder him. It was thought better to leave the Amendment as it now stood; but offences in Hong Kong would not, as suggested, be brought under this Special Commission.

MR. MARUM mentioned that the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 9, gave power not merely to have the venue in the locality of the offence, but in any other locality, and, therefore, wherever a person could be tried under the ordinary law now, he could be tried by the Special Commission also. That was the entire object of this Amendment—that the person accused should be in the same position as if tried under the ordinary law; and the Government declined to limit the jurisdiction as to persons beyond the present law, which allowed a prisoner to be tried in certain places. He did not object to that; but he wished to provide that the Special Commission should be able to try a person in every place — and nowhere else—where he could be tried under the ordinary law. He was merely asking that the Government should extend to the place of trial as well as to the person the same principle, which would enable any prisoner to be tried for an offence at any place by the Special Commission as he could be under the present law. That would bring the two systems into harmony.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Committee had some hours ago discussed the question whether there should be an Amendment enabling the prisoner to be tried out of the district where the offence was committed. The Committee decided that there should be special cases, and they could not now go back upon that.

MR. HEALY regretted this Amendment. He had endeavoured to induce the Attorney General to come out frankly with his reasons for restricting this Amendment. The Home Secretary had not done so, but he would give the reasons. The right hon. and learned Gentleman wished to bring Irishmen in America, or England, or elsewhere, under the Treason and Treason-Felony Clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might deny that; but could he deny its possibility? This was, practically speaking, the Alien Act in a worse form. The Government had now raised the entire question of American citizenship by the way in which this Amendment was drafted. He was sorry they had not seen their way to accepting the words "in Ireland," seeing that this was a Bill, according to its title, for the Prevention of Crime "in Ireland;" but it was now to be made a Bill for the Prevention of Crime in America.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER): No.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman might deny that; but he (Mr. Healy) knew that certain persons had been tried for speeches in America, and convicted. A change in the law prevented American citizens from being hit by such a Bill as this, but only when they could prove naturalization; and that law would not touch some people in America who had spoken and written, and against whom, on some paltry matter, the Government might use this Bill. Was it fair that a Bill for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland should enable the Government to deal with crime anywhere else? The Government continually gave warnings against the putting of extreme cases; but what was the case the Attorney General brought forward? That one man might take another man to sea in a boat and murder him. A man might take another up in a balloon and murder him; but people did not do these things; and why should they go to the region of absurdity instead of dealing with practical facts? Did the Government wish to insert a clause, under cover of this Bill, to deal with entirely different matters? If they brought in a Bill to put down treason in America, the Irish Members would discuss it with the Government; but they objected to a Bill brought in under false pretences. If the Attorney General was afraid of a murder in a boat, let him insert the words "on the high seas." It might be said that Irish Members should not object to striking at crimes in America; but they objected to the evidence of informers, and evidence could not be got from America without informers. The Government would have their spies ready in America upon whose evidence men might, under this Bill, be convicted, although men who had been convicted on such evidence could swear that every word the informers uttered was false. Could the Government defend this proposal by necessity? If their only argument was that a man might take another to sea and murder him, the Irish Members would meet them and agree to a murder in a boat being triable by three Judges. But this Amendment was a very different thing, and the Government ought to have no such power as that now proposed.

Mr. Healy

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was surprised to hear that there was any objection to this Amendment. It had been drawn up in perfect good faith, to redeem a pledge given to carry out what certain hon. Members below the Gangway had asked for—namely, to provide that a Special Commission should have no more and no less jurisdiction than a Judge and jury in Ireland. The objection raised was that the clause contained no words making it clear that a Commission might not assume a jurisdiction which a Judge and jury would not have. That never was the intention of the Government, and he undertook to make that clear; and, therefore, this Amendment was brought in to give a Commission precisely the same power as a Judge and jury would have. As a general rule, a Judge and jury in Ireland could only deal with offences committed in Ireland; but he had been unable to accept a previous Amendment, because treason, wherever committed, was triable anywhere, and, of course, it must be tried in Ireland, whether by a Judge and jury or by this special tribunal. [Mr. Hopwood: How about the case of a murder beyond the seas?] The hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) corrected him, saying there was another case—namely, a murder beyond the seas. He had overlooked that; but it was another case which should be tried, and he had brought in this new Amendment. All that was asked for was that this new tribunal should have neither more nor less jurisdiction than a Judge and jury; and he ventured to think the Committee would be satisfied with the Amendment, which provided that, and carried out the understanding upon which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) withdrew his Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought that although the hon. Member for Wexford had stated his case against the Government with some strength and vehemence of language, he had not put the case too strongly. The Government undertook to bring in a sub-section of limitation; but they had brought in a section of extension. It was perfectly true that this clause did not give to the new Court any jurisdiction which did not belong to the old Court; but the new Court was a Court without a jury, and the effect of the proposed section would be to enable the new Court—in what the right hon. and learned Gentleman might call a fair charge of treason, but which he would call a charge of colourable treason—to interfere with the legitimate action of men of the Irish race, whatever part of the world they might be in. Then the effect of the Bill would be, not to put down murder or attempts to kill in Ireland, or to interfere with any other agrarian offences which had sullied that country in the last year or two, but to extend a wide net of interference with Irish political action wherever the Irish might be. That was most objectionable, and he agreed with the hon. Member for Wexford in the language he thought it necessary to apply to the description given by the Attorney General. Did the Government seriously propose to bargain on the absurd hypothesis that a man would take another into a boat and kill him, in order to avoid being subject to this Bill? Did the hon. and learned Gentleman put that case seriously, and think that a man who committed so cold and calculated a murder would take the trouble to take another man into a boat, or if he did, he would have any chance of escaping? Could not a man be tried by the ordinary tribunals for murder? The case put by the hon. and learned Gentleman was within the bounds of possibility, but it might be safely left to the ordinary laws. Let the Government say what they meant to include. Did they mean to include every offence committed in any part of the world which they could designate treason or treason-felony? Under words so wide and comprehensive they might interfere with every act or word, however Constitutional or moderate.

DR. COMMINS regretted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had left the clause in its present shape, because he did not think that it carried out the object the right hon. and learned Gentleman said he had in view when he constructed it. There were two offences which were first contemplated—namely, murder on the high seas, and murder beyond the high seas. There seemed now to have been another offence, of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not originally aware. The notorious and well-known Act of 1848 introduced the offence of treason-felony, and involved principles which were not to be found in any other Act. One of these was that the offence of treason-felony, no matter where committed, might be tried within this Kingdom, provided they caught the offender. The offence was a very peculiar and extraordinary one. It was an entirely new offence, and one which had never been made a crime anywhere before the passing of that Act. The Act itself applied to “treasonable practices,” and before that Act passed constructive treason had been a puzzle to the lawyer and a terror to the politician. But if constructive treason was a terror, “treasonable practices” were much more of a terror. He did not know why it should be so, because he did not believe that a single indictment had ever yet been framed for treasonable practices; and unless the present Bill assigned something more definite than this extremely undefinable phrase “treasonable practices,” it would be impossible to convict anybody. Hitherto, he believed, it had been impossible to draw up an indictment showing what the offence of treasonable practices was. He presumed that was the reason why hitherto no person had been indicted under the Act for the particular so-called offence; but they were now going to get rid of the necessity of defining offences in legal and technical phraseology in the form of an indictment, and the new tribunal would have power to find a man guilty of treasonable practices without finding it necessary to have before them what had always been necessary up to this time—namely, a formal indictment on the part of the Government who were the prosecutors defining the offence. Therefore, this Bill introduced a new danger. No man who ever went out of Ireland for a moment—no Irishman who had been in America, or France, or Australia, or anywhere else abroad, would be safe from an indictment for treason-felony when he returned home again. It was not necessary that he should have said or done anything which might be construed into a treasonable practice. Speeches might be invented for him and provided by perjured witnesses, and in this way a new terror would be introduced for every Irishman who had occasion to go outside Ireland. No man would be able to go abroad without running the risk of being indicted for treasonable practices. Under these circumstances, although the proviso of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary might do something towards limiting vexatious prosecutions, it must not be forgotten that the Act would still apply to offences which were committed outside Ireland, and he should be glad if the right hon. and learned Gentleman could see his way to restrict the clause still more, so as to prevent the abuse of the Act by common informers, extortioners, and persons who made a trade of perjury in Ireland. So far as he could see, there was nothing in the Bill to prevent trumped-up charges being made, and persons being tried for them as having been guilty of treasonable practices.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to ask a question on a point of Order. The Bill was entitled “Prevention of Crime (Ireland); a Bill for the prevention of crime in Ireland.” That appeared upon the cover of the Bill. Then, in the Bill itself, the words were the same—“Prevention of Crime, Ireland; a Bill for the prevention of crime in Ireland.” The Preamble, which had been postponed, recited that—

“Whereas by reason of the action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland, the operation of the ordinary law has become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and it is expedient to make further provision for that purpose,” and so on. The question he wished to put was this. Whether under the proposed clause, it being admitted that trials for treasonable offences which took place in Hong Kong were triable in this country, in a Bill which was only for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland, such an Amendment as that now before the Committee could be put from the Chair?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a point of Order, but a point of law, in regard to which I am not competent to give an opinion. So far as I can form an opinion, the words "unless a Judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence," put the Amendment properly in Order.

MR. HEALY said, that in that case he would ask the Government to consider another point. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for England (Sir Henry James) said it was desirable to guard against murder committed in an open boat upon the high seas; but the clause was not confined to murder. It extended to treason and treason-felony. He would, therefore, ask the Government to accept an Amendment which would enable the Government to rest their case on murder—on murder in an open boat. The Proviso now said—

"Provided that nothing in this section shall empower a Special Commission Court to try a person for any offence, unless a judge and jury in Ireland have jurisdiction to try that person for the said offence."

And he would propose to add to it these words—

"Provided no person shall be tried by the said Court for treason or treason-felony committed out of Ireland."

If the intentions of the Government, in regard to the clause, had been bond fide stated by the Attorney General, he did not see what objection there could be to the insertion of an Amendment to that effect. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that it was desirable to prevent the commission of crime on the high seas, and so on, where a Judge and jury in Ireland would have jurisdiction. The hon. and learned Gentleman denied that there was any desire on the part of the Government to cast their net all over the globe, so as to intercept, by means of spies and paid informers, any Irishman who happened to visit another country. Either the Government did desire to extend the operation of the Act to America, Australia, and the Colonies, or they did not. If they did, let it be made perfectly clear, and let there be a frank statement from the Home Secretary; and, if not, he trusted the Government would have no objection to accept his Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked, that when this question was raised last week, he said at once that the clause was intended to include treason.

It was impossible, therefore, that he could accept the words of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), limiting the clause to crimes committed in Ireland, of a treasonable character, because treason was an offence triable wherever committed. There had been no attempt on his part to conceal that that was part of the object of the Bill. He had stated it in the most plain and direct manner, and he had thought that the hon. Member for Wexford accepted the declaration. [MR. HEALY: No.] Certainly, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) did. [MR. HEALY: Only as regards murder.] That was not so. His statement was accepted as regarded treason also; and he had distinctly stated why treason should not be excepted from the clause. He had no wish to charge anybody with a breach of faith; but, certainly, the course now taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite was a distinct departure from the understanding which he thought they had come to the other night. He had stated that treason was an offence which must be dealt with wherever it was committed. Whether a man went to Scotland, England, or Ireland, or to any other part of Her Majesty's Dominions, if he had committed treason, he was a person amenable to the law. He had stated that in the most open manner, and he had thought that hon. Gentlemen opposite, sitting below the Gangway, accepted it. Murder, instead of being a treasonable offence, was added afterwards, because it was suggested by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood) that a person who might be killed in an open boat on the high seas would not come within the operation of the clause. Now, if an Irishman killed a man anywhere, he was amenable to the law whenever he came back to his own country. That was the law at this moment, and a very proper law. It was the same with respect to treason. If a person committed treason against the Crown—if an English person committed the murder of another English subject, and either of those persons came within the jurisdiction of the Crown, he was amenable, and would be, and ought to be, punished. He submitted that it was necessary to have all crimes of that nature punished; and if it was impossible to obtain a fair and impartial trial in any particular part of Ireland, then the offender should be tried before this Special Commission Court sitting in some other part of Ireland. It seemed to him that that was a simple statement easily understood. The Bill only proposed to apply the well-known principles of the law—common to all the Three Kingdoms—to offences which came within the jurisdiction of the law in Ireland.

[Fourth Night.]

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he was not quite sure that the Home Secretary altogether carried out in this sub-section the promise he had given to the Committee, and he understood that there were several points upon which hon. Gentlemen opposite wished to have information. He gathered from the statement of the Attorney General that treason consisted of words spoken or articles written in a newspaper. If in either case the words, spoken or written, were treasonable, the man who spoke or wrote them might be tried for treason or treason-felony. But what he wanted to know was this. Suppose a man made a speech in Chicago, or California, or New Orleans, or New York, condemnatory of the Government, could that man be tried in Ireland for a speech thus made, on the ground of treason or treason-felony? That, he understood, was the point hon. Members wished to have clearly explained before they assented to the sub-section the Home Secretary proposed to add to the Bill. During the last two years speeches had been made in America, some of them by hon. Members of that House, which had been made the subject of adverse comment in the House. Was it possible for those hon. Gentlemen, if this Bill became law, to be tried in Ireland for treason or treason-felony? The English Government might have agents spread all over America. Although the Fenian agitation was not carried on very extensively there now, it still existed. The Government agents might, therefore, attend meetings, hear what was said, and then give a very imperfect report of what they had heard; and, on the evidence of these inefficient reporters, a trumped-up case might be made against a man, and he might be tried for treason or treason-felony in connection with a speech made under such circumstances in America. It was to prevent the possibility of such a circumstance taking place that the Committee wanted to know from the Government whether, in such a case, it was possible for a man to be tried in Ireland for treason or treason-felony owing to a speech he might have made, for instance, in Chicago?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no hesitation in answering that question. No man could be tried or convicted on an imperfect report of what he had said. In regard to speeches, the Committee had discussed that question at considerable length on the proposal to include treason and treason-felony in the Bill. It was not true that a man could be tried for any words he might utter, which—to repeat the phrase used by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen)—were strongly condemnatory of the Government. Certainly not; nor for words strongly condemnatory of the system of government. He had ventured to point out to the Committee, and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England had also pointed out, what the Law of Treason was in that respect. It had also been explained in regard to treason-felony and advised speaking, that the offence was limited to two years after the passing of the Act of 1848. Therefore, treason-felony, as defined in that Act, did not now exist; and as regarded treason, it must be coupled and directly connected with a design to attack the system of government in this country. Words spoken with such an object and intention were treason, wherever they were spoken; and it did not signify whether they were spoken in Ireland, England, or anywhere else. If a British subject, by speaking or writing, endeavoured to advise or persuade an invasion of this Realm by foreigners, that was treason; and it was treason wherever it was committed. If a subject of the Queen persuaded or advised, either by speaking or writing, foreigners to invade and attack the Realm, wherever he wrote or made his speech, he was guilty of treason; and if he subsequently came anywhere within the Dominions of the Queen he could be arrested, and was triable and ought to be convicted of treason. That was his (Sir William Harcourt's) opinion, and he had never concealed that opinion. They could not alter the Law of Treason, and, as far as he could see, there was nothing unreasonable in it. A subject of the Queen had no right to go to any part of the world and advise foreigners to invade the Realm and attack the settled system of government in this country. He had no more right to do that in America than he had to do it in England, Ireland, Scotland, or France. Every country must act on the principle of self-defence; and these were principles of self-defence which every Government must reserve to itself. He hoped that he had satisfactorily answered the question of the hon. Gentleman.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was this objection to the position in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had placed the matter. Any man who was guilty of treason in foreign parts against his own country, by words or writing, had a right to be tried by a jury of his countrymen when he returned to England. That was an element of the case which had been altogether left out of consideration by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. What was proposed to be done under this Bill was that a number of Judges in Ireland, who were Government nominees, and who in no way represented the country, should have the power of declaring and deciding absolutely upon a whole number of points which were involved in this clause. He should like the Committee to see the number of points involved. A man might be accused of having made a speech in New York, which was alleged to be treasonable. In order to be treasonable, the speech must have been in connection with a design to bring about an armed invasion by foreigners of the Queen's Dominions, for the purpose of oversetting the Queen's authority in Ireland or elsewhere. Therefore, these two or three Government nominees were in the same breath to decide that there was a design, that the speech was uttered in connection with that design, and that the words of the speech were words which, taken in connection with the design, amounted to an invitation to foreigners to invade the Realm. And this they were to decide without the protection of the common sense and the impartial mind of a jury. The Home Secretary passed over all that very lightly, with the simple observation that the nation was bound to defend itself against an individual guilty of such an act. Now, this was a Bill of a very exceptional character, and a Bill which was to apply only to Ireland. Then why did they not limit it, as much as possible, to what was absolutely necessary to meet the circumstances of the case? Why should they cast their net so widely, all over the world, in the chance of bringing in some one or two or three men as traitors, and punishing them without a jury, in case of their landing in Ireland? A clause of this kind was really only a trap and a net in which to catch the unwary. Where there was a real design for the invasion of Ireland by armed men from America, they might be perfectly sure that the conspirators would be real conspirators and real enemies of England, who would act in such a way that the nets of the Home Secretary would be spread for them in vain. If there were incitements to treason in speeches or writings in America, those speeches and absolute incitements would be made, probably, by the leaders of the organization in America, who need not have much fear of coming within the jurisdiction of this Act, for that sort of offence at any rate; but, on the other hand, a man in America—an Irish politician, for instance—might use very warm language denunciatory of the Government in Ireland; and he wanted to know what kind of denunciation would be safe from the mischievous misinterpretation of two or three partizan Judges in Ireland? If an Irishman in America were to say, for instance, that the Act of Union was only passed by force, would it be considered treason? Because it was a thing that might be said here in England by any man without putting himself in danger. There would be no fear whatever that any man would be brought before an English jury and condemned or convicted of treason for having uttered such a sentiment. But suppose a man said the same thing in America, and suppose some other man—some native Irish-American—should be present at the same public meeting, without having any other connection whatever with the Irish politician, and should declare that the circumstances under which English rule was established in Ireland were such as to deprive that rule of all right to obedience, and that the sooner such rule was put an end to by force the better, they might have a partizan Judge in Ireland putting together the speech of the American in the body of the hall, or on the platform, with that of the Irish politician, with whom he had no connection whatever, and, finding a certain amount of identity in the expression by which the Irish politician had condemned the means by which the Act of Union was brought about, he would at once declare that the speech was treasonable. Yet here, any ordinary English politician—the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, for instance—might in this country denounce the means which brought about the Union with perfect safety; and yet, merely because a solitary Irish-American added to the speech of the Irish politician a rider, declaring that the system which had been established ought to be put down by any means, they would have partizan Judges declaring that there was clear evidence of a design of a treasonable character against the Queen's government in Ireland; and, putting together the two speeches, it would be easy to make out a regular invitation to an armed force to invade Ireland, especially if the meeting was attended by any muster of armed forces, which was generally the case when any meeting was held in America in connection with the ordinary rites of citizenship. It was no unusual circumstance to have at such a meeting some 300,000 or 400,000 soldiers or State Militia; and it was just possible that a partizan Judge in Ireland would triumphantly parade that fact as a proof of the presence of armed men, and would say that Mr. A. B., the Member for so-and-so, in Ireland, had, in such an armed assembly, denounced the English rule as having been unjustly established in Ireland. The evident conclusion to which the partizan Judge would arrive was that this was treason, intended to incite armed men to put an end to English government in Ireland; and it was quite clear, therefore, that penal servitude would, in such a case, be the least result of the operation of this clause of the Bill, as it had been expounded by the Home Secretary. But he (Mr. O'Donnell) repeated that it was only unwary politicians who would be caught by the Bill—innocent men who would have no treasonable designs. Any man who had a treasonable design would take very great care that he did not express it in that way; he would know that it would be much safer to express it in quiet over a private breakfast-table in a secluded room, in some New York hotel or some New York mansion, in the presence of some half-dozen leaders of the Irish Brotherhood. And words uttered in that way would have ten times greater effect. But it was not against crime of that kind that the Bill was directed. Treason, under such circumstances, would be perfectly safe, and that was one great fault he found with the Bill. All through the Bill was an utterly ineffective one for the prevention of crime, while it would be exceedingly effective in putting down legitimate political agitation. He came now to the question of evidence. Upon what evidence would the charge be brought home? It was palpable that it would be upon the evidence of spies and informers, whose characters would be already blasted; and upon that ground alone it would be more valuable in the eyes of a partizan Judge. He could assure the Home Secretary that the stringent force of the Bill would lose nothing by leaving outside of it offences of that kind; while, by leaving them in, it was liable to create an enormous amount of disaffection, and was likely to afford facilities for the unjust punishment of moderate men. It must also be borne in mind that there was not a line in the proposed Amendment which was calculated to bring dangerous enemies of Her Majesty's Government to justice. The clause, as it stood, was directly aimed against public agitation. If the Irish people sent out a deputation to the United States, for the purpose of inducing the United States Government to undertake their friendly offices with England—in the same way that England proffered her friendly services to 'Turkey—there was hardly a sentence which such a deputation could utter, if they were reported to Irish partizan Judges, which would not subject them to conviction for treason, and to the punishment of penal servitude.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. O'Donnell

Mr. LABOUCHERE observed, that before the discussion ended, he desired to point out a mistake which he ventured to think the Government had made by putting in the same category such offences as treason and private crimes,

When the question of treason and treason-felony were under discussion, he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to state, in the first instance, that nobody could be prosecuted for treason on account of words spoken.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I never said so.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. and learned Gentleman said he never said so. If not, somebody else did; and the opinion was expressed from the Treasury Bench. No doubt, as the discussion went on, the Government were not prepared to stand by that opinion, and they were obliged to admit that, under certain circumstances, persons could be prosecuted for words spoken. They now heard from the Home Secretary what those circumstances were. "Words spoken," said the Home Secretary, "were not treasonable unless they were accompanied with a design to attack the country and the Constitution of the country." But, as he (Mr. Labouchere) understood it, the design was proved by the words, and consequently the Home Secretary was merely playing with words. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said now "that a man could be prosecuted for words spoken, and it was for the Judges to decide whether the words spoken were treasonable or not treasonable." The Home Secretary proposed to extend that view to words spoken even in America, and he asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he knew of any case in which an Englishman had ever been prosecuted for high treason for words spoken in America? Was such a case ever likely to occur; and, if not, what was the object of putting treason and treason-felony in the Bill? His (Mr. Labouchere's) opinion was that the real object was to create a vague dread in the minds of Irish gentlemen who might go over to America, that spies would follow them throughout their trip, take down their words, and report them to Her Majesty's Government.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he hoped his hon. Friend would allow him to correct him. The clause was not merely directed against words spoken, but it included an invitation made to attack the Realm. An English subject in America might, for instance, give a direct invitation to other persons to attack the Crown, and might assist in providing arms for an actual invasion. A British subject might be actively engaged in such a manner without having spoken treasonable words at all. He might form part of a battalion intended to invade the country, and the words in the clause were necessary, in order to provide against a case of that sort.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that if that were so, would the Home Secretary agree to an Amendment, stating that it should not be mere words, but acts, that constituted the offence? The Home Secretary said he was anxious to guard against a man who was providing arms, or taking actual steps for the invasion of England; and if that were all, he was sure that no hon. Member would object to the introduction of such a clause into the Bill. As the Bill was now drawn, its only effect would be to overawe a person who might be speaking in America at a moment of excitement, and who might, in that moment of excitement, use vague words which might be taken down by some spy. If such a case occurred, the person by whom they were uttered, on his return to Ireland, might possibly find himself arrested and taken before three Judges, and condemned to a disgraceful punishment on account of them. It was on that ground he thought the clause ought not to be introduced into the Bill. He had pointed that out to the Home Secretary when they were discussing the question of eliminating treason-felony from the clause. The Prime Minister said the next day that he could not yield the point, because he had no time in 24 hours to consult with the Irish Executive; but he suggested that the hon. Member who had moved the Amendment should bring the matter up again on the Report. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] He begged the Home Secretary's pardon; he thought he was stating what the Prime Minister said. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that it should be brought up on the Report. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No.] At any rate, the Prime Minister said that it could be brought up on the Report, and when he said that, it was next door to saying that it ought to be brought up. What the Prime Minister meant was this—"What is the good of discussing it now. I cannot yield at this moment. I do not say I am going to yield; but before the Report is taken I shall have time to consult with the Executive in Ireland, and I shall then be able to consider the matter after having had their Report, and say whether it is possible to yield on this question or not." It was very possible that the Irish Executive might declare that they found they could carry on the government of the country perfectly well without including treason-felony in the Bill; and, if so, what was the use of raising a discussion now upon the paragraph which the Home Secretary proposed to add to the Bill?

[Fourth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had only submitted this Proviso at the instance of hon. Gentlemen opposite. He would be perfectly willing to withdraw it, if it was the wish of the Committee.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought it would be much better that his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary should withdraw it. [Cries of "Agreed."] He did not know that it was agreed; and if the Home Secretary withdrew it, as a necessary consequence, the hon. Member who had proposed the original Amendment would withdraw that. If the question of treason-felony was to be deferred until the Report was brought up, there would unquestionably be an exhaustive discussion upon it. He certainly failed to see that the introduction of the paragraph now would accomplish any such object, and he thought it would be better to accept the offer of the Home Secretary to withdraw it. He took it that hon. Members did not want the question to be prejudiced by the paragraph of the Home Secretary being accepted without the Amendment proposed to it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he was somewhat surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who was not altogether inexperienced in the ways of the world, should advise the hon. Member to withdraw the Amendment. That was exactly what the Home Secretary wanted. The position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was this. He understood that hon. Members on that side of the House objected to certain provisions of the Bill as being too large. The right hon. and learned Gentleman with frankness said—"Your objection is a reasonable one, and I will limit the operation of the Bill by bringing in a new clause."

Mr. Labouchere

In redeeming that undertaking the right hon. and learned Gentleman brought in a clause which left the jurisdiction exactly as it was, or, if it did anything at all, it enlarged it. And this was the way in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman met the demand that the Bill should be limited instead of extended. It had been suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) that some Irish Members in America might be induced, in the excitement of the moment, to utter words for which they would afterwards be sorry; but anyone who had been in America would know very well that if a man, in addressing a public meeting there, got into a state of excitement, that excitement was soon knocked out of him by the cool and collected and intelligent audience he found himself addressing. It was suggested that a shorthand writer might follow a Member in America. He wished he could be sure of that, because the right hon. and learned Gentleman would then be able to base the accusations made against Irish Members upon accurate reports, and not upon the reports which appeared in the American newspapers, which were most incorrect and misleading. The Committee had now this advantage. They had arrived at a clear understanding that spoken words could constitute treason. That, however, was not the admission of the Government at the commencement of the discussion. At the beginning their contention was that the clause was very limited in its application; that treason and treason-felony were offences well-defined and fixed by Statute, and that words spoken could by no chance come within the meaning of treason-felony. After that several explanations were given. The Attorney General said that words uttered at a meeting would not be treason, except under certain circumstances. The Home Secretary thereupon took the same line and said that words could not constitute treason, "except under certain circumstances." But all this meant that words could constitute treason, and that a judgment as to the circumstances would vary according to the heat or frigidity of the political circumstances of the time. The Government had now exposed the true meaning of the clause and had put a full interpretation upon it. He had certainly known instances in America where persons, carried away by excitement, had made foolish and vehement speeches; but the persons by whom such speeches were made were generally either not particularly sane, or particularly foolish, and not altogether sober. In some of those speeches an immediate invasion of this country had been recommended; but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman had himself been in America at the time they were made, he would not have been likely to take much notice of them. Certainly, this clause against treason and treason-felony was not required in order to deal with folly of that kind; but the truth of the matter was that this sub-section was not asked for in order that it might be put in force against persons who were asking for an invasion of England. What it was intended to meet was the case of persons who were conducting Constitutional agitation, and who, by a fraudulent interpretation of the clause, in a time of political excitement, would be brought under its operation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that he was in the habit daily of reading columns of matter in the Irish and Irish-American papers, advocating the invasion of this country. He did not wish to cross-examine the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but he should like to ask him if they were Irish newspapers in which he read trash of that kind? Could he name three newspapers in Ireland in which such advice was given; and could he name three Irish-American newspapers which recommended any such course of action out of the 65 Irish-American newspapers which existed in various parts of the United States? Because, out of that large total, the Home Secretary found one or two, or perhaps three—he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman could find so many—which occasionally advised such insane projects as the invasion of this country and the resort to atrocious crime, the right hon. and learned Gentleman formed a bad estimate of Irish-American character. The estimate the right hon. and learned Gentleman had formed of the Irish people in America was one of the most inaccurate, fallacious, and most blinding that ever occurred to the mind of man. The Irish people in America were by far the most intelligent portion of the Irish public in any part of the world. Any man speaking before them had to employ much more moderate language than he would be required to use on the floor of the House of Commons or in addressing his countrymen in his own country. The larger portion of the Irish people in America had gradually, under the free institutions and large advantages and prospects of that country, become owners of property, and, as a consequence, were Conservative; and all this bugaboo about infernal machines was about as fanciful, as unrealistic, as many of the scenes in “Babil and Bijou,” and other extravaganzas.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member knew a great deal about America and the Irish in America, and what did he say? He said there were not more than two or three newspapers who advised the invasion of England and the commission of atrocious crime. He would accept that. But the two or three newspapers must be written for a certain clientèle. There must be a certain number of persons to whom such sentiments must be palatable.

MR. T. P. O’CONNOR: I do not think there are three such papers; there are only two.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if there were only two of these papers there must be a certain number of people for whom these inflammatory articles were written. What he wanted was, that when the people who wrote the articles advising an invasion of this Realm and a resort to atrocious crime, and the people who found these newspapers palatable, and for whom they were written, came within the Queen’s Dominions they should be made amenable to this law. He was not prepared to say that these people formed the majority of the Irish in America; they might be a minority, but the law must control even a minority. The hon. Member might put the number of such people as low as he liked. If there was only one man of this kind, the Bill would be necessary to deal with that one man. [“Oh!”] Why, he was always being taunted with paying too much attention to one man—Mr. O’Donovan Rossa—but they had not forgotten that he was elected by an Irish constituency. They knew that Mr. O’Donovan Rossa was elected by an Irish constituency on account of the very utterance of atrocious sentiments. [An hon. MEMBER: He was in an English gaol.] He might be mistaken about that; but, at all events, they knew that he was elected. What he (Sir William Harcourt) wanted to point out was, that if there be any number of people, be that number large or small, who, being subjects of the Queen, were engaged in designs of a treasonable character or designs for the promotion of atrocious crime, those people should, no matter where those designs were carried on, and no matter whether they were carried on by acts or words or writing, when they came within the jurisdiction of the English law—let it be in England, Ireland, or Scotland—be made answerable for their conduct.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had now discovered a new kind of treason or treason-felony; he had discovered that not only was the man who wrote a treasonable article in a newspaper, but the man who read the article, guilty of treason or treason-felony.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not mean to say that. He was only answering the argument of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). What he said was, that there must be a good many people who were favourable to these designs, or else treasonable articles would not be written.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman stated that it was only right to bring all these people within the scope of this law. He made no distinction between the man who wrote a treasonable article and the man who read it. However, it seemed quite clear that the further they went the more dangerous became the clause which provided for the trial of persons charged with treason or treason-felony to be tried by a Court composed solely of Judges. The more they heard the offence defined the more difficult it was to understand the definition. Look how treason had gone up in the last few nights! A few nights ago they were told that no words could constitute treason, unless they were connected with some deed being done, or some deed already done. If a man, for instance, merely gave the word of command in a treasonable insurrection, that, of course, would be treason. To-night they heard that mere words, apart from any deed being done or being prepared, might constitute treason. The doctrine was certainly prevailing in the Committee at this moment that words, even though they could not be brought into connection with certain deeds, might be considered treasonable. Suppose a man went to America, and made on some public platform a foolish speech, in which he said—"I wish you Americans would invade Great Britain, and form a Republic there;" although there might be no treasonable organization, although there might be no idea on the part of anybody to invade England, that man, having made that speech to an American audience, could, when he returned, be tried before this jury of Judges on the charge of treason, because he had incited a foreigner to invade England. Almost any rhetorical flourish, however absurd, might render a man liable to be tried under this clause for treason; it might be argued a man meant treason when he merely threw idle words in the air. Now, an ordinary jury would easily see whether a man had been talking nonsense. There was no army in the field; there was no organization being prepared; and, therefore, such a jury would say these idle words were simply called aloud to solitude and were not treasonable. But he could easily imagine that three Irish Judges would consider that mere words alone constituted treason, and that they would convict this foolish orator. That was the substantial danger of this clause, and, therefore, every effort should be made to limit the force of the clause, by striking out those offences which came under the head of treason or treason-felony, and such crimes which were made up partly by law and partly by the interpretations of men.

MR. LALOR said, they did not desire that a man who had been guilty of treason should not be brought to trial; but what they wished was that he should receive a fair and impartial trial. It was contended that a man who committed treason or treason-felony in Ireland, and the man who committed the same offence in America, were, in being tried by this Special Commission, placed upon an equal footing. That was not the case. A man who was accused of treason or treason-felony in Ireland had his witnesses about him, and he could call evidence as to character, or to refute the charge preferred against him. The man, however, who had committed treason or treason-felony in America had no one to call on his behalf, but he was completely in the hands of Government officials. The Judges, who, under this clause, were both Judges and jurors, the head officials who conducted the prosecution on behalf of the Crown, and the witnesses themselves, were all the paid officials of the Government. How could any man of common sense believe that an accused man would stand in the same position, under such an arrangement, as he would if he were tried under the old system of trial by 12 of his own countrymen?

MR. BIGGAR said, he could not understand why the Government should adhere so tenaciously to the retention of the words "treason or treason-felony" in the clause. It was notorious that for more than 10 or 12 years there had been no prosecutions for treason or treason-felony in Ireland or in England. In point of fact, it was so rare an offence that it was hardly worth taking into consideration. It was a much different matter when they talked of the possibility of a person being prosecuted for an offence of treason or treason-felony committed in America or in any part of the world. There had been no case, certainly in the memory of any person now living, in which a person had been prosecuted in this Realm for an offence committed so far away as America. The Government were not acting a very judicious part in occupying time in a discussion of this kind, because there was no probability that any prosecution ever could or ever would take place under the provisions of this part of the Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Lalor) put the case very strongly as to the reasonableness of trying a man by jury for words alleged to have been spoken in America. It was only in regard to words that this part of the Bill would apply. If a person were engaged in a conspiracy to commit an outrage or outrages in the shape of murder or any other serious crime, he would come under another part of the Bill. The evidence which could be brought against a man for words spoken in America would necessarily be of a very meagre character, and, therefore, it seemed unfair that he should have to submit to such a trial as was proposed in the Bill. The reports of speeches in the American papers were but summaries, and it was almost impossible to find from them what it was a man really intended to say. If the witnesses against the accused were to select certain passages out of a long speech, the accused would be put in a very unfair position, seeing, as he had said, that as a rule there was no reporter present to take a verbatim note. It would be perfectly impossible for the prisoner to give proper evidence, and to say to what extent his remarks had been fairly reported. Of course, it could not be alleged that in any of the cases a full report could be supplied by the Government; they would simply offer in evidence the passages of a speech which suited their purpose, and the prisoner would have no chance of obtaining a fair trial. The Government were acting very unreasonably in standing so firmly by this part of the clause.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, it struck him it would be well to allow the two lines to be withdrawn altogether, because they could discuss the question much better on Report.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was induced to say a few words by the observations which fell from the Home Secretary. It was quite evident the Home Secretary had an entirely exaggerated opinion of the influence of Mr. O'Donovan Rossa. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said Mr. O'Donovan Rossa was elected by an Irish constituency on account of his incitements to atrocious crime. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was entirely unacquainted with the career of Mr. O'Donovan Rossa. The period of Mr. O'Donovan Rossa's incitations to atrocious crime was quite recent. He was not condemned for any crime of an atrocious character; but he was condemned as an ordinary rebel, as one of the Fenian conspirators. He was elected for the county of Tipperary in consequence, above all things, of the reports which were prevalent throughout Ireland—reports which were afterwards confirmed by an examination into prison management—as to the barbarous manner in which he was treated in prison. The man came out of gaol with a mind soured and embittered to desperation, and his present tendencies dated from his barbarous treatment in an English convict prison. He assured the right hon. and learned Gentleman that his continual reference to Mr. O'Donovan Rossa and to Mr. O'Donovan Rossa's paper was the subject of much good-humoured comment amongst every class of Americans—not only Americans, but Irish-Americans—and he (Mr. O'Donnell) did believe that the solitary and wretched newspaper that was brought out by Mr. O'Donovan Rossa was mainly supported—as it was certainly mainly advertised—by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. Every time there was an attack upon Mr. O'Donovan Rossa and his trivial paper there was an article in the following number, headed something after this fashion—“The British Home Secretary trying to trample on O'Donovan Rossa.” “O'Donovan Rossa defies the Home Secretary.” And but for this continual interchange of compliments between the Home Secretary and the editor of The United Irishman, The United Irishman would have failed long since. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary desired to put down in a practical form Mr. O'Donovan Rossa's treason, let him cut short his supply of references to O'Donovan Rossa and his paper. He thought that within three months of the imposition of that silence The United Irishman would cease to exist, and, consequently, all foundation for the terrors of the Home Secretary would cease to exist also.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. HEALY pointed out, that not only did O'Donovan Rossa live on the Home Secretary, but the Home Secretary lived on O'Donovan Rossa. The admiration of one gentleman for the other was quite mutual.

MR. LEAMY wished to remind the Committee that Tipperary elected O'Donovan Rossa for the very same reason that Meath elected Mr. Michael Davitt.

MR. NORWOOD rose to Order. He appealed to the Chairman to say whether it was proper they should hear the history of O'Donovan Rossa? For the last 10 minutes they had heard of nothing but O'Donovan Rossa.

THE CHAIRMAN: I was about to explain that we are straying from the clause. Perhaps hon. Members will keep to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. LEAMY said, that if he had erred, he had erred in good company. He was simply addressing himself to a point raised by the Home Secretary, who stated to the Committee that O'Donovan Rossa was elected by Tipperary because of the incitements made in his paper to atrocious crimes. That was not the fact.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already said that the discussion is proceeding upon an individual, and not upon the Amendment.

MR. LEAMY said, he had no intention to contest the ruling of the Chairman; but he wished to remind the Committee that they had been told by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that the existence of a man like O'Donovan Rossa would be good ground for bringing in a Bill like the present. The Home Secretary had also said that words alone could not be considered treasonable, unless they were coupled with some act against the Sovereign or Government of this country. When a statement of that kind was made, English Members were inclined to think there could not possibly be any danger to a law-abiding man; but they had been accustomed, within the last three or four months, to hear in that House the Law Officers of the Crown get up and quote portions of speeches made by Irishmen in Ireland and in America, and say—“This is a proof of treason and of treasonable designs.” They had heard quoted a speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), in which he said he would never have gone into the Land League—he would never have taken off his coat—unless there was something behind the Land League movement; and they had been told that this was an indication that the hon. Member looked upon the Land League movement as a treasonable movement, or a movement for treasonable objects. He (Mr. Leamy) did not want to shield any man for what he said in America. He would condemn any man who would go to America and say on a platform there what he would not say on a platform in Ireland. They should ascertain once for all from the Home Secretary whether anything a man could say on an American platform in denunciation of the system of government in Ireland could be coupled with a remark made by some excited person in the crowd? [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: No.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman said “No;” but he (Mr. Leamy) remembered very well that during the course of the prosecutions against the Traversers, in Dublin, some time ago, the then Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law), in citing the speeches of the accused, laid great stress upon remarks made in the crowd—such as “Kill him!” “Shoot him!” “Give him lead!”—remarks which, possibly, were never heard by the speaker on the platform. The speaker on the platform was occupied with his own thoughts, and anxious to make his words heard by a great mass of human beings, and could not heed every interruption made in the crowd; but the Attorney General sought to connect the speaker with all the men in the meeting, who said indiscreet things, and who might have been sent there for the very purpose of giving some treasonable or murderous colour to the language used. They ought to know whether it was the intention of the Government, whenever a man went to America on a political errand, to send out one or two detectives to take down every word he said, in order to bring them up against him hereafter.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 128; Noes 25: Majority 103.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

MR. HEALY said, he had now an Amendment to propose, as a protest against the way in which the Government had dealt with the clause. He denied that he had been guilty of a breach of faith in not accepting the Amendment; and his present Amendment was to provide that no person should be tried by the Special Commission Court for treason or treason-felony committed out of Ireland. Every man who voted against such an Amendment would be voting in the teeth of the Bill. It was alleged that the Bill was framed to put down crime in Ireland; and he now proposed that treason or treason-felony committed out of Ireland should not be dealt with under the Bill. A number of Gentlemen in the House objected to treason or treason-felony being in the Bill at all. How much more strongly ought those Gentlemen to be opposed to treason or treason-felony committed out Ireland coming within the purview of the Bill! The position which those Gentlemen took up on Thursday and Friday last was greatly strengthened and reinforced by the proposition he now made. The refusal of the Government to accept his Amendment would only show their hypocrisy in asserting that this was a Bill to deal with crime in Ireland. Coercion Acts in Ireland, from the very beginning, had not been aimed at crime; but they had been crutches to enable the British Government to creep along in Ireland, and the present Bill would very properly be styled—“A Bill for the better enabling the Queen’s Government to govern Foreigners.”

Amendment proposed,

“At the end of the Clause, to add the words “provided also that no person shall be tried by the said Court for treason or treason-felony committed out of Ireland.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. ARTHUR O’CONNOR said, that not merely as a protest, and not in order to exhibit the hypocrisy of the Government, but on the merits of the proposal itself, he was disposed to support the proposition of his hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Wexford did not ask that persons guilty of treason or treason-felony in America, or in any other country, should go scot-free when they came within the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts; but he asked that the jurisdiction of this particular Court should be limited to crimes committed in the country for which the Court was provided. He put it to the Law Officers of the Crown, was there anything unreasonable in such a proposition? The whole history, for instance, of the Law of Libel in this country was one long struggle between the Judges on the one side and the juries on the other. Judges were emphatic in their ruling as to what was and what was not seditious libel and what was and what was not treason. He believed that one of the Judges who presided at the trial of the seven Bishops declared that nothing written constituted the offence of treason; but as late as the year 1808, a man was prosecuted and, he thought, convicted, because he dared write against flogging in the Army. One of the Judges in that case decided that the man was stirring up sedition against the military authorities of the Crown. All the opinions and judgments of Judges in such matters as treason and libel had been of a strained character; and if it had not been for the protection which juries afforded to the people of this country, they would not, in matters relating to treason and libel, be in the position of freedom which was at present enjoyed. What his hon. Friend asked was, that if men were to be tried in Ireland for treason, they should only be tried by Judges in cases where the offences were committed in Ireland; that the men who were charged with treasonable practices in America should have the benefit of trial by jury. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) was perfectly convinced that the men brought before a jury in Ireland for offences committed in America would have a fair and impartial trial. It was quite conceivable that language of a dangerous and inflammatory character, and language which might reasonably be put down as treasonable and as marking treasonable designs, would, if used in Ireland, be open to a totally different significance to what it would if used in America, and a jury would judge of that fact. They could hardly expect Judges to take the same view of such matters as juries. He believed that Judges trying men for seditious or treasonable language in Ireland would almost invariably find them guilty where juries would not. He should certainly support the Amendment, if his hon. Friend pressed it to a division.

[Fourth Night.]

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 22; Noes 131: Majority 109.—(Div. List, No. 109.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

DR. COMMINS said, in the Preamble it was alleged that—

"By reason of the action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland the operation of the ordinary law has become insufficient for the repression and prevention of crime, and it is expedient to make further provision for that purpose."

He was of opinion that the ordinary law was amply sufficient for the prevention and repression of crime in Ireland, without the enactment of such a provision as was contained in this clause. He believed that if the 1st clause was enacted, it would be entirely inefficient for the purpose it was expected to serve; and, furthermore, he considered it would do an enormous amount of harm. He opposed it for three reasons—namely, that it was not necessary, that it would be quite inefficient, and that it would fail in its administration and in promoting the peace and good government of the country. What was the defect that was supposed to exist in the ordinary law which made this clause necessary? It was alleged that juries could not be got to convict where sufficient evidence was brought before them; and the cases in which this was supposed to take place were those of treason or treason-felony, murder or manslaughter, attempts to kill, aggravated crime of violence against the person, arson, and attack on dwelling-houses. Now, all these offences were what were technically known in the law as felonies; and in all cases of felony the Crown had the power of challenge. Unless the whole population of Ireland was hostile to the Government, there was nothing easier than for the Government to get an impartial jury to try any case. Whenever a man was indicted for treason or treason-felony, or, indeed, for any offence mentioned in the clause, the Crown had unlimited right of challenge. Nominally, the right was limited; but practically, it was unlimited. The Crown might summon any number of jurymen, and jurymen were selected from the very best of the middle-class people. Such people were the least likely to be influenced by any hostile feelings to the Government; they were the least likely to be implicated in any treasonable or seditious conspiracies; they were the people who had the most respect for life and property; and unless the Government was thoroughly hated and detested by even such people, the Government could very easily select an impartial jury, who would try according to the evidence, and would only convict if there was evidence on which they could convict. What arguments had been advanced, and what figures adduced, to show that Irish juries had abstained from doing their duty in ordinary cases, such as those enumerated in the clause? They had, undoubtedly, heard of a certain number of acquittals—a number disproportionate to the cases brought to trial—but that proved nothing at all. He would not trouble the Committee by going over the figures; but in no single case had anything been adduced to show that a jury had acquitted a prisoner when they ought to have convicted him; in no case whatever had it been shown that a jury neglected to convict on evidence on which any honest persons would have convicted. In order to show that, not only ought the evidence to be produced, but it should be shown that the evidence was that of credible witnesses. What was the fact in Ireland? In most of the cases, nay, in every one of the cases about which complaint had been made, the evidence had been that of the spy, of the informer, of the perjured witness. Informers were not unknown in England; but in cases where persons were indicted solely upon the evidence of an informer—a class of men who enticed people to commit crime, and afterwards betrayed them—the Judge, in England, invariably directed the jury to acquit the prisoner, unless the evidence of the informer was corroborated in some material point, and the juries had very justly and properly refused to convict. But what the Judges in England would have told them to do the Judges in Ireland had condemned them for doing. In Ireland the Judges had gone so far as to tell the jurymen that they were perjured—that they had no respect for their oaths—and in one particular case he had in his mind the jury were turned out of the box, and the Judge had said to them—“You are a disgrace to your country, and I will not try another case before you.” Words to that effect had been addressed to a Cork jury because they had refused to convict on the evidence of informers. What did the Bill propose to do? It proposed to hand over the trial of prisoners to Judges who might have that opinion of the evidence of informers, which was in conflict with the opinion of the Judges of England, to Judges who had already shown that they were in entire disagreement with that which was not only the law of England, but one of the most fundamental principles of the law of England. It proposed to take away from accused persons a protection which they at present enjoyed, and to hand over to those who would be looked on more in the light of accusers than jurors unchecked power of conviction, and of sending people to the gallows even. He (Dr. Commins) entirely dissented from this, believing that it would do more harm than good. In every case where the evidence of impartial, credible witnesses could be got, and where the evidence of the informers was corroborated in important particulars, impartial juries could be obtained, because in cases of this kind the Government had practically unlimited power of challenge. The Government could challenge a Cork jury, for instance, so that 12 impartial men could be found; therefore, he contended, this Bill was unnecessary. It would do no good, and, whilst it would not tend in any way to bring a guilty person to justice, it would do a great deal of mischief. It would render convictions possible in cases where the evidence adduced against the prisoner was that of informers, and informers alone, and where the charge was one of inciting discontent, if they would, against the Government, which was only a political matter. The Bill would render convictions possible in these cases, and it would furnish an inducement to the spy, the informer, the sower of sedition, the man who got up secret conspiracies and afterwards betrayed his friends, if he could foresee that the jury would not stand between him and his victim, and that he would earn a high reward. The Bill would do more to cause crime than it would do to prevent it, and it would strike at the root, not only of individual liberty, but of all political liberty in Ireland. If it were true that conspiracies existed in Ireland—and he was afraid there was some truth in it—so long as the informer could bring his enemy, or the person he had marked out as the means of earning a certain amount of money, before a Judge, with no jury between himself and his victim, private liberty would be unknown. Every person who entertained a private grudge against a person, or who had private malice to gratify, would have a new means offered him of satisfying his revenge, and at the same time of filling his pocket. Nor was that all. The encroachments of Governments on the liberties of the people had only been prevented by juries standing between them and the public in the case of political offences. These offences would, in the future, in Ireland be tried by the new Commission. Cases of treason and treason-felony would be tried by the new Commission, which offences had been, justly or unjustly, assumed to be political offences—at all events, they bore a political aspect. The object of the Government was to convict at any price. They had had social disturbances and political disturbances in England, not much, if anything, better than that which at present existed in Ireland. They had had conspiracies to murder in this country, and nothing could be proved to be in existence in Ireland now, or to have been in existence during the past 20 years, worse than the Bath Fields Conspiracy or Cato Street Conspiracy to murder every one of the Ministers of the Crown; but, in spite of the conspiracies in England, there had been no attempt made to take away from the British public their right of trial by jury. The Government had respected the function of juries, and had found the ordinary law sufficient to put down sedition. Why did not the Government trust to the ordinary law? Why should they seek to take away from the people of Ireland that one protection which had always been found to be of such advantage, and to which the people of England owed the liberty they now enjoyed? Why should they seek to take away this protection without giving it a full and fair trial? No doubt, they expected great results from the issue of these Special Commissions; but Special Commissions bore a very bad odour in Ireland. They had been generally introduced in times of popular commotion, and their operations had had the effect of making the people distrust the Government more, and place themselves against the administration of the law. The first of them, probably, was Cromwell's High Commission Court—and he was afraid the Irish people would be inclined to associate the present High Commission Court with that of Cromwell, which was a travelling Assize going about the country to try persons for treason as it was understood in those days. Cromwell's High Commission hanged and transported with such vigour that the Courts earned for themselves the name of "Cromwell's Slaughter-Houses." Unless the Commission to be appointed under the present Bill was better than they had reason to expect it would be, it would earn a similar reputation. The people of Ireland could not trust it. What would these new Courts do? They would go back to the speeches made by the Judges at the opening of the Assizes, which speeches were occasionally quoted in that House. He would defy any grand juror in the House to refer to any single instance, within his own knowledge, in which an English Judge, in opening any Assize in an English Assize town, had delivered a political speech denouncing a certain political Party in the country, and telling them that the petty jurors were men who were determined not to perform their duty and not to observe their oaths. And yet that had been done over and over again within the past few years by the Judges in Ireland. It was an offence against good taste, to say the least of it; and anyone who read The Life of Lord Campbell would notice there an account of a speech in which he had denounced this practice on the part of the Irish Judges. The noble Lord had condemned the system of the Irish Judges using their position as Judges on the Bench to deliver inflammatory political harangues denouncing the popular movement of the time and the Leaders of that movement, whoever it or they might be—in fact, by their action teaching the people to distrust the law they (the Judges) administered, and the Government they served. This offence, he contended, had been most flagrant of late years. The Irish Judges, with very few exceptions, had, through their political harangues delivered on the Bench within the last three or four years, made the people of Ireland thoroughly and entirely distrust them; and the people would distrust any Commission in which the power of life and death and the power over liberty was handed over to the Judges without any check, and without any of the safeguards that were to be found in trial by jury in England. On these grounds he said that this section of the Bill was a mistake. It was entirely unnecessary. It would never effect the purpose it was intended to effect, because the people would have no confidence in it or in the Court that it would establish. It would do a great deal of harm; it would add to the distrust of the Government, and to the discontent that existed. It would add to the present unwillingness of the people to assist the administration of the law, as it would impress upon them the belief that the law itself was unjust. He believed it was a retrograde step, and would do a great deal of harm.

Mr. Arthur O'Connor

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he supported the proposition of his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon, although he knew the result was foregone. The clause would be adopted and the Bill would be passed, whatever it contained. But he had the strongest possible objection to the abolition of trial by jury; and on every occasion when he could do so in accordance with the Rules of the House, he would lodge his protest against this most illiberal and reactionary proposition. Nothing had astonished him more during this debate than the loose way in which professing Liberals had talked of trial by jury. One hon. Gentleman had described it as a prejudice. He confessed he had no objection to a good wholesome prejudice, especially if it was a prejudice in favour of freedom. He trusted the prejudice in favour of trial by jury might never die out in England; for, if it did, they might bid a long good-bye to liberty. Another hon. Member had described it as pedantry. This was the same sort of charge that was made against Lord William Russell on his trial for participation in the Rye House Plot. He was sufficiently pedantic to defend the liberties of his native land. It was to be hoped that pedantry of that kind would increase and never diminish. He objected to the abolition of trial by jury because it would demoralize the people and discredit the Judicial Bench. It would demoralize the people, because it would destroy their confidence in the institutions of the country and in the administration of justice. Whatever some hon. Gentlemen behind him might think—however much they might object to it—there was a feeling in favour of trial by jury amongst the mass of the people in this country that amounted almost to a superstition. They believed that no honest trial could take place without a jury. That opinion had saturated the public mind, and any trial that took place, or any decision that could be arrived at, without the instrumentality of a jury would give no satisfaction to the public. They would not be content with it, and there would be a belief that the decisions arrived at by the Judges were foregone conclusions, and that the Judges were not sent out to try cases, but were sent out to convict. That would be the most demoralizing impression they could convey to the community with respect to the administration of law. In Ireland they were in this most unhappy condition, that the chief officers of the Government were not safe. There was no use in disguising it. It was a humiliating confession to have to make, and it was hard and painful to have to discuss it, but it was true. Officials in Ireland did not feel themselves at liberty to walk abroad as they did in England. The chief officers in Ireland, like the Russian Governors of Poland, had to be guarded; and now, not only the chief officials, but the Judges also, would have to be guarded. They (the Committee) would have to bring themselves face to face with the fact. If these Judges were to try prisoners without juries, the feeling would be as strong against them as it was against the officials of the English Government in Ireland. They had some difficulty in protecting the Viceroy, but it would be still more difficult to protect the Judges. But this abolition of trial by jury would have a demoralizing effect on the Judges themselves, who were anxious to elevate the character of the Judicial Bench. He did not mean to say that it would affect the Judges in the trial of ordinary cases, for the Irish Judges in these matters were just as dependable as English Judges; but there was an unpleasant belief that Judges in Ireland, in trials for political offences, had not been so impartial, and that was incidental to the condition of the country. It was not so very long since the same impression prevailed with regard to the Judges in Great Britain. There was a story told in Lord Cockburn's Memoirs of the troubles in Scotland in 1759, when, at a trial in Edinburgh, one of the Judges sitting on the Bench was reported to have called out—"Come awa', Mr. Smith, and help us to hang these scoondrels." The feeling still lingered in Ireland, and it was greatly to the credit of the Irish Judges that they wished to shake themselves from it. The most complimentary thing that could be said of the Irish Judges was that they had remonstrated against having these new duties cast upon them; and, if these duties were cast on them, it would intensify the prejudice against them, and in that sense, he said, this clause would be injurious to the Bench as well as to the community. There was a statement often made in this House—that the Irish people were in sympathy with crime. He believed that statement to be incorrect. They were not in sympathy with crime, but in sympathy with the people they believed to be suffering injustice.

The object of hon. Members, the object of all legislation and of all Governments, should be to enlist the Irish people on behalf of the law; but, instead of that, they were driving them into antagonism to the law. The people of England had faith in the Judicial Bench and in the integrity of its administration; therefore, it was sustained in this country. But in Ireland the people had not that feeling. Hon. Members could not expect that Judges would convict without evidence any more than juries would; and how, he would ask, were they to get the necessary evidence? Where was it to be found? He feared it would be true of the present Government, as it had been of previous Governments, that they would manufacture the evidence, and that they would use instruments and machinery in connection with this matter that they would not use in other cases. They would manufacture the evidence in this sense—that their spies, informers, and others, would incite persons to join secret societies. In the history of Ireland during the past 20 years, they had numerous instances of this kind of thing; for instance, they had seen men pretend to become members of the Catholic Church, and take the most sacred sacraments of that Church, for the purpose of winning the confidence of people whom they afterwards betrayed. There were the well-known cases of Talbot, Corydon, and others; and in the future, as in the past, the Government, if they did not secure the confidence of the people, would be compelled, in order to obtain convictions, to use such instrumentality as the evidence of these men. He maintained that it was discreditable to any Government to have to use such means. They did not use them in England, because the people were in sympathy with the law of the land; and rather than use them in Ireland, and rather than use these exceptional measures, he should think it would be better to tolerate a certain measure of crime. He said “these exceptional measures;” but this measure was scarcely exceptional, because in 80 years they had had 50 Bills, more or less, of this sort—for 50 years they had been disturbing the ordinary channels of the operation of the law in Ireland. Let hon. Members think what would be the feeling of the common people of England regarding the laws if in 80 years they had had 50 Coercion Acts! He held that it would be infinitely better that a certain measure of crime should escape punishment than that the people should lose all confidence in the law and regard for the Government. The end they should strive to attain might, by the process he was recommending, be long in coming, but, when attained, it would be more steady and more satisfactory than the end which could attend the passage of such Bills as this. On these grounds, he objected to all special legislation of this kind, and particularly he objected to the suspension of trial by jury. He should vote against the clause. Some hon. Members sitting on that (the Ministerial) side, however, spoke of the Bill and of the clause with confidence; but those hon. Members were not infallible. Members of the present Government were not infallible; and he would remind them that the 50 Coercion Bills which had been passed in 80 years, and which contained powers such as were contained in this clause, had failed in the past. This measure would fail in the future; and as they had been mistaken in their coercive legislation last year, so would events prove them to be mistaken in the policy of coercion they were adopting now.

MR. MOORE said, that, as one of those who was not prepared to vote against every species of exceptional legislation, owing to the disturbed state of Ireland, he rose to state his objection to this clause. He felt very deeply, for reasons which had been described much more eloquently by others than he could describe them, that this clause was calculated to destroy the confidence of the Irish people in the administration of the law. There was not too much confidence in the administration of the law in that country at present, for it was always a difficult thing to inspire it in a case where a strong country was governing a weak one. In spite of the respect and regard in which many of the Irish Judges were held, still the general administration of the law did not stand so high as they could wish in the minds of the people. It was not that he, for one moment, feared that the measure would be administered unjustly. The history of the suspension of trial by jury in Ireland showed that it was more difficult to convince three Judges than to convince a jury of 12 of a prisoner's fellow-countrymen. He did not, then, fear that injustice would be done; but he feared that confidence would be permanently destroyed in the administration of the law. Moreover, he did not think the Government had a right to come down to the House and ask for so sweeping a power as this, until they had exhausted every other means of procuring convictions. He should not like to return to the old system of selection, to see a man brought up, as under the old system, to be tried by a selected jury, or one poor man brought up to be tried by a number of rich men, totally different to him in position and sympathies. He thought that would be a mistake, and that it was possible to get a fair jury by other and simpler means, and until that course had been adopted he did not think Her Majesty's Government had a right to come to the House and ask for the wholesale abolition of trial by jury. He did not think the proposal would be made, except in deference to the widespread and deep excitement that permeated this country, owing to the recent painful occurrence which they all regretted so much. He did not think failures of justice were so general in Ireland as many people believed them to be. There had been a great many heavy convictions in Ireland during recent years. Mr. Blake, whom hon. Gentlemen opposite very frequently held up in anything but a favourable light, and who was not a weak-kneed supporter of law and order in Ireland, had written to the effect that he had seen a large number of acquittals, but, at the same time, he had seen very many convictions, and not a few criminals severely punished, and even hanged; and he did not think the acquittals had been so universal as to warrant the abolition of the jury system altogether. That was the opinion of Mr. Blake. This question had been very lightly handled by the Government. Even during these days of excitement, some extraordinary convictions had taken place. There had been one in Dublin in connection with a murder popularly attributed to some secret organization. A man had been brought to justice almost within the present month. Again, during the very height of the excitement, a landlord had been fired at in County Cavan; a man had been arrested for the crime, tried in an adjoining county, found guilty, and sentenced to, he thought, 20 years' penal servitude. There was, in certain districts, some local sympathy with certain descriptions of crime; but he was sure it was not general throughout the country. There was no sympathy with great and serious crime; and if they eliminated the element of terrorism, no sympathy with crime would prevent justice being done under the system of trial by jury. He believed that if they removed that element of terrorism they would obtain convictions, and they could do that by changing the venue and carrying accused persons from one county to another. Of course, he should not like to see the system of changing the venue abused—he should not like to see, for instance, a Roman Catholic taken to a heated Orange county to be tried; that would be a gross abuse of the power. But by proper discrimination in the change of venue, and by grouping the counties, as was done in the case of Winter Assizes, they could secure fair and honest juries of a man's peers, and justice would be done. He thought the Government ought to exhaust every means in their power before they came to the House and asked for these exceptional powers; but, if they persisted in their demand for this clause, at least some pledge should be given that the law would not be generally put in force. It would, of course, be said that the law would not be generally put in force; but some strong pledge should be given that they would not eliminate the popular element from the administration of justice, the element that gave confidence and stamped the decisions of the Courts of Law with the seal of popular approval. He trusted the Government would not degrade the Irish Judicial Bench to the rank of police - executive magistrates, until they had exhausted every means within their power to secure a fair trial under the old system.

Mr. Joseph Cowen

MR. HOPWOOD said, he hoped it was not too late to appeal to Her Majesty's Government to give up their design of infringing one of the oldest and most popular of our legal institutions. Though it might be too late for practical purposes, he thought it was becoming, at least in everyone who felt strongly upon this question, to make his protest at every stage at which he could do so without Obstruction—and certainly this appeared to be a stage that offered itself for that purpose. He felt this clause to be a dishonour to the Liberal Party from which it emanated. He felt that—and he felt he had given proof of his desire to support the Liberal Administration in its extraordinary dealings with Ireland; but he could not countenance such a proceeding as this, which proposed to alter so completely the administration of justice, and change the ideas of that administration in a manner so utterly foreign to the feelings of Englishmen. It was proposed to do away with trial by jury, and it occurred to him that some of his hon. Friends had referred to the love others had for that principle as “pedantry.” Well, as everyone who had had any experience of trial by jury well knew, the reverence for the principle was not only a sentiment, but a defensible merit in the institution to be proved continually by practice. There was, in the first place, the position of the Judge on the Bench. The Judge had to array his thoughts; he had to arrange his statement upon the law, and to bring it to the comprehension of 12 men; he had to secure the attention of these 12 men, and to do all this in the face of day, and in the face of strong critics before him and under the criticism of the public newspapers. Now, that in itself was something that recommended itself to them as more than the mere pedantry of liking an old institution. It was necessary that the Judge should, in open daylight and criticism, make himself master of everything, and bring to the comprehension of 12 men the facts bearing on the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. Now, if that were the feeling of the spectator, what was the feeling of the Judge? The principle of the jury cleared his mind, and placed him in a position of comparative impartiality as regarded the prisoner. The prisoner, too, derived immense gain from this institution. His advocate was not dependent upon the Judge, but upon the Judge and the jury, the former being kept in check by the latter—and sometimes the Judge required to be kept in check. The Judge, in the presence of the jury whom he had to direct and preside over, was very much on his good behaviour in regard to due attention to the fairness and justice of the case before him. Now, if these were substantial reasons for the maintenance of the institution, what was there at present which justified its abolition? In the clause before the Committee the Government abolished also that which was a portion of the same system—namely, they abolished for the time being the Grand Jury. Why that should be done he did not know. He did not know why that should not exist, even without trial by jury; but this was a point which, he trusted, would be brought before the Government at a later period. The existence of the Grand Jury was of great importance, because there again the Judge, in the preliminary stage, had to marshal the facts and state them to the jury. All this was to be put an end to in Ireland for three years. What a confession was that for us to make, that we, a people who boasted of our free institutions, could not govern a troubled country by those institutions! That was the most painful admission that could possibly be made by a Liberal Government, or by a Parliament, including Liberals, representing the people of the country—that they could not govern a troubled country by free institutions. It was the greatest justification for all that done in other lands—this example and confession from the great source of liberty that we could not manage things except in the manner taught us by Russia or other despotic Powers. He sincerely trusted that as they went on with this Bill, they would find growing paler and paler this idea in the Abolition Clause that headed the Bill—that it would become so faint on the minds of Ministers, that, even if it did leave the House as a part of the measure to receive approbation in “another place,” it would never be used, but lie in the armoury of rusty weapons, never to be taken down for action. But if it was determined that they were to do away for the nonce with this old institution of trial by jury, then they could only lament their want of power to gainsay those who were going headlong and headstrong upon the uprooting of that which had always been the feeling, and ought always to be the feeling, of England.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. DILLON said, the proposal was of two parts, one dealing with crime, and the other with the political action of the people; and if the Bill were really intended for the repression of crime, and if it were honestly meant to put down crime, it would not interfere with political action. He wished to say a word, first of all, as to the action of the Government in regard to treason and treason-felony. Whatever question might exist as to the chance of impartiality amongst the Judges of Ireland in dealing with ordinary crime, no question, to his mind, could exist as to their partiality in dealing with treason and treason-felony. Although English Members, and people who had lived in England all their lives, and had never been in Ireland, might say that this was an extreme view, and might attempt to persuade, or allow themselves to be persuaded, that Irish Judges were impartial in matters of treason-felony, he thought that even they would be prepared to admit that it was a very serious question, or a very serious consideration, what the Irish people themselves thought of the matter? Even the most extreme men would admit that it was a terrible thing that criminal jurisdiction should be placed in the hands of men who were believed by nearly the whole of their countrymen to be partial with respect to the crimes they were to try. He did not believe that any man who knew anything of the Irish people, whether he were Tory or Whig, or Liberal or Nationalist, had in his inmost mind the least doubt of the fact that the Irish people believed that the Judges were partial on political questions. The Judges were nearly all of them men who had graduated in that House to the Irish Bench, and his own honest conviction, which he had gathered from the Irish people, was that the most impartiality was to be found amongst those Judges who had been Tories and Protestants from the beginning. If they were to ask who were the most impartial men on the Irish Bench, perhaps the first that would be mentioned would be Mr. Baron Fitzgerald, who had followed out the principles he had always professed, and had always shown more impartiality than most of the Irish Judges. But, even at the risk of doing an invidious thing, he was bound to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that a large number of the Irish Judges had declared, in the political harangues they had delivered on the Bench, their bitter prejudice against those who thought with himself and those who were engaged in the Land League agitation, and he declared that he was convinced that every man who went before the Irish Judges to be tried for any crime, especially for any political crime, the fact of his being a Land Leaguer would go a long way towards condemning him. It might be said that that was not true; but the Irish people believed it to be true, and they had heard Irish magistrates, before judging cases, over and over again ask in open Court—"Is this man a Land Leaguer, and has he paid his rent?" Who could doubt what was the object in asking that question? Chief Justice May, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, and a right hon. and learned Member of the House (the Attorney General for Ireland), who would probably soon be a Judge, had over and over again expressed their conviction that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and himself (Mr. Dillon), and others, were steeped in treason, and that their whole movement had been based on treason from beginning to end. If he or his Friends, therefore, were to be put on their trial for treason-felony before an Irish Judge, their case would be prejudiced, and the only question would be as to what their punishment should be, because the Judges had expressed the opinion that their conduct was treasonable. Therefore, by persisting in their proposal for the abolition of trial by jury, the Government took away from the Irish people the last shred of an idea that there was any justice in this matter at all, or that there was anything to stand between the Crown and the subject. Punishment for treason and treason-felony was for the future to be an Executive and not a Judicial act, and there was not a man in Ireland who would not believe that the Judges would be required to go to Dublin Castle to get their instructions as to who they were to convict. ["Oh!"] He was not saying that he believed that; but was saying what the Irish people would believe. There was another point he would put before them as to this clause. The Committee knew that they could try all cases of political offences by special juries. They knew the class from which special juries were drawn in Ireland—that it was from a class supposed to be most sympathetic with the Government in everything that touched on treason. They knew that the great mass of the people, perhaps four-fifths, were absolutely excluded from serving on the special juries. What, then, did the Government admit by denying the right of trial by jury for treasonable offences? They admitted that they did not dare submit the trial of treason to the upper classes in Ireland; they admitted that the vast majority of the Irish people were sympathizers with treason, and said that they dared not leave the trial of treasonable offences to the upper classes. If they passed this clause they issued a proclamation that four-fifths of the Irish people hated their rule, and that they despaired of getting convictions for treason except through a body of salaried Commissioners. This was not his statement; but any foreigner who studied this clause would be forced to come to that conclusion; and the Government themselves, by passing it, were simply issuing that proclamation. It was hardly necessary for him to repeat what had been said so often—that they had not brought anyone to trial for treason or treason-felony for 13 years. So far, therefore, from their being able to say that there had been a failure in trials for treason and treason-felony, no trial for such an offence had occurred for 13 years. So far as there had been trials, they in Ireland believed that there had, undoubtedly, been a miscarriage of justice, but a miscarriage in an opposite direction to that alleged by the Government. They believed that in the trials which had taken place very numerous, 13 or 14 years ago, a number of innocent men were punished owing to the anxiety of the “closely-packed” juries to convict. No one could go over the history of these trials without being obliged to admit that no one against whom there was a shred of evidence escaped. He had himself gone over the history of the trials, and he was convinced that persons were frequently convicted of treason and treason-felony on evidence upon which no honest jury would have convicted a prisoner of any other crime. This Bill was brought forward, based on “Moonlight” outrages; and, under cover of dealing with such outrages and agrarian offences, every man in Ireland was to be placed at the mercy of the Judges in cases of political offences. But this was not sufficient for the Government; and he wished to know whether, if they succeeded in passing the clause in spite of the opposition offered to it, would they withdraw the Jury-packing Clauses? Was it possible that the Government were not content to leave the matter to the Irish Judges, but they must also have “packed juries” behind the Irish Judges in case those Judges did not do their work well enough? He wished to have either one thing or the other. He objected to “packed” juries, and he objected to trial by Judges without juries; and he objected doubly to having both together. The conviction was forced upon the Irish people, that supposing the Irish Judges acted fairly—and they might readily admit that they would do so in regard to ordinary crime—that the Government would fall back on the old system of jury-packing. He would say leave the present unaltered, or else drop juries. It had been said that this Act would be hung up like a rusty weapon in the State armoury, and would not be used. He had heard that kind of thing very often before; and, of course, he knew that an impression had been industriously spread abroad that everything was to be peace and conciliation between the British Government and the Irish people, and that when this Coercion Bill passed they would hear nothing more about it. He was sorry to say, from information he gathered from Ireland, that nothing could be farther from the truth. The condition of Ireland showed anything but a true policy of peace and conciliation, and it made the Irish Representatives more strenuous in their opposition to the Bill. He believed that if they allowed the Bill to pass, that it would be in full working order before six months were out. What was the good of talking of peace and conciliation in Ireland when men were being evicted every week by the score? This question of the condition of Ireland bore directly on this clause. If they thought the Bill was going to be placed in the armoury of rusty weapons, it might modify their opposition to it; but he was convinced that nothing of the kind would occur. From information he had got from Ireland, it appeared that the evictions last month—the month of May—were greater in number and more general than they had been in any month during the last 10 years. He should like to hear from the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant some information on this matter. If there was to be a policy of peace and conciliation, did it mean that they were to have, on an average, 200 families flung out of their houses every week? That was what was going on now. It was useless to suppose that they would not have outrage in Ireland whilst people were wandering through the roads of the country, homeless, in hundreds. The Government might find their hands pushed, as they had done in the case of the last Coercion Act. The opposition of the Irish Members to this measure was thoroughly justified by the condition of Ireland, because they believed that when it was once passed it would be used ferociously. As to the trial of other offences besides political offences enumerated in the Bill, he had had an Amendment on the Paper—which, he believed, was moved, in his absence, by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—to leave out murder and attempts to murder; and the ground on which he had brought forward that Amendment was, that if the Government were unable to bring forward a single case during the past five years of a miscarriage of justice in regard to such offences, the provision was unnecessary. He had looked over the report of what had occurred, and he failed to find that a single case of failure to convict had been mentioned. He asked, therefore, Was there a single parallel case of suspension of trial by jury of individuals, perhaps for their lives, on the plea of the failure of the jury system, without—when the Government were challenged to produce one—a single case being brought forward in support of the proposal? They had the preposterous speculation put forward that if they suspended the jury system, and substituted for it trial by Judges, they would have evidence forthcoming. He believed that no such preposterous argument had ever before been submitted to the House. His belief was, that if they did away with the present jury system, and substituted for it a system more odious even, they would find it infinitely more difficult to obtain evidence. Whatever evidence was forthcoming before would be withheld then. If there was terrorism in Ireland now, he did not see anything in trial by Judges to put an end to it. His opinion was, that if terrorism existed there would be substituted for it a sullen refusal to give evidence, not through terrorism, but through a dogged belief that the people were getting no justice, and that the Government might look after their own evidence and get it where they could. He was not prepared to say that in ordinary crimes the percentage of convictions would be in the least increased. The new law would demoralize the people, and show them that there was no justice for the poor man in Ireland. It would band them together in a sullen intention to defeat the law. The Government had means and machinery which they could use to produce evidence; but in cases of ordinary crime, where men's lives were at stake, he doubted if more evidence would be got than was obtained at present. Her Majesty's Government would not succeed in securing the confidence of the Irish people for the tribunal they were about to establish; on the contrary, they would probably succeed in bringing the law into greater disrespect. He thought, therefore, it was the duty of Irish Members to oppose this clause to their very utmost. He believed the clause to be the worst clause in the Bill, and he thought its provisions the most uncalled-for, the most unnecessary, the most utterly useless, and of a kind in support of which the Government had not adduced one single argument in the course of the debates.

Mr. Hopwood

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. Dillon

MR. TREVELYAN said, he should not detain the Committee long on a question which had been so thoroughly discussed, especially as so many of the speeches delivered in the course of the debate were second-reading speeches. But it was impossible to allow the observations of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) to pass—as was generally the case—without saying a few words in reply to them. In the first place, the hon. Member began with something like an attack on the people of Ireland, saying that they had a sympathy with crime, and that that sympathy was caused by their ancient and cruel Land Laws. It was evident, from the hon. Member's speech, that the only method of dealing with crime in Ireland was by remedial measures. Her Majesty's Government had tried remedial measures; and if remedial measures would diminish crime, crime in Ireland ought to have been diminished. But, what was the fact? The fact was, that in the first five months of this year outrages of an agrarian nature had risen to 2,275, as against some 1,400 outrages

[Fourth Night.]

20 people coming from Mass. The two Ryans turned up the bye-road to their house, and immediately after the murdered man turned up the same road. They had scarcely got into the bye-road when the 20 people from whom they had parted heard screams and cries of 'Murder!' and 'For God's sake don't murder me!' and that sort of thing. They rushed back, turned up the lane, and found the young man stabbed to death, and saw the two Ryans running away from him. The jury acquitted the prisoners. The evidence was wholly uncontradicted."

Now, he believed that any person in Ireland, who, as the hon. Member for Roscommon had suggested, had a grudge against a neighbour, would find better opportunities, so to speak, for carrying out his revenge against his enemy than by bringing him before the tribunal. Again, Mr. Justice Lawson said, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1881, after speaking of some parts of Ireland—

"In other parts of Ireland it is absolutely impossible to obtain a conviction now for offences connected with any agrarian matter."

These were the reasons why so few persons, apparently, had been brought to trial. He had listened carefully to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), interesting as his speeches always were; but neither did that hon. and learned Member, nor any other speaker in the course of this debate, attempt to face the difficulties of the situation, or attempt to deal with this absolute denial of criminal justice in Ireland. As an English lawyer, if the hon. and learned Member went down to the Assizes in this country, he was accustomed to find the whole public opinion exerted against acts of criminality; and it appeared to him that the hon. and learned Member was unable to place himself in the position of understanding the feelings of persons in Ireland who had lost, perhaps, a near relation, and had no means of getting justice. But to secure justice in Ireland was the end which the Government must and would accomplish.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had not spoken often during the progress of this Bill; nor should he have spoken now but for the statement which had fallen from the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). He wished, however, to say, once for all, that if those who represented Irish Conservatives in that House did not take a greater part in these discussions, it was simply because they did not desire unduly to protract them. He need not assure the Committee that he should speak as briefly as possible on the present occasion; but if what had fallen from the hon. Member for Tipperary were allowed to pass without challenge by him, he should consider that he had failed in his duty. The hon. Member said there was no Irishman in that House, whether Liberal or Conservative, who would not agree with him that the Irish Judges, in exercising their functions under this Bill, would not command the support of the Irish people, or secure their confidence. Of course, if he sat quietly hearing such statements as that, it might be supposed that he (Mr. Plunket) joined in that opinion. But he ventured to say there were hundreds of thousands of people in Ireland who had the utmost confidence in the Irish Judges; and, further than that, he would say there were few, indeed, in Ireland who would not have confidence in the Judges for fair and impartial conduct throughout, were it not for such language as was frequently heard in that country, and of which they had had a faint echo that evening, concerning the Irish Judges. The hon. Member for Tipperary said that the Irish people would believe that the Judges would go to Dublin Castle and receive their orders as to whom they were to condemn. Now, he asked, who ever before heard such a statement put forward by a public man, on an important occasion, with regard to Judges who performed duties without which society could not exist? The hon. Gentleman did not say that was his opinion; he did not go a step further and say "that is not my opinion;" he did not denounce that opinion. It was because such statements were put forward, if not with sanction, with toleration, because they were not denounced that there was any want of confidence in the Irish Judges, and it was by such teaching as that it had become necessary to pass a Bill into law depriving for a time the people of Ireland in certain cases of trial by jury. There was one other topic which had presented itself prominently that evening. He would not go over the whole ground which had already been covered, but would say a few words as to the objection which had been raised to the inclusion of treason vernment would manufacture it. Now, there was nothing which shocked him so much in that House as to hear the cruel things said of certain of the police who had contrived to get effective evidence in some of those cases. It shocked him much, and, he might say, it surprised him more; because several hon. Gentlemen in that House, speaking in the course of this discussion, had told them—and he did not say there was no truth in the suggestion—that the Government ought to improve this detective organization. But, he asked, what was the use of telling them on one day that they ought to improve their detective organization, and on the next, when, perhaps, the Secret Service Vote was discussed, to come down to the House and cast the most cruel invective upon successful detectives? But it was not against the detective system only that the hon. Member for Newcastle used such strong and bitter words. He said, if the Judges undertook this office, which he so much disapproved and which he almost despised, they would incur the bitter hatred of the Irish people. He said that the Viceroy and officials in Ireland needed to go about in public protected, and that if the Judges undertook this office and carried it out strenuously, they would excite against themselves a hatred as bitter as that which now existed against the other officials in Ireland. But the Judges of Ireland were brave men, and were, no doubt, willing to incur danger of that sort. For his own part, he should be proud of nothing so much as coming forward in a time of danger and showing he did not mind being a mark even for assassins. But not for one moment did he believe that that would be the consequence to the Judges, however bravely they might act. The country had given so much to all, that at a time like the present, they could afford to do something for the country. His hon. Friend talked about the terrible and cruel persecutions of the Radicals in Scotland in 1819, and at a still earlier date, and told a story of the heartless manner in which the Scotch Judges talked amongst themselves. But those gentlemen who sat on the Irish Bench had as little in common with the Scotch Judges, who tried Muir and Palmer, as with Jeffreys himself. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, speaking of a case in which a man was acquitted very much against the evidence, said—

Mr. Trevelyan

“To my surprise, in that case, after giving proper instructions to the jury, they turned round and acquitted both the prisoners, and acquitted them with loud applause in Court. I observed, myself, that the applause came from a particular direction, and that was the place set apart for jurors in waiting, and that the applauders were the jurors in waiting. Upon that occasion I addressed some very strong remonstrances to them, which have clearly been interpreted as words of menace; whereas, they were words of warning only. I told them that if that kind of thing went on, it would lead to the suspension of trial by jury.”

He believed that the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) compared this Commission with the Court of High Commission in Cromwell's time; and he (Mr. Trevelyan) supposed that the present Commission would, in course of time, come to be called by a similar appellation. But when the hon. Member for Roscommon told them that liberty would disappear from Ireland, and when the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) told them that he was in favour of liberty, he would like to know what liberty there was in Ireland? He wished the hon. Member for Newcastle would read a little more recent history, and follow the details of these outrages in Ireland, and then he would see how many of them consisted of outrages perpetrated on men whose only crime was that they had ventured to pay their rent. And then the hon. Member said that, sooner than destroy that kind of liberty, they had better tolerate crime. The hon. Member for Roscommon said that many men who had private grudges against others would satisfy their ill-feeling by bringing them before the Special Commission Court. He did not think there was much probability of that course being resorted to. He would now give the Committee the particulars of a case which happened at Olonmel in the spring of 1880. The Crown Solicitor, in his evidence before the Lords' Committee, in referring to this case, said—

“This is a case where the two Ryans—father and son—were tried for the murder of a young man. They were all tenants of a Mr. Lyster for a bit of cut-away bog or moorland. There was some dispute between them about it, and on a particular Sunday they had been to Mass together at a neighbouring chapel. They lived close together. Their way home lay along the same road. They travelled from the chapel and turned up to their house in common with some

[Fourth Night.]

20 people coming from Mass. The two Ryans turned up the bye-road to their house, and immediately after the murdered man turned up the same road. They had scarcely got into the bye-road when the 20 people from whom they had parted heard screams and cries of 'Murder!' and 'For God's sake don't murder me!' and that sort of thing. They rushed back, turned up the lane, and found the young man stabbed to death, and saw the two Ryans running away from him. The jury acquitted the prisoners. The evidence was wholly uncontradicted."

Now, he believed that any person in Ireland, who, as the hon. Member for Roscommon had suggested, had a grudge against a neighbour, would find better opportunities, so to speak, for carrying out his revenge against his enemy than by bringing him before the tribunal. Again, Mr. Justice Lawson said, in his evidence before the Committee of the House of Lords in 1881, after speaking of some parts of Ireland—

"In other parts of Ireland it is absolutely impossible to obtain a conviction now for offences connected with any agrarian matter."

These were the reasons why so few persons, apparently, had been brought to trial. He had listened carefully to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Stockport (Mr. Hopwood), interesting as his speeches always were; but neither did that hon. and learned Member, nor any other speaker in the course of this debate, attempt to face the difficulties of the situation, or attempt to deal with this absolute denial of criminal justice in Ireland. As an English lawyer, if the hon. and learned Member went down to the Assizes in this country, he was accustomed to find the whole public opinion exerted against acts of criminality; and it appeared to him that the hon. and learned Member was unable to place himself in the position of understanding the feelings of persons in Ireland who had lost, perhaps, a near relation, and had no means of getting justice. But to secure justice in Ireland was the end which the Government must and would accomplish.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had not spoken often during the progress of this Bill; nor should he have spoken now but for the statement which had fallen from the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). He wished, however, to say, once for all, that if those who represented Irish Conservatives in that House did not take a greater part in these discussions, it was simply because they did not desire unduly to protract them. He need not assure the Committee that he should speak as briefly as possible on the present occasion; but if what had fallen from the hon. Member for Tipperary were allowed to pass without challenge by him, he should consider that he had failed in his duty. The hon. Member said there was no Irishman in that House, whether Liberal or Conservative, who would not agree with him that the Irish Judges, in exercising their functions under this Bill, would not command the support of the Irish people, or secure their confidence. Of course, if he sat quietly hearing such statements as that, it might be supposed that he (Mr. Plunket) joined in that opinion. But he ventured to say there were hundreds of thousands of people in Ireland who had the utmost confidence in the Irish Judges; and, further than that, he would say there were few, indeed, in Ireland who would not have confidence in the Judges for fair and impartial conduct throughout, were it not for such language as was frequently heard in that country, and of which they had had a faint echo that evening, concerning the Irish Judges. The hon. Member for Tipperary said that the Irish people would believe that the Judges would go to Dublin Castle and receive their orders as to whom they were to condemn. Now, he asked, who ever before heard such a statement put forward by a public man, on an important occasion, with regard to Judges who performed duties without which society could not exist? The hon. Gentleman did not say that was his opinion; he did not go a step further and say "that is not my opinion;" he did not denounce that opinion. It was because such statements were put forward, if not with sanction, with toleration, because they were not denounced that there was any want of confidence in the Irish Judges, and it was by such teaching as that it had become necessary to pass a Bill into law depriving for a time the people of Ireland in certain cases of trial by jury. There was one other topic which had presented itself prominently that evening. He would not go over the whole ground which had already been covered, but would say a few words as to the objection which had been raised to the inclusion of treason

Mr. Trevelyan

as a crime to be dealt with by this scheme; and, more especially, the vigorous and resolute attempt which had been made to exclude from the purview of this clause those who might wish to be sufficiently loyal at home to escape the penalties of treason, but who would come within the range of this clause by their doings abroad. Hon. Members, speaking on that clause, adduced some instances of what might happen in America, and scenes had been described which might possibly take place at public meetings in that country. It was said, if a speaker attended a meeting, and some person there made use of treasonable expressions, any Irish subject of the Queen who took part in that meeting would be held responsible for what was thus said. But if those charges were unfounded, and if the gentlemen who took part in those meetings were supposed to be loyal subjects of the Queen, if those charges and imputations were false, there would be ample opportunity of disproving them. But he asked, if gentlemen did go or did attend these meetings and took the part described, if they stood by and heard those expressions used, and counsels given sometimes falling little short of incitements to immediate invasion of the country, and the upsetting of the Government established here, what position would they place themselves in? They fell into one of three classes. Either they did agree with or approve the tendency of those expressions and the feeling which they worked up, or they did not. If they agreed in them, and in the working up of that feeling, and the gathering in of the dollars which resulted from it, on what principle did they claim to exempt themselves from the penalties of treason when they came back to this country? On the other hand, it was possible they did not share those treasonable opinions. Then, he said, they were working up those feelings, and gathering in those dollars on false pretences—that was to say, supposing they never intended to bring it to actual and open treason against this country. But there was a third class into which they might fall. Perhaps they thought that open treason just now in Ireland and in the Three Kingdoms would not be safe; but that, nevertheless, it was a good thing to go out to America and keep up the enthusiasm existing there and to continue to gather in the money. Then he put it in this way. Could there be anything more insane than that the Government should tolerate that policy, and allow an impression to be produced upon the Irish people that it was the view of the Government that as long as Members of Parliament were cautious and reticent at home, they might go to America and do what they pleased without bringing themselves within the purview of the Law of Treason? He wished to know how, with these things, loyalty could continue to exist in Ireland? Of course, a Government which allowed such things to go on could not expect that the people would long continue to believe in their own policy at all. He thought the argument against the alteration of the clause could be put in a nut-shell. Either the Government must effect a radical alteration in the Law of Treason as it existed in this country for the purpose of facilitating such operations abroad as he had described, or else the only alternative was that treason should be altogether excluded from the purview of this clause, and from the operation of the Bill. He would not go further with any of the other arguments in favour of the clause; but he was bound to confess that he had heard nothing in the discussions which had taken place to remove from his mind the painful conviction that, without such exceptional powers as were demanded in this Bill, it was impossible to cope with the tremendous difficulties which the Government were now encountering in Ireland.

MR. PARNELL said, it was a remarkable fact that whenever there was any dirt or abuse to be cast upon Irishmen, an Irishman was always found ready to do it with greater zest and greater zeal than any other man. He could recollect the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) heaping abuse in the House upon a distinguished and honourable Irishman. He remembered when he justified his right to vote against the admission of the late Mr. John Mitchel as Member for the county of Tipperary, on the ground that he was a dishonourable felon. No Englishman or Scotchman made such an allegation as that in the course of the debate; but it was reserved for an Irishman, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, to attempt to heap dishonour upon a man as honourable as himself. The right hon. and learned Gentleman looked forward with the highest expectation to the passing of this Bill into law, and supposed that when it was passed he and his class would have everything in Ireland under their thumb; that they would be able to take up an attitude of hostility to the just claims of the Irish tenant farmers. That was what was really involved in this question; that was what was really involved in all these demands for coercion, which first of all commenced upon the Opposition Bench, and then were taken up by the Metropolitan Press and forced on the Liberal Ministry. The Conservatives knew that upon this extraordinary power, these unfair advantages, these unjust laws, depended their power to claim unjust and exorbitant rents from the Irish tenantry. During the last winter, the Land Act had been helped, in many cases, by the landlords, who made settlements out of Court; and he believed the number of those settlements out of Court was about equal to the number of decrees, or the number of judicial rents fixed by the Court; and, admittedly, upon those settlements out of Court, which were arrived at by mutual arrangement between landlord and tenant, must depend the future success of the Land Act. If those settlements were put a stop to—the prospect of which the Prime Minister spoke the other day, that 50,000 or 60,000 judicial rents would have been fixed by the end of this year—if those mutual arrangements were stopped, the landlords would be thrown back on what they believed to be their distinct rights, and which, according to their view, had been unjustly assailed by the Land Act; and so would be put an end to this process of mutual arrangement, which had been going on for the last six months, to the extent of 60,000 settlements out of Court. It would also stop the arrangements which had been largely made for temporary abatements pending decisions by the Land Commissioners; and there was not the slightest doubt that the great joy with which the class represented by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin hailed this measure of coercion was due to the fact that they believed they would be able to exact, during the coming autumn and winter, their full pound of flesh, without reduction or abatement. He (Mr. Parnell) could not help sympathizing with the Chief Secretary upon the speech he had delivered that evening; for the right hon. Gentleman seemed to him to wish that he could have had some other task as one of his duties, in taking up the high and important and responsible Office which he had to fill, than the impossible task of defending coercion; and as the right hon. Gentleman trotted out all the well-worn and stale arguments which so many of his Predecessors had produced, only to find them utterly falsified by the results, he could not help sympathizing with the Chief Secretary in the really disagreeable and odious task, which he was sure the right hon. Gentleman felt his present task to be. The right hon. Gentleman gave some examples of evidence, extracted from Blue Books, to justify the claims of the Government for the suspension of trial by jury; but when he asked for dates, the right hon. Gentleman was unable to give them.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Member, but the real fact is that I have discovered the dates. The first case I gave was in 1880, and the three other instances were at the Summer Assizes in 1881.

MR. PARNELL said, he was willing to give the right hon. Gentleman all the credit which his argument might gain from the discovery of the dates, but that did not amount to much, because his heart could not have been much in his work, since he had not thought it necessary to take the trouble to obtain the full information with regard to these offences which he had brought before the Committee. This was a curious and instructive circumstance. The right hon. Gentleman was heir to the mistakes of his Predecessors, and he was obliged to take up the task of governing Ireland where he found it. He (Mr. Parnell) could not see how the Chief Secretary could hope for any greater success than his Predecessors had achieved. He had now to try a still worse and still more severe Coercion Bill than the one which would expire next September. He was about to try a measure which would make the enforcement of law and order still more—he did not wish to say—repugnant to Irishmen ; but, depend upon it, the more the Government introduced measures of this kind, the more indifferent the people would feel as to the detection of crime. The hon. Member for the county of Tipperary had said, the other evening, that the Irish people sympathized with crime.

Mr. Parnell

MR. DILLON: I said that, doubtless, there existed some sympathy with crime in Ireland.

MR. PARNELL accepted the correction ; but he thought that was scarcely the correct way to describe the situation in Ireland. It was rather that the law had been so unfairly used, that it had been so obviously twisted and diverted, that the Irish people were indifferent as regarded the detection of crime and the enforcement of the law. It was because all the exertions of Parliament had been directed to devising some further method of enforcing the agrarian rights of the landlords—some more stringent law—something entirely different from the laws that ought to bind Great Britain and Ireland together, that the people of Ireland had taken up this attitude—not of sympathy with crime, but of saying, when an outrage was committed—“ Well, the law has never helped us, and we will now leave the law to help itself.” Just immediately after the horrible murder in Phoenix Park there seemed a change in the feeling ; there was a change in the feeling all over the world ; and the people of Ireland undoubtedly ranged themselves on the side of law and order, and desired to detect the Phoenix Park murderers. That feeling spread to America, and money was subscribed in that country—thousands of dollars were subscribed in a few days for the purpose of offering rewards for the detection of the murderers. But immediately after the Government introduced this Coercion Bill that feeling at once stopped. That was one of the first results of coercion. What was one of the next results ? In the month during which there was a hope that the Government were about to change their policy agrarian outrages diminished by some 70 or 80. In the fortnight following the introduction of this Bill that diminution ceased, according to the Chief Secretary's statement. He did not know whether that diminution had been maintained, or was still checked ; but it was the simple fact that in the month of April the more serious classes of agrarian outrages showed a very remarkable diminution. He believed it would be seen that in the last month, although that diminution had been increased, it had yet been maintained, and that there was still an absence of the more serious forms of crime. Had it not been for the introduction of this Coercion Bill, and the feeling of exasperation which it had aroused in Ireland, there would have been a still more marked diminution of agrarian crime, and especially in that of a more serious character. The Chief Secretary had told the Committee of the great increase in the number of outrages during the first four months of this year, as compared with the first four months of last year. He had stated that they had nearly doubled in number, but he did not state that the evictions had been quadrupled. There was a remarkable relation between the proportion of outrages and of evictions. It was said by some hon. Member the other day in the House that the agrarian crime had not been largest where there had been the greatest number of evictions, and that was undoubtedly true ; but agrarian crime did not necessarily follow eviction. On the contrary, crime more often preceded eviction. Agrarian crime in Ireland was not apparently undertaken by evicted people, because they had no means of undertaking it. They were thrown on to the roadside and into the workhouses, and were starved. Agrarian crime seemed to be undertaken by people in order to prevent evictions and to deter landlords from evicting. Evictions might and had come all the same ; but, undoubtedly, in some of the districts where agrarian crime had been most excessive evictions had been least numerous ; and what sort of a lesson was it that the Government wished to teach Irish people ? That to avoid eviction they must commit outrage. That was the lesson taught by making this Coercion Bill precede the Arrears Bill. If the Government had proceeded with the Arrears Bill, and given the tenant farmers some hope that they would be able to maintain the roofs over their heads until they could get the value of the beneficial Act of last Session, they would have done more to stop agrarian crime and to help the large majority of people who desired the restoration of law and order than all the Coercion Bills could do. The right hon. Gentleman said that general challenges had been made in that House by some of the Irish Members for a statement as to in what respect juries had failed in their verdicts. They gave no general challenge, but only in regard to cases of treason and treason-felony. They admitted that in some cases juries had failed to return verdicts in accordance with the weight of evidence; but in regard to the more serious crimes, they challenged the Government to produce specific cases of failure, and their challenge remained unanswered to that day. The Attorney General had not been able to give a single instance. He mentioned one instance of murder, which, however, he did not believe was of an agrarian character, although he was asked to give agrarian cases. He was so utterly unable to give an instance of murder in which a jury had failed to return a verdict in accordance with the weight of evidence that he was obliged to seek another case of murder which was not agrarian, and which was not of the kind it was proposed to try under this Act. The Irish Members did not consider that the evidence given before the House of Lords' Committee could be relied upon. That Committee was appointed with the object of discrediting the Irish jury system; but it failed to do so. Witnesses were called for that purpose, and the loose statements which had been put together by prejudiced witnesses, with the object of discrediting the Irish jury system, were not entitled to receive weight. The inquiry was undertaken in "another place," and without any Representative on the Committee for the other side of the question. There was no public Representative whatever upon that Committee; and if the Government wanted to take away the jury system in Ireland, they might, at least, have appointed a Select Committee of the House of Commons this Session which might have contained Representatives of the different sections of the House. Upon the Report of that Committee they might have founded their claim for the abolition of trial by jury. It was said that hundreds or thousands of people in Ireland had confidence in the Irish Judges. [Mr. PLUNKET: I said hundreds of thousands.] There might be hundreds of thousands who had confidence in the Irish Judges as Judges, in ordinary cases; but he did not believe there were many thousands who had confidence in the Irish Judges as jurors, and it would be rather hard to expect any large number of persons to have confidence in the Irish Judges as jurors, when the Irish Judges had no confidence in themselves as jurors. They had held a meeting at which they unanimously agreed in objecting to the work to be now thrown upon them. They had expressed in decided terms their belief in their unsuitability to administer this Act and to be turned into jurors. Therefore, how could the people have confidence in the Judges as jurors? The Committee was about to divide upon a very important clause; but he did not suppose that if such a proposition as this had been brought forward for England, it would have been allowed to be decided until it had been debated for many days and nights. A Ministry which had ventured to bring such a proposal forward for England or Scotland would not have remained long without impeachment. The Government were now going to subject the lives and liberties of everybody in Ireland to servants of the Crown; but they must not forget that the very foundations of the English Constitution were involved in this proposal. They might think little of suspending every Constitutional liberty in Ireland; but as they went on they would find they had made a mistake in each succeeding Coercion Act, and that in this Bill they had made the greatest mistake of all. Since they had entered upon this downward path he feared they would soon be coming again to Parliament, in the course of another year, for yet more stringent powers—perhaps Martial Law—and the same old story would be repeated, that agrarian outrages had increased, and the maintenance of law and order in Ireland was still more difficult. But, at least, the Irish Members would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had done their duty. They would remember that they had told the Government on the passage of this Bill, as they told them upon the Bill last year, that the result would be that outrages would increase; that the disregard and want of sympathy among the Irish people for the maintenance of law and order would increase; and that the possibility of bringing the two countries together, and having Ireland as well governed as it ought to be would grow greater; and, perhaps, the Government might then agree that the quicker method, after all, would be to allow the people of Ireland to govern themselves.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. Parnell

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 227; Noes 39: Majority 188.

AYES.

Acland, C. T. D.	Currie, Sir D.
Acland, Sir T. D.	Dalrymple, C.
Alexander, Colonel	Davenport, H. T.
Allen, H. G.	Davenport, W. B.
Armitage, B.	Davies, W.
Armitstead, G.	Dawnay, Col. hon. L. P.
Asher, A.	Dawnay, hon. G. C.
Ashley, hon. E. M.	Dickson, Major A. G.
Aylmer, J. E. F.	Dilke, Sir C. W.
Balfour, A. J.	Dodda, J.
Balfour, J. B.	Dodson, rt. hon. J. G.
Balfour, J. S.	Douglas, A. Akers-
Baring, T. C.	Duckham, T.
Barttelot, Sir W. B.	Duff, R. W.
Bass, H.	Dundas, hon. J. O.
Beach, rt. hn. Sir M. H.	Ebrington, Viscount
Bentinck, rt. hn. G. C.	Edwards, H.
Birkbeck, E.	Egerton, Adm. hon. F.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.	Elliot, G. W.
Bolton, J. C.	Elliot, hon. A. R. D.
Borlase, W. C.	Emlyn, Viscount
Brand, H. R.	Evans, T. W.
Brassey, H. A.	Farquharson, Dr. R.
Brassey, Sir T.	Fawcett, rt. hon. H.
Bright, rt. hon. J.	Feilden, Maj.-Gen. R. J.
Broadley, W. H. H.	Fenwick-Bisset, M.
Brogden, A.	Ffolkes, Sir W. H. B.
Brown, A. H.	Finch, G. H.
Bruce, rt. hon. Lord C.	Fitzmaurice, Lord E.
Bruce, Sir H. H.	Fitzwilliam, hon. H. W.
Bruce, hon. R. P.	Fitzwilliam, hon. W. J.
Buchanan, T. R.	Fletcher, Sir H.
Campbell, J. A.	Flower, C.
Campbell, R. F. F.	Foljambe, C. G. S.
Campbell-Bannerman, H.	Forster, Sir C.
Carington, hon. R.	Fowler, R. N.
Carington, hon. Col. W. H. P.	Fry, L.
Cartwright, W. C.	Galway, Viscount
Causton, R. K.	Garnier, J. C.
Cavendish, Lord E.	Giffard, Sir H. S.
Chamberlain, rt. hn. J.	Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
Childers, rt. hn. H. C. E.	Gladstone, W. H.
Clifford, C. O.	Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Clive, Col. hon. G. W.	Gourley, E. T.
Coddington, W.	Gower, hon. E. F. L.
Collins, T.	Grafton, F. W.
Compton, F.	Grant, A.
Corbett, J.	Grant, Sir G. M.
Corry, J. P.	Grantham, W.
Cotes, C. O.	Gregory, G. B.
Courtney, L. H.	Grenfell, W. H.
Creyke, R.	Gurdon, R. T.
Crichton, Viscount	Hamilton, J. G. C.
Cropper, J.	Harcourt, rt. hon. Sir W. G. V. V.
Cross, rt. hon. Sir R. A.	Hartington, Marq. of
Cunliffe, Sir R. A.	Hastings, G. W.

Hay, rt. hon. Admiral	Pease, A.
Sir J. C. D.	Pell, A.
Hayter, Sir A. D.	Percy, Lord A.
Herschell, Sir F.	Plunket, rt. hon. D. R.
Hibbert, J. T.	Porter, A. M.
Hicks, E.	Portman, hn. W. H. B.
Hill, T. R.	Powell, W. R. H.
Holden, I.	Ramsay, J.
Holland, Sir H. T.	Repton, G. W.
Holms, J.	Richardson, T.
Howard, E. S.	Roberts, J.
Howard, G. J.	Round, J.
Illingworth, A.	Russell, Lord A.
Inderwick, F. A.	Rylands, P.
James, Sir H.	St. Aubyn, W. M.
Jardine, R.	Samuelson, H.
Jenkins, D. J.	Sclater-Booth, rt. hon. G.
Jenkins, Sir J. J.	Seely, C. (Lincoln)
Johnson, rt. hon. W. M.	Smith, E.
Jones-Parry, L.	Smith, rt. hon. W. H.
Kennard, Col. E. H.	Spencer, hon. C. R.
Kingscote, Col. R. N. F.	Stafford, Marquess of
Lambton, hon. F. W.	Stanhope, hon. E.
Lawrance, J. C.	Stanley, E. J.
Lawrence, Sir J. C.	Stewart, J.
Lawrence, W.	Storer, G.
Leatham, E. A.	Talbot, C. R. M.
Leatham, W. H.	Talbot, J. G.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.	Tavistock, Marquess of
Lefevre, right hon. G. J. S.	Taylor, rt. hn. Col. T. E.
Lennox, Lord H. G.	Thornhill, T.
Lloyd, M.	Tillett, J. H.
Loder, R.	Tollemache, H. J.
Lopes, Sir M.	Tottenham, A. L.
Macartney, J. W. E.	Tracy, hon. F. S. A.
M'Garel-Hogg, Sir J.	Hanbury-
M'Intyre, Aeneas J.	Trevelyan, rt. hn. G. O.
Mackie, R. B.	Vivian, A. P.
Mackintosh, C. F.	Wallace, Sir R.
Macnaghten, E.	Walrond, Col. W. H.
Magniac, C.	Walter, J.
March, Earl of	Warton, C. N.
Martin, R. B.	Waugh, E.
Maskelyne, M. H. Story-	Whitbread, S.
Monk, C. J.	Whitley, E.
Moreton, Lord	Wiggin, H.
Morgan, rt. hn. G. O.	Williams, S. C. E.
Morley, A.	Williamson, S.
Morley, S.	Willis, W.
Moss, R.	Wills, W. H.
Mundella, rt. hon. A. J.	Wilmot, Sir H.
Murray, C. J.	Wilson, I.
Newdegate, C. N.	Winn, R.
Newport, Viscount	Wortley, C. B. Stuart
Nicholson, W. N.	Wroughton, P.
Northcote, H. S.	Wyndham, hon. P.
Northcote, rt. hn. Sir S. H.	Yorke, J. R.
Norwood, C. M.
Palmer, G.
Parker, C. S.

TELLERS.

Grosvenor, Lord R.
Kensington, Lord

NOES.

Arnold, A.	Cowen, J.
Biggar, J. G.	Dillon, J.
Blake, J. A.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Briggs, W. E.	Findlater, W.
Broadhurst, H.	Healy, T. M.
Bryce, J.	Hopwood, O. H.
Callan, P.	Labouchere, H.
Commings, A.	Lalor, R.

[Fourth Night.]

Lawson, Sir W.	Parnell, O. S.
M'Carthy, J.	Rogers, J. E. T.
M'Coan, J. C.	Shaw, W.
Macfarlane, D. H.	Sheil, E.
Martin, P.	Sullivan, T. D.
Marum, E. M.	Synan, E. J.
Metge, R. H.	Thompson, T. C.
Moore, A.	Webster, J.
Nolan, Colonel J. P.	Whalley, G. H.
O'Brien, Sir P.
O'Connor, A.	TELLERS.
O'Connor, T. P.	Leamy, E.
O'Donnell, F. H.	Redmond, J. E.
O'Gorman Mahon, Col.

The

Clause 2 (Appeal from Special Commission Court to Court of Criminal Appeal).

MR. DILLON said, they had to meet again at 2 o'clock to-day, therefore he thought it was time they should adjourn. He would move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Dillon.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that if the hon. Member would glance at the Paper, he would find that there were really no substantial Amendments to Clauses 2 and 3. Half-an-hour, he thought, would dispose of them; therefore, he hoped the Committee would be allowed to proceed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he hoped the Government would not resist the proposal of his hon. Friend. The Committee had been sitting since 5 o'clock, and had closely applied itself to the consideration of the Amendments brought before it. It had not wandered away from the questions at issue.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that on Friday night they had not adjourned until half-past 1. He only asked for about half-an-hour, believing that Clauses 2 and 3 could be disposed of in that time. If hon. Members would look at the Amendments to those clauses they would see that they were not important.

MR. PARNELL said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not be too hard on the Committee. It must be remembered that he was taking the Bill every day; that it would come on at the Morning Sitting to-day; that the hon. Members who opposed the measure were few in number, and that all the fatigue of the opposition—which was not a very grateful task—fell upon that few. It would be particularly hard to keep them up very late, as they were kept up on Thursday and Friday, seeing that they had to meet again at 2. The interval between 7 and 9 o'clock on the day of a Morning Sitting was no advantage to the Irish Members, although, no doubt, it might be to right hon. Gentlemen opposite, particularly the Prime Minister. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would see his way to allowing hon. Members to get to bed half-an-hour earlier than he had intended.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that no doubt some consideration was due to hon. Members opposite. Of late the House had followed the practice of meeting on Tuesdays at 2 o'clock; but he had no doubt, if it were felt that that hour was inconvenient to hon. Members, it could be arranged to meet at 4 o'clock. He trusted, in the meantime, however, that the proposal of his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir William Harcourt) would be acceded to, which amounted to this—that they should go on with the Committee until they came to some serious point of difference in the Bill. His right hon. and learned Friend's belief, and his (Mr. Gladstone's) own belief, was that there was no serious point of difference in the 2nd or 3rd clauses. When they had disposed of Clauses 2 and 3, they would arrive at the important provision about intimidation; and he should think it would be of great advantage to hon. Members to know that when they met to-morrow they would at once commence the consideration of that material provision.

MR. PARNELL said, it would be very much to the convenience of the Irish Members if the Business of the House to-morrow could be taken at 4 instead of 2 o'clock. They did not wish to interfere with the convenience of Her Majesty's Ministers; but it must be admitted that it was a great drag upon the opponents of the Bill to have to come down to the House at 2 o'clock after the present Sitting and the other late Sittings they had had.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, after what had fallen from the hon. Member, who, no doubt, spoke on behalf of a body of Gentlemen who had a considerable share of the labours of the House at the present time cast upon their shoulders, so far as he (Mr. Gladstone) was concerned, he should be willing to accede to the request that they should meet to-morrow at the usual hour—4 o'clock.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GREGORY said, he had an Amendment to propose to confine the appeal to capital offences. He felt that this Amendment would supply a great defect in the Bill, for the proposed tribunal would be a very strong one, and, in his opinion, if there were no right of appeal in ordinary cases, would be quite as satisfactory as any trial by jury could be. If, however, there was a right of appeal in ordinary cases, there would be a danger that the Judges might be hasty, and in some measure be guided by their own prejudices, knowing that their decisions would be reviewed in the Court of Appeal. He did not see why, in the case of aggravated crime in Ireland, they should give a right of appeal, which was quite contrary to the law as it had hitherto been in force in the Three Kingdoms. There was practically no appeal in criminal cases at present. He was not sure that the clause as it stood would operate altogether in favour of a prisoner, because if the decision of the first Court was confirmed by the Court of Appeal, it would be very difficult for the Home Secretary to exercise the Prerogative of the Crown, however desirable it might be to do so. He begged to move his Amendment, the effect of which would be to take all punishments but capital punishment out of the right of appeal.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, after the first word "Act," insert "of any capital offence."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government had made this proposal after careful consideration. They thought it desirable to give prisoners the safeguard of a right of appeal in all cases, and they could not consent to such a material alteration in the clause as that proposed.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he had not heard much of the speech of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), owing to the conversation which prevailed in the House, and which always did go on at that hour of the night (12.35 A.M.). He had heard one point, however, and that was that the Irish Judges would be so totally inefficient and so prejudiced that they would give heavier sentences if there was a right of appeal—knowing that they would be reviewed by the Court above—than they would give if there was no right of appeal. He had heard a great deal said by the Irish Members about the Irish Judges; but he had never heard anything so strong as that. He was very glad the Government did not intend to give way, and would not shut out a prisoner's right of appeal in an ordinary case, because he felt persuaded that that right would be very important in a considerable number of instances. If any hon. Member could for a moment imagine himself in the position of having received 20 years' penal servitude, he would ask him whether he would not consider it hard that he should be shut out from the right of appeal to five Judges, when he had been, in the first instance, deprived of the safeguard of trial by jury?

MR. GRANTHAM said, they should not lose sight of the necessity of expediting appeals. If they had appeals from the decisions of the three Judges in Ireland, no doubt, from the experience they had in England of appellate work, many months would elapse before any single case was brought to a conclusion. Under the circumstances, he thought it desirable that if there was to be a right of appeal in every case, some clauses should be inserted in the measure for expediting the ordinary course of appeal, so as to benefit the prisoner, by letting him know as soon as possible whether the sentence on him was to be carried out or not, and, what was of as much importance, so as to insure the speedy punishment of crime; otherwise it would be considered that crimes could be committed with impunity.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. PLUNKET said, that, in the absence of his right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Gibson), he wished to move certain Amendments to limit the power of appealing from the Special Criminal Court to the Court of Criminal Appeal to convictions, and to strike out the power of appeal as regarded sentences. His reasons for bringing forward the Amendments were, in the first place, that to give an appeal against a sentence was an entire innovation in the law of the Three Kingdoms. He did not know any instance in which a sentence was subject to appeal; and, certainly, it seemed to him that where the Judges were dealing with these grave cases, it would have a most injurious effect if their sentences were subject to appeal and review by another Court. He hoped the Committee would accept the three Amendments down in his right hon. and learned Friend's name, which were consequent one on the other, and which, if accepted, would make the clause read thus—

"Any person convicted by a Special Commission Court under this Act may, subject to the provisions of this Act, appeal against the conviction to the Court of Criminal Appeal hereinafter mentioned," &c.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 17, leave out "either."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, "That 'either' stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there were two reasons why the Government could not agree to this Amendment. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would look at the Bill he would see that the Appeal Court could hear new facts and take fresh evidence, and it was plain that that fresh evidence might very materially modify the sentence. Take, for instance, a case of aggravated assault. It might happen that when the case went up to the Court of Appeal evidence of great provocation might be tendered which was not offered at the original trial; and that would very largely diminish the sentence that ought to be pronounced. It was plain, then, that as the Court could hear new facts, it might have a new condition of things to deal with. It was necessary that the word "sentence" should be retained in the clause; nor was it at all disparaging to the Judges, who were Judges both of law and fact, that their sentences should be reviewed. When they dealt with the decision of an Equity Judge on appeal they dealt with his decision as to amount, because he was the Judge not only of questions of law, but of questions of fact. This would, he thought, dispose of the Amendments down in the name of the Colleague of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, even the one which referred to new trials. A new trial would be inappropriate. Who were they to send a case down to to be re-tried; to the three Judges who tried it before? Clearly not, because ordinarily when there was a new trial there was a new jury; but here they could not depend on that. The new trial, in point of fact, was the case before the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal would hear all the facts which the Court below heard, and as many additional facts as might be brought before it. It would be a saving of time that the Court of Appeal should finally give the sentence that, in their opinion, the Court below ought to have pronounced.

Mr. Plunket

MR. GRANTHAM said, that the argument the right hon. and learned Gentleman had brought forward with regard to a case of aggravated assault was hardly applicable. If there was evidence to warrant an alteration of the sentence, that evidence ought to have been given by the defence in the original trial; and it was scarcely reasonable to suggest that a prisoner, who had only committed his offence, whatever it was, in self-defence, or in consequence of an aggravated assault upon him, should allow himself to be convicted by the magistrates or other tribunal without suggesting what would be either an excuse for, or an extenuation of, his offence.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that evidence of provocation might be brought forward which could not be given in the Court below.

MR. GRANTHAM said, it would be strange, if there was evidence of provocation, if it was not brought forward in the first instance.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) was not going to persist in this Amendment. The proposal of the Bill was only what was done in cases of courts martial. The confirming authority had always power to reduce any sentence; and if they were going to have, perhaps not martial law in Ireland, but something not far removed from it, it would be desirable to follow the best rules of that law. He hoped the Government would not give way; and, certainly, if they were to go through the long list of Amendments to Clauses 2 and 3 in this way, it would be well to report Progress and renew their discussion at the next Sitting.

DR. COMMINS said, the Amendment appeared to him to be utterly illogical, as the Home Secretary had pointed out. The appeal would be in itself a new trial. Where there was a new trial there should be power to take fresh evidence, and where there was power to take fresh evidence there should be power to alter a sentence.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, some of the arguments against the Amendment were mischievous. Let them see what they would come to. They could not lay down any rules as to sentences; therefore, in every case there might be an appeal as to the amount of the sentence, and the Court of Appeal might not agree with the Court below. They would have constant reviews of the decisions of the Judges as to the amount of sentence, which was entirely alien to our whole system of jurisprudence.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not wish to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing; but he considered his Amendment so important that he could not withdraw it.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 2, line 39, to insert—

“(5.) During the continuance of this Act a list of all persons sentenced under this Act, with a statement opposite each person's name of the date of his conviction and the grounds thereof, with the prison in which he is detained, and the names of the judges by whom he was convicted, shall be laid before each House of Parliament within the first seven days of March and August in each year if Parliament be sitting, or if Parliament be not sitting, then in the first seven days after the next meeting of Parliament.”

He understood the Government were prepared to assent to the Amendment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the hon. Member to postpone the Amendment in order to bring it up amongst the Regulation Clauses at the end of the Bill. He quite agreed that such particulars as were specified in the Amendment should be laid before Parliament; but the Amendment was of such a character that it could not properly be considered under the Appeal Clause. Substantially they accepted the principle of the Amendment.

MR. HEALY asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. LEAMY asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary if he would also give a list of the persons sentenced by the Court of Summary Jurisdiction?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. WARTON moved, in page 2, to leave out Clause 2. He hoped the Committee would grant him its indulgence, for this was the only Amendment he had put down to the Bill. He thought the Government would consider he was anxious to support them as far as he possibly could in passing the Bill; it was his duty, as a Conservative, to support the Government in the prosecution of this measure, though he felt bound to take exception to this particular clause. It was true that this was an extreme measure, but it was an extraordinarily good one. He could hardly conceive a better Court than one composed of three Judges armed with such serious responsibilities. From what he had seen of Irish Law Officers, to whom Parliament generally looked for the future Judges, he had every confidence in the Irish judiciary—in fact, when this Bill passed, he would not be afraid if his life were placed in the hands of three Irish Judges. The reason why he wanted to press this Amendment was that the Government had not given way on a single point. The clause was untouched by any division; but he must ask the Committee to pause for a moment, for really their object was not to pass the Bill with extraordinary celerity, but to consider what they were doing. It was proposed to have three Judges of great eminence to try certain cases. The prisoner was to have an immense advantage, inasmuch as the three Judges were to be unanimous in favour of a conviction. In every Civil case the majority prevailed. Now, consider how the proposition would work in practice. In almost every case there would be an appeal to delay justice, if for no other reason. The law should be a terror to evil-doers; and the whole object of this measure was, as he understood, to strike terror into the criminal, and to make the law short, sharp, and decisive. If they allowed appeal they would rob the Bill of all its terror and efficiency. He protested against the clause, which seemed the only weak part of an otherwise strong Bill. What would be the effect of a prisoner being allowed to bring additional evidence into the Court of Appeal? The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew full well what was the consequence of there being the right of appeal in his own Office, the duties of which Office the right hon. and learned Gentleman had discharged so well. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew that when a prisoner had tried one defence before a jury and had failed, he had, when the appeal was heard, started another and a dishonest defence. His (Mr. Warton's) objection to an appeal under this Bill was that the Court of Appeal would be a Court for the propagation of perjury; prisoners would look about for a second alibi where the first one had failed. It was unheard of in our law to allow any appeal in criminal cases as to matter of fact, and it would not do to reverse the principle of our law simply because this was an extraordinary tribunal. He heard it gravely stated by the Home Secretary that he considered the question of intimidation a more serious matter than that of appeal, because it happened to be the fighting-ground for many people. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knew quite well that no practical alteration would take place in the definition of intimidation; and he (Mr. Warton) affirmed, without hesitation, that the question of appeal was a much more important one, because it involved so many violations of the principle of our existing law. There ought to be no appeal in cases of fact; three Judges were quite competent to determine a question of that kind. He was anxious to review the case fairly and impartially, and therefore would now consider it from the point of view of the prisoner. Let them take the case of three Judges having found a man guilty of the capital offence, and consider what the effect would be when the Court of Appeal sat. The Court of Appeal, consisting of five Judges, as it might under the Bill, was to determine a case by a majority, so that when a majority of three to two confirmed a sentence of death, the cry would run through Ireland that the condemned had been hanged by three to two, and so far it would be a well-founded cry, and one which those who had been so foolish as to reflect upon the honour and reputation of the three Judges who had originally tried the case, by granting the right of appeal, would deserve to have ringing in their ears. The right of appeal was monstrous. If they agreed that two Judges might carry a point against one in the Court below, then the majority might prevail in the Court above. Irish Judges ought to be as good as English Judges; and, as far as he was concerned, no heed was paid to all the nonsense they heard about political partizanship. He believed that when a man became a Judge, whether he had been a partizan or not, he was just as good, and as fair, as if he had had no politics. Men ought to forget their politics when they were elevated to the Judicial Bench, and he believed they did. He earnestly hoped the Government would pause before granting the right of appeal. He must repeat his argument, for he felt he was almost addressing a jury who required the same thing to be reiterated and reiterated until they understood the point. If in the Court of Appeal three Judges were favourable to the conviction, and two against, it would be said the man had been hanged by three to two, and that was his strong objection to the clause. It was as much in the interest of the prisoner as in the interest of the Crown that they must faithfully adhere to the principle of our law. ["Agreed!"] Yes; he sincerely hoped the Committee had agreed to accept his Amendment. In all his experience of criminal cases—and he had a great reverence for the principle of English law—he never heard of an appeal on a question of fact; and he had certainly never heard of fresh evidence being brought in any case of appeal. Besides the danger of terrorizing witnesses, which fresh evidence would produce, he saw a second danger. What would be the effect of fresh evidence on the part of the Crown? They could not allow fresh evidence on the one side without allowing it on the other. The sentence could not be increased by the Court of Appeal; but the Home Secretary argued that the production of fresh facts might necessarily lead to a limitation of the sentence. The fact that they allowed an appeal in the case of facts admitted the possibility of a variation of the sentence. For the reasons he had given he now moved the omission of the clause.

[Fourth Night.]

Mr. Warton

Amendment proposed, in page 2, to leave out Clause 2.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was perfectly aware there was a great deal to be said against, as well as in favour of the clause. If it were not so late in the night he might be disposed to enter into the arguments for and against the proposal to allow appeal; but the Committee must feel that the Government did not make a proposal of this kind without very mature consideration. There was only one thing he must notice in what the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) had said. He had said a man would be convicted by three to two. That was not so. No man could be convicted under the Bill except by six to two, for the Court below must be unanimous, and in the Court above there must be a majority, and three and three made six. They could, therefore, only have a conviction and a confirmation upon the decision of six to two. The reason they had given the right of appeal was that such great power was being given in the case of heinous offences that some additional security ought to be provided against abuse. Having, after great consideration, incorporated such a principle in the Bill, the hon. and learned Member could not expect the Government to recede from it.

MR. WARTON said, the reply of the Home Secretary was extremely plausible. He could add three and three together quite as well as the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but the point he wished to impress upon the Committee was that when the cry rang through Ireland that a man had been hanged by three to two, any confidence the people might have in the new tribunal would be greatly imperilled. Supposing, too, that the genial and short-witted Irish public were met with the argument of six to two, which was the not very formidable argument of the Home Secretary. There would not be six to two on the same statement of facts. At the trial below there would be only part of the evidence; but in the Court of Appeal, where an entirely different case might be made out, the majority of three to two were to prevail.

MR. HEALY said, the clause provided that—"If the appellant establishes want of jurisdiction in the Special Commission Court, the Court of Criminal Appeal may quash the proceedings;"

and the 26th clause said—

"Provided that no person shall be tried or punished twice for the same offence."

He would like be informed whether, under the Bill, there could be a second trial for the same offence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, that, under the Bill, a man could not be really in peril twice for the same offence.

MR. HEALY gave Notice of an Amendment on the subject on Report.

COLONEL NOLAN remarked that the discussion was being carried on in a most extraordinary way. The Conservatives were showing great interest in the Bill; but that interest prompted them to bring in several Amendments to make the measure still more severe than it was originally framed. He really thought he ought to move to report Progress. He protested against the way the Bill was being discussed by the Conservatives, and if they persisted he should speak upon every one of the Amendments, and carry on the discussion in the same spirit they had manifested.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 3 (Constitution of Court of Criminal Appeal, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would like to take the clause, the consideration of which he did not think would occupy more than a couple of minutes. Of course, if hon. Gentlemen persevered in the Motion to report Progress he should not oppose it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would be very happy to accede to the request of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but really the clause contained a very important provision. He and his hon. Friends felt very strongly upon the question, and he should be glad if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would now allow them to get to bed.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, in page 3, line 4, to leave out "by the Lord Chancellor," and insert—

"The Judges of the Irish Courts shall meet on or before the third day of Michaelmas Term in each year, and shall select, by a majority of votes, three of their number for the trial of the offences before mentioned in a Special Commission Court, under this Act, during the ensuing year. If in any case at their meeting the judges are equally divided in their choice of one of their number to serve on a Special Commission, the Lord Chancellor shall have a second or casting vote. In the event of the death or illness of any Judge for the time being on the rota, or his inability to act for any reasonable cause, the Lord Chancellor shall fill up the vacancy by placing another judge on the rota."

He understood that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was prepared to agree to the proposition that the Judges should be chosen by rota. That being so, there would be no contentious matter in the clause, so that he would suggest to his hon. Friend (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that the clause might be taken.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he also proposed that it should be provided by the clause that instead of the rota being nominated by the Lord Chancellor it should be chosen by ballot.

MR. MARUM said, he had an Amendment to the clause, to the effect that an appeal should be determinable in the same way as the trial in the Court below. His Amendment was, in page 3, to leave out Sub-section 3, which provided that—

"The determination of any appeal shall be according to the determination of a majority of the Judges who heard the appeal ;"

and to insert—

"Appellant shall be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal."

He would like to know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman could accept that Amendment?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was afraid he could not agree to such a proposition.

MR. HEALY suggested to the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) that they should take the clause as far as his Amendment, and then ask the Government to consent to report Progress.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked leave to withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he did not quite understand what the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed with regard to the election of the Judges.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, they proposed that the election should be by ballot, and for that purpose he now moved to omit the first two lines of Sub-section 2, namely—

"The Judges shall sit according to a rota to be from time to time determined by the Lord Chancellor."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MARUM moved to report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND)

TEACHERS BILL.—[BILL 153.]

(Mr. Mundella, The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Mundella.)

MR. A. GRANT said, before the Speaker left the Chair, he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council upon the subject of bringing on a Bill of this character and importance at that late hour. He thought that it was rather a strong thing to take the Bill, seeing that so many Members who were interested in it were not present. There was a material principle involved in the measure, which he thought deserved fuller discussion than it could receive at that hour; and he was bound to say that unless the right hon. Gentleman could agree to the postponement of the Committee stage he should feel it his duty to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. A. Grant.)

MR. MUNDELLA said, he was greatly surprised at the course taken by the hon. Member who had just spoken, inasmuch as the Bill, as it stood, was substantially agreed to by Scotch Members when the question came before the House on the Motion of the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell). There had been no change whatever in the Bill, every line of which had been shadowed out and agreed to on the occasion referred to. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had placed a block upon the Bill, which he was glad to see had since been withdrawn; and he certainly felt some degree of surprise that Scotch Members should now object to proceeding with the consideration of the Bill in Committee. The hon. Member himself had an Amendment on the Paper, which, he presumed, he would wish to be considered without unnecessary delay. The Bill was a short one, and consisted of only four clauses, upon which there was a practical agreement. Under the circumstances, he trusted the hon. Member would withdraw his objection to the Motion before the House.

MR. BUCHANAN said, there had evidently been some slight misunderstanding. A great number of Scotch Members, who felt a strong interest in this question, were absent from the House, amongst them the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell), and the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). Under those circumstances, he thought they ought not to discuss an important question of principle at that late hour.

SIR DONALD CURRIE said, he hoped they might be allowed to proceed with the Bill.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought it would be best to adjourn the debate. He had taken off the block against the Bill, and had given Notice of an Amendment which was not yet upon the Paper. As he desired this might be properly discussed in Committee, he hoped the debate would be adjourned.

MR. WARTON said, he was quite sure that both the hon. Members opposite who had just spoken were not likely to oppose the progress of this Bill without good and sufficient reason. They were undoubtedly men of business, and knew what was right and what was wrong in a matter of this kind. The question involved in the Bill was one undoubtedly of great importance; and at that late hour, after their attention had been taken up for such a length of time by the important measure which had been so long before the House, hon. Members were clearly not in a position satisfactorily to proceed with it. Moreover, he thought that it was wrong on the part of the Government to pick and choose, out of the large number of measures before them, one or two particular Bills, for the purpose of forcing them through the House. He was not acquainted with the details of this question; but he joined in the belief that it was too late to discuss such a measure after the reasons put forward by the hon. Members for Leith (Mr. A. Grant) and Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan). While, no doubt, the Government had their reasons for pushing the Bill on, he was quite sure that hon. Members for Scotland who had spoken had equally good reasons for adjourning the debate.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the Bill had been brought on that evening on the understanding that it was the unanimous wish of Scotch Members that it should proceed. If, however, he were permitted to get the Chairman into the Chair, he should be willing to move to report Progress, in order to give an opportunity for the consideration of Amendments which hon. Members might wish to propose.

MR. A. GRANT said, under those circumstances, he would ask permission of the House to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Mundella.)

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

PARTNERSHIPS (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Barran, Mr. Lewis Fry.)

[BILL 179.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MONK said, the House was aware that this Bill had been before the Select Committee, and had been considerably altered in detail. The Report of the Committee had only been issued two or three days previously, and as hon. Members might not have had time sufficiently to consider its contents, he proposed merely to go into Committee pro forma, and to put down the Bill for that day week.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he was sorry to trouble the House at that late hour; but if his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester insisted upon his Motion he should feel it his duty to take a division upon it. He had the strongest objections to this Bill. It was perfectly true, as his hon. Friend had said, that the Report of the Select Committee had only been in the hands of hon. Members for two or three days. That being so, he must press his objection to proceeding any further with the Bill at that moment. The objections he had were that the Bill was useless, and that so far as it was not useless it was absolutely objectionable. He ventured to say that this Bill would be of no use to any professional man; and, on the other hand, it would be mischievous to the public, because it pretended to be a Code of Partnership Law. If it were necessary that a codification of this law should take place, it should, in his opinion, be carried out by the responsible Government, with the assistance of experts. Without wishing to speak disrespectfully of the Committee which sat to consider this Bill, he ventured to suggest that they were not fully able to deal with this important branch of the law.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Horace Davey.)

MR. EUSTACE SMITH said, he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not persevere in his opposition to this Bill, which expressed the unanimous feeling of the Chambers of Commerce throughout the country. The Bill came down simply in the form of a codification of the existing law. It was easy for his hon. and learned Friend to say that it would do no good to anybody; and, from the point of view of his hon. and learned Friend, no doubt it would do very little good to any leading Queen's Counsel or leading solicitor in the country. But it would be a good text-book to men who wished to enter into partnership, and who desired to make themselves acquainted with the obligations by which they would be bound. He, therefore, trusted his hon. and learned Friend would allow the Bill to go into Committee, where any Amendments which he had to suggest would meet with the fullest consideration. It was generally the case, when any scheme for codification of law was presented to the House, to say, if it were a large scheme, the House had no time to deal with it; whereas, if it were a small one, it was alleged that it was dealing in a petty manner with a large subject. He would remind hon. Members that if that form of criticism were always enforced they would never be able to make progress with any measure of the kind. He appealed to his hon. and learned Friend to allow the Bill to go into Committee.

Mr. Monk

MR. T. C. BARING said, he thought the Bill contained matter that should be left out, and left out matter which it ought to contain.

MR. WARTON considered that the taunts which had been thrown out against the Legal Profession by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Eustace Smith) were quite unjustified in the present case, because he was certain that a question of this kind would be considered in the minds of all impartial lawyers without any reference to their fees. The hon. Member had thrown considerable light upon the origin of this Bill, which was, in fact, legislation by the Chambers of Commerce. If these bodies considered themselves superior to the House of Commons in a matter of this kind, the better plan would be for them to codify the law themselves without coming to Parliament.

MR. WHITLEY said, he was sorry to hear the remarks which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey), because he could assure the Committee that this Bill had met not only with the approval of the mercantile community, but also with the approval of many members of the Legal Profession. He represented one of the largest mercantile communities in the United Kingdom; and he could say, from his own knowledge, that both the mercantile and the legal community in that town were strongly in favour of this measure. It was a most desirable Bill for the codification of the law upon a subject of the strongest interest to the commercial classes in this country, and expressed in the most simple manner all that people could wish to understand with regard to the Law of Partnership. He was persuaded that the more this Bill was studied the more it would commend itself to the approval of those who were interested in the codification of commercial law; and, certainly, he hoped it would receive the sanction of Parliament. He did not know whether the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would press his Motion on the present occasion; but, if so, he, for one, was prepared to support him. He repeated that the Bill was a most useful one; it had on the back of it the names of Representatives of some of the largest commercial cities in the country; and he certainly trusted that the commercial Members of that House would give it the support which it deserved.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, this Bill came before the House on the present occasion in a different form to that in which it was first introduced. The Bill originally proposed some important changes in the law, upon which there would have been considerable difference of opinion. But these proposed changes had been omitted from this Bill in consequence of the action of the Committee upstairs. The Bill now came before the House chiefly as a measure of codification. His own opinion was that codification of the law was of the greatest advantage wherever it could possibly be effected, and, in the present case, would be undoubtedly of the greatest advantage to the commercial community, even if it were not so to lawyers. If the Bill carried out what it professed to do, he said it was worthy of support in that House. With regard to the Bill, as a measure of codification, he admitted the necessity of having the opinion of experts upon it, and that the opinion of the commercial community alone was not sufficient. The matter had at different stages occupied the attention of the Department over which he had the honour to preside; and he had, to some extent, examined into the subject, with the assistance of the officials of the Department. But he had done something more than that. He had submitted the Bill to Mr. Justice Lindley, and that learned Judge had been kind enough to go through it. On the whole his Lordship approved the Bill, but made some minor suggestions, which were adopted by the Board of Trade, submitted to the hon. Member for Gloucester, accepted by him, and then incorporated in the Bill. Under these circumstances, although he was prepared to admit that there might still be some points on which codification had not been properly effected, yet he submitted that these were rather matters for the consideration of the Committee of the House. He was in hope the House would allow the Committee stage of the Bill to be taken, and that his hon. Friend would consent to postpone further progress for a fortnight. Then in Committee of the House any further Amendments which the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) had to propose could be fully considered. For these reasons he should vote for the Motion to go into Committee.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, as the Government would vote against the Motion for Adjournment, he should not trouble the House to divide.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. T. C. BARING pointed out that, the Bill being now in Committee, it might on a future occasion be brought on at any hour of the night; and, therefore, he thought some undertakings should be given that it would be brought on at an hour at which it could be fairly discussed. This was essentially necessary if there were any Amendments of importance to consider.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. WARTON said, he hoped the hon. Member for Gloucester would reply to the suggestion of the hon. Member for South Essex.

MR. MONK said, he regretted he could give no pledge whatever. Hon. Members must be aware that it was not in his power to bring on the Bill at any hour he pleased. In existing circumstances it was useless to expect to bring on a Bill before 1 o'clock in the morning.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 19th June.

JUDGMENTS (INFERIOR COURTS) BILL.

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Norwood, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Corry, Mr. Reid, Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

[BILL 44.] CONSIDERATION.

Further Consideration, as amended, resumed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the object of the new clause he was about to propose was to prevent the registration by an Inferior Court in Ireland of a certificate of a judgment for a sum beyond the jurisdiction of the Court. He did not apprehend that there would be any objection to the clause.

Amendment proposed, page 2, after Clause 6, to insert the following Clause:—
(Existing limits of local jurisdiction shall not be exceeded.)

"Nothing contained in this Act shall authorise the registration in an inferior court of the certificate of any judgment for a greater amount than might have been recovered if the action or proceeding had been originally commenced in such inferior court."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

New Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment to add at the end—

"Provided, That where a judgment obtained in an inferior court in Scotland cannot be registered in an inferior court in England or Ireland, by reason of its being for a greater amount than might have been recovered if the action or proceeding had been originally commenced in such inferior court, it shall be competent to register a certificate of such judgment in the register directed to be kept in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster and Dublin respectively, to be called 'the Register of Scotch Judgments,' by section three of 'The Judgments Extension Act, 1868,' in the same manner, to the same effect, and subject to the same provisions, as if the said certificate had been a certificate of an extracted decret of the Court of Session, registered in the said register under the said Act."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Monk

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Amendment proposed: Clause 2. page 1, line 14, after "decret," insert "civil bill decree, dismiss, or order."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the Petty Sessions and Bankruptcy Courts in Ireland were not attached to the High Court of Justice; and, therefore, he proposed, in line 18, after "Justice," to insert "and, in Ireland, courts of petty sessions and the Court of Bankruptcy."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 2, page 1, line 24, after "England," leave out "or Ireland," and insert "and in Ireland shall include the clerk of the peace or other officer whose duty it is to enter the judgment, decree, or order of the Court."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 21, after "proceedings," insert "and in Ireland a decree, dismiss, or order, as the case may be."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 21, after "had," insert "issued."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 25, after "be," insert "added to and."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 4, page 2, line 26, after "judgment," insert "No certificate of any such judgment shall be registered as aforesaid in any inferior court in the United Kingdom more than twelve months after the date of such judgment, unless by order of the court in which it is sought so to be registered."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WARTON suggested that the last line of the Amendment should not be inserted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, the object of the Amendment was simply to place all judgments in Inferior Courts in the same position at the expiration of 12 months.

MR. BIGGAR asked, whether it was not the fact that when a decree was to be renewed at the end of 12 months, the party intending to make the application for a renewal gave Notice of that intention? Under this Amendment a renewal might be obtained behind the back of the other party, without notice. It seemed to him that if this provision was to stand in its present form further words should be added, binding the plaintiff to give notice to the defendant.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) explained that further words would not be necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, leave out Clause 7.—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 8, page 3, line 5, after "be," insert "respectively."—(Mr. Whitley.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 8, page 3, line 6, after "Courts," insert "and Inferior Courts of Record."—(Mr. Whitley.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 8, page 3, at end of Proviso, leave out "unless to the effect specified in section seven of this Act."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time To-morrow.

COUNTY COURTS (ADVOCATES' COSTS)

BILL.—[BILL 188.]

(Mr. Hastings, Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Rowley Hill.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HASTINGS, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that its chief object was to remove a difficulty which existed in regard to the functions of the Committee of County Court Judges appointed by the Lord Chancellor, for fixing the costs of attorneys and solicitors in the Courts. By the 91st section of the original County Courts Act, no costs could be recovered for advocacy in any case below £5. The Bill repealed that section.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hastings.)

MR. WHITLEY said, he had no doubt that the object of the Bill was well intentioned; but as the Bill was now drawn, it would exclude the right to employ barristers, who were almost a necessity on important questions in the County Courts.

MR. HASTINGS said, the Bill left the law on that point precisely as it stood at present. A barristers' fee was an honorarium, and could not be recovered in any Court.

MR. WARTON said, he would not oppose the Bill; but he would suggest that the word "Advocate" was a misnomer. That term was only used in the Court of Arches, and in other Courts which were now rapidly becoming extinct; and he thought it had better be omitted.

MR. HASTINGS pointed out that that would be a matter for the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. FINDLATER, Bill to amend the Law with reference to the removal and detention of Criminal Lunatics, ordered to be brought in by Mr. FINDLATER and Mr. DILLWYN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 192.]

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 6th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Somersham Rectory* (116); Lunacy Districts (Scotland)* (117); Artillery Ranges* (119); Irish Reproductive Loan Fund Act (1874) Amendment* (120).

Second Reading—Arklow Harbour* (98).

Report—Union of Benefices (London) (101-118); Imprisonment for Contumacy (103).

Third Reading—Inclosure (Arkleside) Provisional Order* (92); Inclosure (Bettws Disserth) Provisional Order* (93); Inclosure (Cefn Drawen) Provisional Order* (94); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order* (95), and passed.

UNION OF BENEFICES (LONDON) BILL.

(The Lord Bishop of London.)

(NO. 101.) REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to order).

EARL NELSON said, he wished to ask a question as to Clause 10, which said that certain sections of a certain Act already in existence should be incorporated into this Act. That mode of legislating was, he was sorry to say, now very often adopted; but it was a slovenly and objectionable way of proceeding. In the first place, it was very difficult for a person who did not know the old Act to understand what was done; and, in the second place, it was very hard to amend the imported clauses. Under the section with regard to the appropriation of seats in the case of the church of a united parish, while reserving half seats free, power was given to the Bishop to appropriate the remaining seats. In the City churches there were a great many old appropriated seats. When he was a Member of one of the Committees on this question, he found that the Sheriffs and Lord Mayor had certain rights to seats in a great number of those churches. If their rights were taken away in regard to other churches, the Bishop had the power by this clause to make up for the deprivation by giving them seats in the churches of the united parishes. As many of the old churches were doing good work, because they had entirely thrown open the seats, it seemed very hard, when the parishes were united, that the Bishop should turn half these seats into appropriated seats.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it appeared to him that the difficulty was a small one, as no church would be pulled down where there was any large body of parishioners; but where there were a few persons left in a parish, who were entitled to appropriated seats in the church pulled down, they should be in the same manner accommodated with seats in the church to which their parish was joined. The Bill, as it stood, would do no one any harm.

THE EARL OF POWIS begged to move, after Clause 14, to insert as a new Clause—

(Provision for special services.)

“On the application of the patron of any church, and with the concurrence of the bishop of the diocese, the Commissioners may by any scheme under this Act provide for the appropriation of such church for holding services for sailors or any other special class of population, and for nominating and licensing, and for the remuneration of any spiritual person or persons to serve such church, subject to the provisions of section nineteen of the Act twenty-third and twenty-fourth Victoria, chapter one hundred and forty-two, with respect to repair and monuments, and also for the application of any repair funds or endowments belonging to such church in furtherance of the objects of the scheme: Provided that on a representation by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to the effect that such appropriation has become unnecessary, Her Majesty in Council may at any time approve any scheme to determine such appropriation and provide for the future use and appropriation of the church and its endowments, if any.”

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he had no objection to the Amendment. The object of the Bill was to remove the churches which had no adequate use; but if churches could be made useful for services for sailors and the like, by all means let them stand. If an appropriation of that kind was found on trial to be inexpedient, power was given to the Commissioners to determine it.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d on Tuesday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 118.)

IMPRISONMENT FOR CONTUMACY

BILL.—(No. 103.)

(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to order).

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, that having made his protest against the Bill on the second reading, believing that the measure would encourage lawlessness in the Church, he did not propose to offer opposition to it on the present occasion. He desired, however, to move an Amendment similar to that brought forward by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, and introduced into the Public Worship Act (1874) Amendment Bill, an Amendment enabling the ecclesiastical authorities to deprive contumacious clergymen of their livings. He did not see anything in the circumstances of the Bill of last year to warrant the addition of this provision, which was not to be found in the circumstances of the present measure.

Moved, after Clause 2, insert the following Clause :—

(Party not to be released from further observance of justice.)

“Such party or person shall not by reason of his discharge in manner aforesaid be released from further observance of justice in the suit in which he has been pronounced in contempt: Provided always, that no further proceeding shall be taken in such suit unless the bishop of the diocese certify in writing under his hand that the party or person has since his release from custody had an opportunity of submitting to his admonitions and has failed to submit to the same. And upon such certificate being filed in the registry of the Court in which such suit shall be depending (whether the same shall have been instituted under the Act for better enforcing Church Discipline passed in the fourth year of Her present Majesty, or under the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874,) the said Court shall issue against such party or person, being an incumbent within the meaning of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the monitions or monition, orders or order, previously made in such suit, an inhibition, which shall have the same force and effect in all respects as if the same had been a second inhibition issued within three years from the relaxation of an inhibition under the thirteenth section of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874; and from and after the time when such inhibition shall have been duly served upon such party or person, or after the expiration of the time (if any) during which the effect of such inhibition may have been postponed by the bishop, pursuant to the power in that behalf given to him by the said thirteenth section of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, every such benefice or other ecclesiastical preferment held by such party or person as is mentioned in the thirteenth section of the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874, shall become void in the same manner and with the same effects and consequences in all respects as if such inhibition had been a second inhibition duly issued under and by virtue of the thirteenth section of the last-mentioned Act: Provided also, that in any case in which such inhibition shall have been issued, no further signification of any sentence of contumacy or contempt shall be made against the same party or person with a view to the issuing of a writ De contumace capiendo under the provisions of the Act passed in the fifty-third year of King George the Third, intituled ‘An Act for the better Regulation of Ecclesiastical Courts in England, and for the more easy recovery of Church Rates and Tithes,’ or of any Act amending the same.”—
(The Lord Oranmore and Browne)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had not receded from the view he held on this point last year. The law must be enforced, and disobedience to it could not be by that House allowed, whether in an ecclesiastical or any other matter. But this Bill was differently framed from the one of last Session, both in other respects, and particularly because it contained a provision under which the released clergyman would be liable to be imprisoned again if he should again be guilty of contempt or contumacy, and if the promoters of the suit should apply for it. Besides, this Bill was only a temporary one, and was intended merely to provide a remedy for an imprisonment of unreasonable duration until the Commission now inquiring into the Ecclesiastical Courts had reported upon such alterations as they might recommend to be made in the law, and until Parliament should have had an opportunity of considering such recommendations. This Bill would practically apply to only one special case, and there was no reason to apprehend that any other case would have to be considered while the measure remained in operation. The effect of the Bill would simply be to release the clergyman referred to; and if he, after his release, repeated his contumacy, he must immediately be put in prison again, if the promoters of the suit thought fit to to press for it. There was nothing in the Bill which permitted contempt and contumacy to pass unpunished, although it was true that no other punishment but imprisonment could be inflicted under it. On a former occasion, he (the Lord Chancellor) had stated, that the inhibition in the case of the Rev. F. S. Green was issued on the 16th August 1879, and consequently, that, unless he complied with the provisions of the Act, he would be deprived at the end of three years—namely, on the 16th August next. Since he made that statement he had seen an opinion expressed by others, that the three years should run from the monition, which was in this case issued on the 27th day of June, 1879; and, therefore, that the three years would expire on the 27th of this month. But the clause was very singularly worded; it spoke of the inhibition as “remaining in force” for three years from the date of the monition. It ought not to be construed loosely against the subject; at all events, there was room for serious difference of opinion as to its true construction: and he would recommend that, for all practical purposes, the later date should be considered the correct one.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that the present Bill did not in any way interfere with the provisions of the present law as to proceedings being taken against a clergyman for contumacy. It simply had reference to the question whether or not a certain clergyman, and any others whose cases might correspond to his, should be released from prison, and was designed to remedy the evils that had arisen from the unexpected application to modern cases of the hitherto forgotten Act of George III. The Amendment, which he hoped the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) would not press, complicated the matter, and was a new departure in reference to the mode of dealing with the offence of contumacy.

Amendment negatived.

Bill to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

SOMERSHAM RECTORY BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for disannexing the Rectory of Somersham from the office of Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and for making better provision for the cure of souls within the said rectory, and for other purposes—Was presented by The Earl of Powis; read 1^a, and referred to the Examiners. (No. 116.)

LUNACY DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make provision for altering and varying lunacy districts in Scotland—Was presented by The Earl of DALHOUSIE; read 1^a. (No. 117.)

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 6th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Corn Returns * [193]; Settlement and Removal Law Amendment * [194].
First Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) * [195]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (West Ham, &c.) * [196].

The Lord Chancellor

Second Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4) * [173]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 5) * [175]; Vagrancy [62].

Referred to Select Committee—Settled Land [120].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Fifth Night].

Report—Tramways Provisional Order * [141]; Tramways Provisional Order (No. 2) * [149].

Considered as amended—Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [152]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [150].

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * [162]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) * [155], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

—o—o—o—

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—THE EARTHWORKS.

MR. BOURKE gave Notice of his intention on Thursday to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he still adhered to the statement made by him on the 2nd of June that the earthworks in Alexandria Harbour were not yet armed in any way; and whether it was not the fact that, some time before the 2nd of June, there were in those earthworks three 18-ton guns and 20 34-pounders? He would put that Question on Thursday, if convenient to the hon. Baronet.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I will answer that Question at once. The information received from Sir Beauchamp Seymour at the date on which I spoke did not mention any armament on the forts—only the day before he stated that they were not armed. After I made that answer we received information that they were being armed, and I informed the House of the fact.

MR. BOURKE: Then, is my information correct that, before the 2nd of June, the forts were armed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That Question I shall be glad to answer on Thursday. I can only say that we were not in possession of such information on the day I answered the Question. I will inquire in the meantime, and if we can get the information by Thursday I will then give the answer. I do not think we possess it at present. I do not think Sir Beauchamp Seymour stated on what day the guns were there.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. P. J. QUINN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. P. J. Quinn, assistant secretary to the Land League, is confined in Enniskillen Gaol, after so many other prominent members of the League, arrested at the same time and for the same offence, have been released; and, if the Lord Lieutenant has re-considered his case?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Patrick J. Quinn is detained in Inniskillen Gaol. The Lord Lieutenant re-considered his case at the end of last month, and decided that he could not then order his release.

MR. HEALY asked whether Mr. Quinn was only assistant secretary to the Land League, and had never made a speech before he was arrested? Mr. Brennan and Mr. Davitt, the chief secretaries of the League, had been released, and he was subordinate to them.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would answer a further Question on the subject on Thursday.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — DETENTION OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether eleven men arrested in Hook, county Wexford, on 27th February, are still confined in Kilkenney Gaol, although two others from the same district, arrested on the same charge were released a month ago; whether it is the fact that no outrages have been committed in the district; if he can state the reason for the detention of these men; if the Government have re-considered the case of Mr. James Ennis, and the other suspects from Bannan, county Wexford, now in Kilmainham; and, why Mr. Pierce Meaney, of Tintern, county Wexford, is detained in the same gaol, while another prisoner from the same district and arrested for the same offence has been released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I find that there are only seven of the men arrested at Hook on the 27th February still in custody, and I have learnt by telegraph that His Excellency has had their cases under his consideration to-day, and has decided to order their discharge. Mr. James Ennis was released on the 31st ultimo. I have received no information about other persons from Bannan, County Wexford, being in Kilmainham; but if the hon. Member will name them I shall ask about their cases. Mr. Pierce Meaney, referred to in the final paragraph of the Question, was released on the 26th of last month.

PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA), 1881 — IMPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVE OILS FROM AMERICA.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the statement of the Correspondent of the "Times" from Calcutta with reference to the importation of dangerous explosive oil from America; and, if it is true that he has instructed the Government of India to repeal or modify the Act passed by that Government only last year; and, if it is true that the Government of India, in obedience to such orders, is legislating upon the subject at Simla where no independent or commercial member of the Council is present?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my attention has been called to the telegram of the Calcutta Correspondent of The Times, which contains an inaccurate statement of the facts. Representations have been made to me by respectable firms that four cargoes, containing 2,500,000 gallons, of petroleum have been rejected by the Government Inspectors as below the standard, though they had taken every precaution to comply with the requirements of the Act. They have laid before me documentary evidence to support the latter assertion. It is also stated that other cargoes are on the voyage, under similar conditions. On consulting Professor Abel, who is the inventor of the test employed here and in India, I find that he is uncertain whether his test, intended to be used in a temperate climate, can be entirely depended on under very different climatic conditions in India. This opinion seems to be confirmed by the fact that identical samples of oil refused at Bombay last autumn have been re-tested in London and admitted. Under these circumstances, and considering that merchants who appear to have taken every reasonable precaution for serious difference of opinion as to its true construction: and he would recommend that, for all practical purposes, the later date should be considered the correct one.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, that the present Bill did not in any way interfere with the provisions of the present law as to proceedings being taken against a clergyman for contumacy. It simply had reference to the question whether or not a certain clergyman, and any others whose cases might correspond to his, should be released from prison, and was designed to remedy the evils that had arisen from the unexpected application to modern cases of the hitherto forgotten Act of George III. The Amendment, which he hoped the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore and Browne) would not press, complicated the matter, and was a new departure in reference to the mode of dealing with the offence of contumacy.

Amendment negatived.

Bill to be read 3^a on Tuesday next.

SOMERSHAM RECTORY BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for disannexing the Rectory of Somersham from the office of Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge, and for making better provision for the cure of souls within the said rectory, and for other purposes—Was presented by The Earl of Powis; read 1^a, and referred to the Examiners. (No. 116.)

LUNACY DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to make provision for altering and varying lunacy districts in Scotland—Was presented by The Earl of Dalhousie; read 1^a. (No. 117.)

House adjourned at Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 6th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Corn Returns * [193]; Settlement and Removal Law Amendment * [194].
First Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London) * [195]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (West Ham, &c.) * [196].

The Lord Chancellor

Second Reading—Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 4) * [173]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 5) * [175]; Vagrancy [62].

Referred to Select Committee—Settled Land [120].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Fifth Night].

Report—Tramways Provisional Order * [141]; Tramways Provisional Order (No. 2) * [149].

Considered as amended—Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [152]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [150].

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * [162]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (Ballymena, &c.) * [155], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA—THE EARTHWORKS.

MR. BOURKE gave Notice of his intention on Thursday to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he still adhered to the statement made by him on the 2nd of June that the earthworks in Alexandria Harbour were not yet armed in any way; and whether it was not the fact that, some time before the 2nd of June, there were in those earthworks three 18-ton guns and 20 34-pounders? He would put that Question on Thursday, if convenient to the hon. Baronet.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I will answer that Question at once. The information received from Sir Beauchamp Seymour at the date on which I spoke did not mention any armament on the forts—only the day before he stated that they were not armed. After I made that answer we received information that they were being armed, and I informed the House of the fact.

MR. BOURKE: Then, is my information correct that, before the 2nd of June, the forts were armed?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That Question I shall be glad to answer on Thursday. I can only say that we were not in possession of such information on the day I answered the Question. I will inquire in the meantime, and if we can get the information by Thursday I will then give the answer. I do not think we possess it at present. I do not think Sir Beauchamp Seymour stated on what day the guns were there.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. P. J. QUINN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. P. J. Quinn, assistant secretary to the Land League, is confined in Enniskillen Gaol, after so many other prominent members of the League, arrested at the same time and for the same offence, have been released; and, if the Lord Lieutenant has re-considered his case?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Patrick J. Quinn is detained in Inniskillen Gaol. The Lord Lieutenant re-considered his case at the end of last month, and decided that he could not then order his release.

MR. HEALY asked whether Mr. Quinn was only assistant secretary to the Land League, and had never made a speech before he was arrested? Mr. Brennan and Mr. Davitt, the chief secretaries of the League, had been released, and he was subordinate to them.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would answer a further Question on the subject on Thursday.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — DETENTION OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether eleven men arrested in Hook, county Wexford, on 27th February, are still confined in Kilkenny Gaol, although two others from the same district, arrested on the same charge were released a month ago; whether it is the fact that no outrages have been committed in the district; if he can state the reason for the detention of these men; if the Government have re-considered the case of Mr. James Ennis, and the other suspects from Bannock, county Wexford, now in Kilmainham; and, why Mr. Pierce Meaney, of Tintern, county Wexford, is detained in the same gaol, while another prisoner from the same district and arrested for the same offence has been released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I find that there are only seven of the men arrested at Hook on the 27th February still in custody, and I have learnt by telegraph that His Excellency has had their cases under his consideration to-day, and has decided to order their discharge. Mr. James Ennis was released on the 31st ultimo. I have received no information about other persons from Bannock, County Wexford, being in Kilmainham; but if the hon. Member will name them I shall ask about their cases. Mr. Pierce Meaney, referred to in the final paragraph of the Question, was released on the 26th of last month.

PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA), 1881 — IMPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVE OILS FROM AMERICA.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the statement of the Correspondent of the "Times" from Calcutta with reference to the importation of dangerous explosive oil from America; and, if it is true that he has instructed the Government of India to repeal or modify the Act passed by that Government only last year; and, if it is true that the Government of India, in obedience to such orders, is legislating upon the subject at Simla where no independent or commercial member of the Council is present?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, my attention has been called to the telegram of the Calcutta Correspondent of The Times, which contains an inaccurate statement of the facts. Representations have been made to me by respectable firms that four cargoes, containing 2,500,000 gallons, of petroleum have been rejected by the Government Inspectors as below the standard, though they had taken every precaution to comply with the requirements of the Act. They have laid before me documentary evidence to support the latter assertion. It is also stated that other cargoes are on the voyage, under similar conditions. On consulting Professor Abel, who is the inventor of the test employed here and in India, I find that he is uncertain whether his test, intended to be used in a temperate climate, can be entirely depended on under very different climatic conditions in India. This opinion seems to be confirmed by the fact that identical samples of oil refused at Bombay last autumn have been re-tested in London and admitted. Under these circumstances, and considering that merchants who appear to have taken every reasonable precaution

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Is the hon. Baronet not aware that the result of that Conference was entirely futile, and does he anticipate a similar result from the proposed Conference?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The hon. Member might obtain information as to the result of the Conference of 1876 from right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask whether the answers received from the other Powers except the Porte, which are said to have been favourable, were distinct acceptances?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; I take it that the Powers are following on this occasion the precedent of 1876. In 1876 the Powers informed us that, while they were generally favourable to the idea, they should keep back their formal answers until they had agreed amongst themselves upon the terms. That was the answer of Germany, and I think it probable that the same course is being taken on this occasion.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Have the Government received any communication from any of the Powers to the effect that they think a Conference unnecessary?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: Have the Government received any intelligence as to the arrival of Dervish Pasha in Egypt, or as to the instructions he has been empowered to carry out?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The conversation between Musurus Pasha and Lord Granville has placed generally before the Government the instructions given by the Porte to Dervish Pasha, and they are substantially on the same bases as those proposed for the Conference. With regard to the arrival of Dervish Pasha in Egypt, judging from the distance, which is only 800 miles, I think he would probably arrive to-night or to-morrow morning.

MR. O'DONNELL: I should like to ask whether the instructions to Dervish Pasha contained any instructions to the effect that the terms of the recent Anglo-French Ultimatum should be insisted on—with respect, for example, to the exile of Arabi Pasha and other matters?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not think it would serve any good end to go largely into discussion on this subject, and I could not answer without entering considerably into discussion. I have already stated that the document in question is not an Ultimatum, and I have given certain reasons why it is not an Ultimatum. The instructions given to Dervish Pasha have not been communicated in detail to Her Majesty's Government, but only general terms; and they resemble those that have been placed before the Powers as the bases of the proposed Conference.

MR. M'COAN: I beg to ask the hon. Baronet, whether, in the instructions given to Dervish Pasha, the expulsion of Arabi Pasha from Egypt was included?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not think we know the exact nature of the measures which the Porte is prepared to take. The measures are, generally speaking, the restoration of order in Egypt, and of the authority of the Khedive.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked when the promised Papers relating to Egypt would be distributed to Members?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Communications with the Government of France with regard to them have now ceased, and the Papers went to the printers this morning. I think it will take two days to get them printed, but they will probably be distributed on Friday morning.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON inquired if this referred to the distribution of all the Papers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; these are only the first set down to February 5. We are still discussing with the French Government with respect to others, and I think, as I said yesterday, we shall obtain their assent to the production of the remainder.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the hon. Baronet whether the fortified works at Alexandria had been discontinued, because the statements in that day's newspapers on the subject were contradictory?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am sorry I cannot give any additional information on the subject. Sir Beauchamp Seymour may have telegraphed further particulars to the Admiralty since I came to the House; but, so far as I know, he has not yet telegraphed.

MR. O'DONNELL: Was it on the authority of the Government that Admiral Seymour applied to the Sultan for the protection of the British Fleet against the fortifications?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir. I stated the facts yesterday, and I have nothing to add to the statement.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked whether, in view of the gravity of the Egyptian crisis and the dangers that threatened the interests of England in that country, the Government would fix an early day for the discussion by that House of the policy to be pursued with regard to Egypt and the Ottoman Power?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I can only repeat what I have already stated, that Her Majesty's Government desire to place the House in possession of all the facts, by laying on the Table the Correspondence up to the end of May, and they have asked the French Government for their consent, which, as I have also stated, has been partially given. Her Majesty's Government must decline to enter on a fragmentary discussion.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Are we to understand that when the Papers are on the Table an opportunity will be given for discussion?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have no doubt that if a Motion of Want of Confidence in the Government in relation to their foreign policy is proposed by the responsible Leaders of hon. Gentlemen opposite, a suitable opportunity for its discussion will be given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. THOMAS BRENNAN.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the report of a speech in the Dublin papers of the 3rd instant, attributed to Mr. Thomas Brennan, late Secretary to the Land League, immediately after his release from Kilkenney Prison, in which the following passages occur:—

"I value personal liberty as much as any one, and feel to the fullest extent the necessity to have to conform to the rules of gaolers, especially when the gaolers are the enemies of our country. And when I say 'gaolers,' I do not mean the gaol officials, much less those of Kilkenney, from whom I have received nothing but uniform courtesy and politeness; I mean William Ewart Gladstone, and John Bright, and Joseph Chamberlain, and the whole crowd of pseudo humanitarians and renegade Republicans that comprise the Cabinet of England (loud and prolonged cheering). These are the enemies of our country.

"Compared with what we have yet to do we have done but very little. I hope that if ever again I am called upon to surrender my liberty in the cause of truth or justice that I will do more to deserve it than I did before. We started with the programme of obtaining the land for the people. Well we have not yet obtained that desirable reform, and we will require to give and take many a hard knock yet before it is accomplished.

"We commenced with the work of eradicating landlordism. Well, the old tree and the superstitious dread that overshadowed the people have been wiped away from the Irish mind, but the roots are still deep in the Irish soil, and though time may rot them we cannot afford that time. We want the place on which to build the structure of an Irish nation, and the roots must come up and be cast into the fire;"

and, if the Government had, before the release of Mr. Brennan, any information leading them to the conclusion that he would range himself on the side of Law and order in Ireland?

MR. LABOUCHERE wished, before the right hon. Gentleman rose to answer, to ask him also whether his attention had been called to a speech made by the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard), somewhat of the same nature as the speech of Mr. Brennan, in which, after accusing Her Majesty's Government of nefarious negotiations, the hon. and learned Member said he had been taught to regard with abhorrence that which was known to lawyers as misprision of treason, and that those who did aid and abet traitors and enter into a compact with traitors, were themselves guilty of an offence? He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was contemplated to submit statements in that speech to the Law Officers of the Crown, with the view of seeing whether any legal action could be taken to restrain such speeches on the part of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston, as they were most injurious to the cause of law and order in Ireland?

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the hon. Member for Northampton, whether he had given Notice to the hon.

and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) of his intention to put that Question?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had only had the pleasure of reading that speech to-day. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Member was in his place, but he had had no opportunity of giving him Notice.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) whether he had given Notice of his Question to Mr. Thomas Brennan?

MR. TREVELYAN: My attention has not until this moment been called to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston. My attention has been called to the speech reported as having been delivered by Mr. Thomas Brennan. As to the grounds of his release, they are simple and avowable. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had regard to the ground of Mr. Brennan's arrest, as stated in the warrant—namely, reasonable suspicion of incitement to riot contained in a public speech; and also to the fact that he had been over a year in prison, and he was satisfied that Mr. Brennan's release would not endanger the peace of Dublin, where he resides. These were the considerations which weighed with His Excellency when deciding upon this case.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question as to the Business of to-morrow. After many disappointments, he had obtained the first place to-morrow for the Motion of which he had given Notice relating to the administration of the Income Tax. He therefore asked whether the Government proposed to occupy the whole of to-morrow with the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill, or whether they would not consent to a portion of the Sitting being devoted to the discussion of the important subject which he wished to bring forward?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, unless the Committee on the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill should terminate in the course of the Sitting to-morrow, I am afraid we must occupy the whole of the Sitting with it; and I have but a slender prospect to hold out to my right hon. Friend.

Lord John Manners

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him that the Business of Scotland and England was unduly postponed. He therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he would not apply the Rule of Urgency to the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill?

MR. HEALY said, that before the Question was answered, he would ask the Premier whether, having regard to the manner in which Ireland continually occupied the time of Parliament, he would find some other way out of the difficulty than that just proposed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, as far as our present experience has gone, that the Rule of Urgency has been regarded, certainly it was so regarded last year, as a Rule that had reference to what is commonly known as Parliamentary Obstruction. Now, the position of the House at the present moment is a most unfortunate one, and no one feels that more strongly than I and my Colleagues do. Although the debates upon the Irish Crime Bill have been long, and we could have wished they had not been so long, yet I must say I do not think they have been of such a character as that we could justly tax them with the offence, if I may so call it, of Obstruction; and unless it could be so proved, I do not think we should be justified in asking the House to declare Urgency for this Bill?

NAVY—BREECH-LOADING GUNS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state the number of breech-loading guns supplied during the past financial year to the Navy; the system of breech-loading on which these guns were constructed; and, at whose recommendation such system was adopted?

MR. CHILDERS: None, Sir, during the past financial year. But during the present year 16 25-pound 4-inch guns, weighing each 22½ cwt., have been issued. The system is known as the French system, with some improvements by Sir William Armstrong. It was adopted, on the recommendation of the Director of Artillery, and approved by both the late and present Ordnance Committees.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th June.]

[FIFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Clause 3 (Constitution of Court of Criminal Appeal, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57).

MR. MARUM, in moving, in page 3, line 9, after "The," to leave out to the end of sub-section (3), and insert—said, the object of this Amendment was to provide that the non-agreement of the Court of Appeal should virtually amount to acquittal of the appellant. In the Supreme Court the principle of unanimity was adopted; but the Government did not seek to put that principle in force in regard to the Appellate Court. He thought it was desirable that they should accommodate themselves as much as they could to the principle of the jury system, and in the jury system, both in England and Ireland, unanimity was required. It must be remembered that they were seeking to deprive Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland of the right of trial by jury, and it was desirable to retain, as far as possible, every part of that right which it was not absolutely necessary to dispense with. In the next place, unanimity was one of the main principles of the Bill. It was required that three Judges should be unanimous in the first instance, and unless they were unanimous there was an acquittal. Therefore, neither one nor two Judges were sufficient to procure a conviction. In the Appellate Court there were four or five Judges, and, it might be, more. He would take a case where there might be seven. In that case, if three of the Judges were in favour of an acquittal, and four were in favour of a conviction, the prisoner or the accused would be convicted—that was to say, that three Judges would not be able to procure an acquittal in the Appellate Court, although the dissent of one Judge would procure an acquittal in the Court of First Instance. He therefore thought it was not an unreasonable matter, seeing that, under the present law, there must be unanimity on the part of the jury before they could convict a man of a criminal offence, that they should endeavour to accommodate the same principle to the Court of Appeal. They were now taking very exceptional powers, which would deprive a large number of the subjects of Her Majesty of the right of trial by jury; and he thought it would be admitted that the effect of that course would necessarily be to lessen the confidence that was reposed in the administration of justice. He thought they ought to do nothing which they could possibly avoid in this Bill to increase the want of confidence which existed in Ireland; and certainly to deprive the Appellate Court of the unanimity which was necessary in the Court of First Instance would very materially shake the confidence of the Irish people in that Court. This was a very important thing to look at in a country where there was already, as he had said, a want of confidence, to a certain extent, in the administration of justice. If he were inclined to enter into statistics, he could show that one of the greatest obstructions to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland was this want of confidence in the administration of justice; and he contended that the adoption of provisions of this kind would very materially increase that want of confidence. It certainly was an extraordinary thing to say that three Judges should not procure an acquittal in one case when the dissent of one Judge in another case would be amply sufficient. The people of Ireland would certainly not be able to understand the distinction; and he thought they were bound to do all they could to show that this Court, exceptional as it was and objected to as it was by the country and the Representatives of the Irish people, would be as little objectionable as possible. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

"Appellant shall be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal,"

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, after "The," leave out to end of sub-section (3), and insert "appellant shall be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Gentleman was not quite correct in stating that this Amendment would put the Appellate Court in the same position as a jury, and would secure to a prisoner the same advantages as he would have if tried by a jury. The hon. Member sought to make out that if one jurymen differed, the prisoner would be acquitted. That was not the fact. If one of the jury differed from the rest, there was a new trial. The prisoner, therefore, in that case, was put on his trial a second time; but by this Amendment the hon. Gentleman provided that, in case of a disagreement on the part of one Judge, there should be an absolute acquittal, and that if out of eight Judges seven were in favour of a conviction and one differed, that difference should prevail to the extent of declaring that the man was not guilty. He felt bound to oppose the Amendment, because, although the Government thought there should be unanimity in the first tribunal in order to secure a conviction, they were, nevertheless, of opinion that the second tribunal might overrule the conviction by a majority of Judges. That would practically leave the law as it stood at the present moment.

MR. LEAMY said, that the appeal under this Act amounted to a new trial. It was proposed virtually to give the prisoner a new jury. In the Court of First Instance, if the three Judges were not entirely unanimous, the accused person was acquitted, so that one Judge out of three could bring about an acquittal, and the man could not be tried again. The new Court of Appeal would constitute a perfectly new jury, composed of five Judges, none of whom would have been upon the first jury. Two out of these five Judges might think the man innocent, and there was a possibility that one out of the Court of First Instance might have considered the man innocent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member was entirely mistaken, because in the Court of First Instance the Judges must be unanimous.

MR. LEAMY said, he accepted the correction. Unless the three Judges were unanimous the man would be acquitted. Even if two were in favour of a conviction, the other dissenting Judge would bring about an acquittal. But, in the case of five Judges in the Court of Appeal, two might be in favour of an acquittal, and, nevertheless, if the other three went the other way, the conviction would hold good. Take the case of a man charged with murder, and suppose the man were convicted by the Court of First Instance, and the case were sent up to the Court of Appeal. Suppose, then, that two out of five Judges held that the conviction was wrong, would it be possible, in the face of public opinion, to hang that man, when two of the Judges who tried him were of opinion that he was innocent? He submitted that it would not be possible to do so, and, therefore, there was a great objection to allow the second tribunal to do that which the first could not do.

MR. HEALY said, there was one other consideration which had been raised, and that was that the clause as it stood would, on the whole, degrade the Judges. It was contended that the Court of First Instance was placed on the low level of an ordinary jury in a horse-stealing case. In such a case one jurymen could upset the entire verdict of the rest, and the same consequences should follow if there were one dissenting Judge in the Court of First Instance. But in the Court of Appeal it was contended that even two dissenting Judges would not be able to bring about the same result. If the proposal that there should be unanimity in the one case was good, why should it not be necessary all along the line? If they were going to give a verdict to a majority in a special Bill of this kind, after having constituted the Judges the jurymen, why not apply the same principle to all cases? If it was available in one particular instance, why not adhere to it always? In the Court of Appeal they might have one or two Judges differing from their colleagues, and, although, as Judges, they were men of judicial power, calmness, and great decision, they were not to have the same weight and authority as an ordinary jurymen in the most trumpery criminal case. The disagreement of a jurymen with his colleagues would upset the whole trial; but one of the Judges of the land, a man who was not likely to arrive at any conclusion until he had given the case the most careful consideration, and who would fully appreciate the gravity of the position, was thought so little of in this Bill that, although he disagreed with his colleagues, his dissent would not be sufficient to upset the conviction. Was this the position Her Majesty's Government wished to take up? In establishing the Court of First Instance they praised the Judges to the highest possible pitch. They said the Judges were a tribunal they must all respect, that they were men of impartiality, standing, candour, and so forth; but, nevertheless, they were not of sufficiently high character to warrant Parliament in intrusting to them the lives of Her Majesty's subjects. In an ordinary tribunal, if one man thought that a man put upon his trial for a criminal offence was not guilty, he could upset the whole proceeding; whereas one of the Judges of the land, in a case of murder, was to have less power than a jurymen in an ordinary case of felony. This Bill was a bundle of inconsistencies from first to last; but of all the inconsistencies of which the Government were guilty, the worst was in placing the measure before Parliament with two voices. While, on the one hand, they praised the Judges as the only tribunal which could give a fair and impartial decision, on the other, when it came to a question of appeal, they thought so little of them that they refused to repose in them the powers that were given to an ordinary jurymen.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think that the Judges would be degraded by this proposal. If they were, they had been degraded long ago, because upon questions of law which did not deal with questions of fact, a man's life might depend upon a majority of one. In the Court of Criminal Cases Reserved questions of law in a murder case were decided by a majority. There might be 11 Judges, or any number, sitting in the Court, and a decision involving the life of a man would be determined by the vote of a majority, although the majority might, perhaps, be only one. One Judge could not, therefore, in that Court veto the opinion of all the rest. In the House of Lords, which was the highest Court of Appeal, the Lord Chancellor had no power to veto the opinion of the rest of his Colleagues if that opinion was given against him; and, therefore, in all the cases where the Judges acted as a Court of Appeal, the decision was really by a majority, and sometimes by a very small majority indeed, and the Judges did not exhibit any appearance of having been degraded by the practice. It was quite true that in some parts of the United Kingdom, although not in all, they adopted the principle of unanimity; but many people thought that, excellent as that principle was, it was one which might be reformed. But as regarded the position of the Judges being affected by the fact that one Judge had no power to veto the decision of the majority, that was the ordinary practice at the present moment, and he saw no reason whatever why it should be changed.

MR. METGE said, he thought that the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as it went, was a good one. But the Government seemed to evade the question as to what the grounds were for leaving the case to the determination of the majority of the Judges. He could not understand why in one case unanimity was necessary, while in the other the opinion of the majority was sufficient. If the Government had no confidence in the decision of the majority of Judges in the Court of First Instance, why should they have confidence in the decision of the majority in the Court of Appeal? He could not see any difference between the two cases, and he thought the Government should give some strong ground before the Committee consented to depart from the rule which had been already laid down in regard to the Court of First Instance.

MR. SYNAN said, he could not concur with his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Metge) that the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had at all met the real objection which was raised by this Amendment, because his reference to questions of law, decided by the Court of Appeal, had nothing whatever to do with this case, which was in reality that of a new trial before a new tribunal.

[Fifth Night.]

At the same time, he thought the Amendment of his hon. Friend went a little too far. He thought a disagreement among the Judges ought not in the Appeal Court to secure an acquittal; but that unanimity ought to be necessary in order to secure a conviction, so that a man might be put upon his trial again. Therefore, if his hon. Friend would shape his Amendment in the manner he (Mr. Synan) suggested, he would certainly support it. The argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had nothing to do with the case, because the hon. and learned Gentleman had placed the question on an analogy with the case of a new trial before a new jury, asserting that if they disagreed there would not be an acquittal, but that the man would be put on his trial again. But unless this was a new tribunal deciding on a question of fact, the only effect of a disagreement among the Judges, in order to make the analogy complete, would be that a conviction would not be secured, but that the accused would be put upon his trial again.

MR. GIBSON said, that the suggestion made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Synan) practically amounted to this—that if one Judge dissented from the decision of the Court of First Instance, it would be impossible to obtain a decision upon anything. He was bound to say that the Bill, as it was drafted, was exceedingly mild. They had in the Court below given the power to one Judge to overrule the decision of two. That, in itself, was rather a strange power to give; but he would pass that by, seeing that it was already decided, and he had no wish to go back upon it. But to say that in the larger tribunal of five Judges they would allow one to negative the possibility of a decision being given by the Court of Appeal was absurd. He failed, himself, to see any argument in support of the Amendment; and, unless everything was to be reversed according to the ordinary rules by which judicial tribunals were governed, he did not see how a Committee could adopt the principle which had been proposed.

MR. REDMOND said, it seemed to him that the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken did not count for very much. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the action of a single Judge would be sufficient, if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) were adopted, to overrule the decision of the Court below.

MR. GIBSON: And his four colleagues in the Court of Appeal?

MR. REDMOND: Certainly. But that did not affect what he was about to say. It was, in fact, not really a new trial upon the question of law, as in the case of a criminal appeal for reserved cases, but a completely new trial on questions of fact as well as questions of law. The whole circumstances of the trial might be changed. New facts might be disclosed that were not known at all to the Judges who decided in the first instance; and he must say that it seemed extraordinary to him, in a case of this kind, that the action of a single Judge should be sufficient to secure the conviction and, perhaps, the execution of the prisoner. He had always thought that in criminal cases of this kind the benefit of the doubt was to be given to the accused man; but, in this instance, there might be so strong a doubt as to the facts that two Judges out of five might be convinced that the man was innocent, and yet that doubt would not be sufficient to save the prisoner, perhaps, from execution. It seemed to him that there was another matter that was raised by this Amendment, and that was the way in which the Irish people would look at this tribunal. They must take into consideration the feelings with which the Irish people would view this Bill. They would view the measure, from beginning to end, with distrust; and, instead of attempting to invest the tribunal they were creating with anything that would increase the confidence of the people, they were doing all in their power to diminish that confidence. When the Irish people saw that, in a particular case, a reasonable doubt was entertained by two Judges out of five, and yet this was not sufficient to save a man from execution, they certainly would have very little confidence in the tribunal; and, as he desired to secure a fair trial for every criminal who might be tried under the Bill, he trusted that his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) would press the Amendment to a division.

MR. FIRTH said, the difficulty of the case was that they were dealing with an entirely new and exceptional tribunal. The ground upon which they claimed to establish this tribunal was not that the verdict of the jury ought to be unanimous, but that the verdict would be likely to be biassed by, or subjected to, intimidation. Upon questions of fact, he failed to see that any case had been made out for allowing the judgment of the Court to be that of the majority. With respect to questions of law, the observations of the Home Secretary would certainly apply; and the majority of the Judges might very well decide on questions of law. But, although the decision of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved was given by a majority, it must be borne in mind that it was never given upon a question of fact. Therefore, when sitting as jurymen and judges of fact, he was of opinion that each Judge should have a veto, such as jurymen now possessed.

Mr. Synan

MR. NEWDEGATE believed that a question had been raised by an hon. Member near him as to the Bill, involving a stigma on the character of the Irish Judges. Now, the case of Ireland was an utterly distinct and exceptional one. The Government had declared that Irish juries could no longer be trusted to give fair and impartial verdicts upon the facts of a criminal case submitted to them, and Parliament had assented to that proposition. All this proved that they were dealing with a totally exceptional case; and he thought that a special tribunal ought to be constituted for the trial of cases under such exceptional circumstances. In short, he shared the opinion which he knew prevailed among a large number of Members on that side of the House—that it would have been better to establish Martial Law than to constitute this new tribunal. As the case was a totally exceptional one, so the treatment should be exceptional; and all attempts to accommodate the forms of the Common Law to a state of things which was practically a state of warfare were most objectionable. He thought it was a dangerous precedent, that it would be perfectly understood, and that it was calculated to undermine the respect which the people should entertain for the Common Law. He hoped the Committee would excuse him for expressing so strong an opinion; but he certainly thought that the employment of the Irish Judges upon the proposed tribunal was a grave mistake.

MR. R. T. REID said, the declaration of Martial Law would really have meant no law at all; and the last example of establishing Martial Law in Jamaica was by no means satisfactory. At the same time, it appeared to him that it would be a most shocking thing if any man in Ireland were to be executed by a Court consisting of five Judges, when two out of the five were of opinion that he was innocent. It must be remembered that the Judges were by this Bill made judges of fact in place of juries; and it was not unreasonable to extend to them the principle which now applied to the decisions of juries. Juries must be unanimous, or otherwise there could be no conviction; and when, instead of 12 jurymen as the first tribunal, they were to constitute a Court of three Judges, and refer their decisions to five other Judges sitting as a Court of Appeal, it was not unreasonable to say that, instead of the unanimous opinion of 12 jurymen, there ought to be the unanimous opinion of the Judges who sat in the place of the jury before a conviction could take place.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he thought that there was great force in the observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman below him (Mr. Gibson), that it was objectionable to require the decision in one case to be that of a majority, and in the other to be unanimous. It was proposed by this section to refer appeals to a Court of five Judges, the conviction being affirmed if three were in favour of it, although two might be in favour of an acquittal, and these two, in professional language, strong Judges. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend near him that if such a case as that did occur there would be a feeling on the part of the people of Ireland that the view of the two Judges who were favourable to an acquittal should not be set aside. Therefore, if there happened to be a powerful public opinion upon any particular case, a difficulty might arise. If unanimity was impossible, he would suggest that they might make the proportion greater. Perhaps if it were decided that four-fifths should be in favour of a conviction, they might get rid of a good deal of the objection.

[Fifth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought that the arguments advanced on both sides were rather self-destructive. His hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Reid) supported the view of the hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Synan), that there should be a new trial in case of a difference of opinion; but he thought, on consideration, that his hon. Friend would see that there could not be a new trial. Who was to institute the new trial? Was it to be the very same tribunal who had given the first opinion? The Judges being appointed by rota, there would be nobody else to send to it. In criminal cases, when they had a new trial they had a new jury. Then it was said that they ought always to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. Every Judge in the Court, sitting as a jurymen, would be bound to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt in the decision at which he arrived; but it was not necessary to give prisoners the benefit of the doubt in cases of criminal appeals, as they were now heard. Doubts might exist in matters of law, but not upon matters of fact; and if there was a doubt in a matter of law it was just as material to the prisoner as a doubt upon a matter of fact. But they did not give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt. In the Court of Criminal Appeal there might be five or six Judges who entertained a doubt or a strong opinion that, by law, the prisoner was not guilty. But did they give him the benefit of that doubt? Not at all. There might be five Judges on one side, and six on the other. The five might think that, by law, the prisoner was not guilty; but he was, nevertheless, liable to be executed if the other six thought that he was guilty. Then, again, it was argued that a strong popular feeling would exist against the execution of the criminal sentence if one or two Judges felt a doubt as to the propriety of the conviction; but that equally applied to a case where five or six Judges entertained a strong opinion that by law a man was not guilty. In point of fact, all these arguments as to the feeling of a doubt in a case were much more proper to be addressed to the Crown, in regard to the exercise of mercy, or upon the question whether the actual sentence should be carried out. No doubt, in such a case it would become a proper matter for consideration. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) said the difference between doubts of law and doubts upon questions of fact was very great. He (Sir William Harcourt) was unable to appreciate the distinction. What was the difference between entertaining a doubt whether in fact a man was guilty or whether in law he was guilty? To his mind there was no distinction at all. He could not see why a man's life should be more in jeopardy upon questions of fact than upon questions of law. He ought to have the full benefit of the doubt in either case, and he got the benefit. It seemed to him that both the doubts amounted to exactly the same thing. But upon questions of law it was not so necessary that there should be unanimity as upon questions of fact. It was necessary to guard, in the first instance, against any careless mode of procedure; against anything having been overlooked. It was not unusual for something or other to be overlooked in the first consideration of the matter, and, therefore, it was most desirable to afford an opportunity for re-consideration. It was with this view that the Bill proposed to give an appeal; but it was not considered necessary, in the case of an appeal, that the decision of the Judges should be unanimous, but that if the majority were of opinion that the man was guilty the conviction should then stand.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he wished to point out the great distinction between the law in regard to cases of criminal appeal, and the law as it would exist after the passing of this Bill. The cases reserved for the decision of the Judges in criminal appeals were altogether dependent on points of law, and the Judges decided whether the law was clearly stated, and was applicable to a certain condition of facts which had been previously presented to the consideration of the Judges on points of law alone. But he understood that the appeal under this Bill was not entirely an appeal on points of law, but that it amounted to a complete re-hearing of the case; and, for the life of him, he could not see why they should require, in the first instance, complete unanimity or a complete acquittal; and, in the second place, should give to the majority of the Court, on re-hearing, the right to say that the judgment of the Court below should pass without question. In fact, what they did in creating this Court of Appeal at all was to afford facilities for the consideration of doubts as to the justice of the first conviction. There was no way of getting out of the difficulty except by having an appeal to a single individual; and he ventured to think that an appeal to a single Judge would be better for the prisoner than an appeal to a number of Judges, if the majority were to decide the case; and for this simple reason, that the appeal to a single Judge, if that Judge happened to be in the prisoner's favour, would acquit him, whereas the appeal to a number of Judges merely meant this—that if the prisoner's case were not sufficiently strong to secure a majority in its favour on questions of fact as well as of law, the judgment of the Court below would stand. They were all familiar with the continual reversal of judgments in the Courts below, and it was rarely asserted that in that reversal there was any denial of justice. On the contrary, it frequently happened, on the re-hearing of a case, that new lights were flashed upon it, and it became, as it were, a trial de novo. What it was proposed to do in this case was, that where there was a case for a second trial, and sufficient material to shake the judgment of the Court below—indeed, if there was enough to shake it almost completely—nevertheless, if by a majority of one the judgment of the Court below was affirmed, the prisoner would be left for execution. It was not a sufficient answer to the objections that were raised to say that such a case would commend itself to the mercy of the Crown. The point was, not whether the mercy of the Crown should be extended or not. It was whether a man should have been found guilty in the first instance or not, and whether they were to decide that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed or not. His own opinion was that the Court of Appeal should decide, once for all, without merely shaking the decision of the Court below. There might be new questions of fact throwing an entirely new light upon the whole of the case, which new questions of fact might not have been submitted to the Court below at all. If it were considered necessary to obtain the confidence of the people of Ireland, he thought the Government should satisfy them that the judgment of the Court below was unshaken, and that, although there had been practically a new trial on questions of fact, no doubt had been expressed as to the propriety of the first decision. It was very well known that cases were frequently remitted from the Courts above to the Court below, with instructions to inquire into statements of fact, so that, in point of fact, cases frequently did occur in which the Court above were of opinion that some questions which had been disposed of ought to be re-considered. He thought that in one shape or another they ought to require the unanimity of the Court before they passed a sentence upon a man which involved the forfeiture of his life.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary seemed to think there was an analogy between this case and the cases referred to in ordinary Courts of Appeal. He (Mr. Charles Russell) failed to see the analogy. On the contrary, there was a wide distinction to be drawn between the majority of Judges deciding upon such questions as those which would be referred to them under this Bill, and the majority upon the ordinary questions of law which were sent up to the Court of Appeal. The questions which came before the Court of Appeal were legal questions; but they were legal questions which assumed admitted questions of fact, which brought home to the prisoner clear moral guilt; and the question which went before the Court of Appeal was generally whether certain technical difficulties existed in regard to the law which had been provided as a safeguard for liberty and life. It seemed to him, therefore, that there was a clear distinction between the two cases, and that the analogy did not hold good. In this case the Judges were to be judges of fact. They were to be the jury as well as the Judges, and the ordinary rule of law with regard to the decisions of the jury was that there should be unanimity. His right hon. Friend seemed to see some difficulty in having a new trial. He said there was no machinery in existence by which a new trial could be ordered. But that did not seem to him (Mr. Charles Russell) to be any real difficulty at all. If the Act provided that there should be a new trial, then the Lord Lieutenant would be called upon to issue a new Commission; and there was nothing to prevent the machinery for a new trial being created by an Act of Parliament. He thought it was desirable, as this was a very serious departure, and a departure which he, for one, sincerely regretted, and which he viewed with very great apprehension, that if the change was to be effected it ought to be surrounded in every way by safeguards, as far as possible, especially when it had been already pointed out that the confidence of the Irish people in the administration of justice so to be administered was already shaken.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. WARTON wished to remind the Committee that all this difficulty, and a very serious difficulty, indeed, it was, arose from the ill-considered nature of the clause. If last night the Committee had not exhibited that extreme desire to hurry through Sections 2 and 3 in the course of half-an-hour, they would have saved the time of the House by listening more patiently to the arguments of those who had given the subject mature consideration. He was not saying this for the purpose of embarrassing the Government, because, as far as his humble power went, he wished to give them every assistance; but he wished to point out that they were now a consultative Body, and the questions they were in consultation upon had reference to the constitution of a very complicated Court of Appeal. He was not surprised at the very large number of difficulties which had been raised in regard to the proposal of the Government. One difficulty was, to give an appeal at all on matters of fact. An appeal was generally confined to disputed questions of law; but he regretted to find that hon. Members, possessing minds and intellects of the highest order, like the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), were stooping to the level of advocates who endeavoured to get off a prisoner at whatever cost. He hoped still to see the Government take courage and strike out of the Bill everything in it that related to giving an appeal upon matters of fact. In regard to an appeal on matters of law, the Home Secretary had already stated what the practice was in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved. In that Court, six Judges could over-rule the opinions of five; but by the constitution of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, an appeal on matters of law was heard, in the first place, by five Judges; and if these Judges differed, then it was heard before all the Judges. Therefore, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary expressed an opinion that there was an analogy between the two cases, that analogy was not quite complete, because, if any Judge out of the five differed at all, the case must go to the Court above. Personally, he objected to this appeal altogether; and, considering the limited number of the Irish Judges, and also the fact that they would already have appointed three to act upon the Special Commission, he did not see how the ordinary business of the country was to be conducted if many of these cases came before the Court of Appeal. He would suggest to the Government that the Bill was also defective in reference to the reasons of the Judges which were to be submitted to the Court of Appeal. A shorthand-writer was to take notes of the evidence; but he failed to see how any shorthand-writer could give the reasons of the Judges. He could only give what he imagined to be their reasons. So far as the present Appeal Court was concerned, the practice was for the Judge who tried the case to state a case for the information of the Court above; but there would be no such case stated for the information of the Court above, under this Bill. He would suggest that no point of law should be reserved unless it had been taken by the counsel at the trial.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he concurred with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), that there was no analogy between an appeal on questions of fact and the appeal to the Court of Crown Cases Reserved on questions of law. The jury found a man guilty of the offence charged against him, and the subject of appeal was always upon questions of law, irrespective of any question of fact. The matter for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved was simply and solely the question of law, and it was no part of the province of the Court to determine a question of fact. The arguments of his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary were, therefore, illogical. This was a matter which went altogether beyond the domain of politics. It was a matter which had to do with public sentiment, and the House of Commons ought not to ignore that public sentiment. Take the case of murder. They gave an appeal from three Judges to a higher Court, composed of six Judges, or, taking the lowest number mentioned in the Bill, five Judges. Did anyone think that it would be possible for any Government to execute a man who was found guilty by three out of five Judges only? He ventured to think not. The public feeling would be outraged, and such a Court would not be endured at all. If that were the case, why should they not require unanimity? Why should they be satisfied with a conviction by three Judges, when they felt that they ought not to act upon it, and when they dare not act upon it, because, if they did, they would outrage public opinion? Then why should they not require that all convictions upon matters of fact should be unanimous? At the same time, he could not support the Amendment, because he thought it was too large. But if the hon. Member would introduce words requiring the decisions of the Court to be unanimous on questions of fact, he should certainly support it, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would re-consider the Amendment with that view. He was afraid that the Bill was altogether an outrage upon the natural instincts of Englishmen. Englishmen were accustomed to trial by jury, and it was a tremendous wrench all of them were making when they agreed to take away that safeguard which had been provided for the liberties of the people, and when they were deliberately depriving a prisoner of the judgment of his peers. He deeply regretted that the Government had been obliged to introduce a clause of this kind. He was afraid, however, that it was an inevitable necessity, although he should have much preferred to see some other mode adopted for dealing with the question. Perhaps a jury of 18 instead of 12, requiring the unanimous verdict of 12 out of the 18, would meet the case. He presumed this question had been fairly considered by the Government, but that they had not been able to see their way to the adoption of such a plan. But as they had taken away trial by jury in order to meet a special emergency, he thought they were bound to guard it in every way, so as not to ignore the well-known principles of our jurisprudence further than was absolutely necessary. It had always been held that there should be unanimity on questions of fact. The real analogy lay there, and not between the provisions of the present Bill and an appeal on questions of law. The true analogy would be obtained by carrying out the principles of unanimity on questions of fact, leaving questions of law as they were now to be decided in the Court of Appeal by a majority. He hoped the hon. and learned Member would accept this suggestion, and amend the Amendment.

Mr. Charles Russell

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that it was not the principle of giving a prisoner the benefit of the doubt that they were now trying to assert. What they were trying to assert was the principle of unanimity. If the Bill were allowed to stand as it was now drawn, the result would be this, that out of eight men who tried a case, six would be able to convict, although two might dissent, and be in favour of an acquittal. But as the law stood at present, before they convicted, they required the unanimity of 12 men. He quite agreed with the Home Secretary that a new trial was not to be thought of, and for this reason, that the going before the Court of Appeal would be in reality a new trial. It was proposed to take a case before a new Court composed of five Judges, not for the mere purpose of trying questions of law, but for re-hearing the whole case and deciding on questions of fact. That, in itself, was a new trial, and ought to be guarded by all the circumstances of a new trial. The Home Secretary failed to see any distinction in regard to the purposes of the Bill between questions of law and questions of fact; but already an analogous tribunal existed for the purpose of deciding criminal appeals, and in that tribunal the distinction which the Home Secretary failed to see was drawn. The law fully recognized that a majority on questions of law might be sufficient, but that in regard to all questions of fact there must be absolute unanimity. There was also this distinction to be borne in mind. An attempt had been made to create an analogy between this case and the case of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved; but there was no analogy whatever between the two and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) of his intention to put that Question?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had only had the pleasure of reading that speech to-day. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Member was in his place, but he had had no opportunity of giving him Notice.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) whether he had given Notice of his Question to Mr. Thomas Brennan?

MR. TREVELYAN: My attention has not until this moment been called to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston. My attention has been called to the speech reported as having been delivered by Mr. Thomas Brennan. As to the grounds of his release, they are simple and avowable. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland had regard to the ground of Mr. Brennan's arrest, as stated in the warrant—namely, reasonable suspicion of incitement to riot contained in a public speech; and also to the fact that he had been over a year in prison, and he was satisfied that Mr. Brennan's release would not endanger the peace of Dublin, where he resides. These were the considerations which weighed with His Excellency when deciding upon this case.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a Question as to the Business of to-morrow. After many disappointments, he had obtained the first place to-morrow for the Motion of which he had given Notice relating to the administration of the Income Tax. He therefore asked whether the Government proposed to occupy the whole of to-morrow with the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill, or whether they would not consent to a portion of the Sitting being devoted to the discussion of the important subject which he wished to bring forward?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, unless the Committee on the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill should terminate in the course of the Sitting to-morrow, I am afraid we must occupy the whole of the Sitting with it; and I have but a slender prospect to hold out to my right hon. Friend.

Lord John Manners

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it appeared to him that the Business of Scotland and England was unduly postponed. He therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he would not apply the Rule of Urgency to the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill?

MR. HEALY said, that before the Question was answered, he would ask the Premier whether, having regard to the manner in which Ireland continually occupied the time of Parliament, he would find some other way out of the difficulty than that just proposed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, as far as our present experience has gone, that the Rule of Urgency has been regarded, certainly it was so regarded last year, as a Rule that had reference to what is commonly known as Parliamentary Obstruction. Now, the position of the House at the present moment is a most unfortunate one, and no one feels that more strongly than I and my Colleagues do. Although the debates upon the Irish Crime Bill have been long, and we could have wished they had not been so long, yet I must say I do not think they have been of such a character as that we could justly tax them with the offence, if I may so call it, of Obstruction; and unless it could be so proved, I do not think we should be justified in asking the House to declare Urgency for this Bill?

NAVY—BREECH-LOADING GUNS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state the number of breech-loading guns supplied during the past financial year to the Navy; the system of breech-loading on which these guns were constructed; and, at whose recommendation such system was adopted?

MR. CHILDERS: None, Sir, during the past financial year. But during the present year 16 25-pound 4-inch guns, weighing each 22½ cwt., have been issued. The system is known as the French system, with some improvements by Sir William Armstrong. It was adopted, on the recommendation of the Director of Artillery, and approved by both the late and present Ordnance Committees.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 167.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th June.]

[FIFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART I.

SPECIAL COMMISSION.

Clause 3 (Constitution of Court of Criminal Appeal, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 57).

MR. MARUM, in moving, in page 3, line 9, after "The," to leave out to the end of sub-section (3), and insert—said, the object of this Amendment was to provide that the non-agreement of the Court of Appeal should virtually amount to acquittal of the appellant. In the Supreme Court the principle of unanimity was adopted; but the Government did not seek to put that principle in force in regard to the Appellate Court. He thought it was desirable that they should accommodate themselves as much as they could to the principle of the jury system, and in the jury system, both in England and Ireland, unanimity was required. It must be remembered that they were seeking to deprive Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland of the right of trial by jury, and it was desirable to retain, as far as possible, every part of that right which it was not absolutely necessary to dispense with. In the next place, unanimity was one of the main principles of the Bill. It was required that three Judges should be unanimous in the first instance, and unless they were unanimous there was an acquittal. Therefore, neither one nor two Judges were sufficient to procure a conviction. In the Appellate Court there were four or five Judges, and, it might be, more. He would take a case where there might be seven. In that case, if three of the Judges were in favour of an acquittal, and four were in favour of a conviction, the prisoner or the accused would be convicted—that was to say, that three Judges would not be able to procure an acquittal in the Appellate Court, although the dissent of one Judge would procure an acquittal in the Court of First Instance. He therefore thought it was not an unreasonable matter, seeing that, under the present law, there must be unanimity on the part of the jury before they could convict a man of a criminal offence, that they should endeavour to accommodate the same principle to the Court of Appeal. They were now taking very exceptional powers, which would deprive a large number of the subjects of Her Majesty of the right of trial by jury; and he thought it would be admitted that the effect of that course would necessarily be to lessen the confidence that was reposed in the administration of justice. He thought they ought to do nothing which they could possibly avoid in this Bill to increase the want of confidence which existed in Ireland; and certainly to deprive the Appellate Court of the unanimity which was necessary in the Court of First Instance would very materially shake the confidence of the Irish people in that Court. This was a very important thing to look at in a country where there was already, as he had said, a want of confidence, to a certain extent, in the administration of justice. If he were inclined to enter into statistics, he could show that one of the greatest obstructions to the peace and tranquillity of Ireland was this want of confidence in the administration of justice; and he contended that the adoption of provisions of this kind would very materially increase that want of confidence. It certainly was an extraordinary thing to say that three Judges should not procure an acquittal in one case when the dissent of one Judge in another case would be amply sufficient. The people of Ireland would certainly not be able to understand the distinction; and he thought they were bound to do all they could to show that this Court, exceptional as it was and objected to as it was by the country and the Representatives of the Irish people, would be as little objectionable as possible. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

"Appellant shall be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal,"

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, after "The," leave out to end of sub-section (3), and insert "appellant shall be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal."—(Mr. Marum.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Gentleman was not quite correct in stating that this Amendment would put the Appellate Court in the same position as a jury, and would secure to a prisoner the same advantages as he would have if tried by a jury. The hon. Member sought to make out that if one jurymen differed, the prisoner would be acquitted. That was not the fact. If one of the jury differed from the rest, there was a new trial. The prisoner, therefore, in that case, was put on his trial a second time; but by this Amendment the hon. Gentleman provided that, in case of a disagreement on the part of one Judge, there should be an absolute acquittal, and that if out of eight Judges seven were in favour of a conviction and one differed, that difference should prevail to the extent of declaring that the man was not guilty. He felt bound to oppose the Amendment, because, although the Government thought there should be unanimity in the first tribunal in order to secure a conviction, they were, nevertheless, of opinion that the second tribunal might overrule the conviction by a majority of Judges. That would practically leave the law as it stood at the present moment.

MR. LEAMY said, that the appeal under this Act amounted to a new trial. It was proposed virtually to give the prisoner a new jury. In the Court of First Instance, if the three Judges were not entirely unanimous, the accused person was acquitted, so that one Judge out of three could bring about an acquittal, and the man could not be tried again. The new Court of Appeal would constitute a perfectly new jury, composed of five Judges, none of whom would have been upon the first jury. Two out of these five Judges might think the man innocent, and there was a possibility that one out of the Court of First Instance might have considered the man innocent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member was entirely mistaken, because in the Court of First Instance the Judges must be unanimous.

MR. LEAMY said, he accepted the correction. Unless the three Judges were unanimous the man would be acquitted. Even if two were in favour of a conviction, the other dissenting Judge would bring about an acquittal. But, in the case of five Judges in the Court of Appeal, two might be in favour of an acquittal, and, nevertheless, if the other three went the other way, the conviction would hold good. Take the case of a man charged with murder, and suppose the man were convicted by the Court of First Instance, and the case were sent up to the Court of Appeal. Suppose, then, that two out of five Judges held that the conviction was wrong, would it be possible, in the face of public opinion, to hang that man, when two of the Judges who tried him were of opinion that he was innocent? He submitted that it would not be possible to do so, and, therefore, there was a great objection to allow the second tribunal to do that which the first could not do.

MR. HEALY said, there was one other consideration which had been raised, and that was that the clause as it stood would, on the whole, degrade the Judges. It was contended that the Court of First Instance was placed on the low level of an ordinary jury in a horse-stealing case. In such a case one jurymen could upset the entire verdict of the rest, and the same consequences should follow if there were one dissenting Judge in the Court of First Instance. But in the Court of Appeal it was contended that even two dissenting Judges would not be able to bring about the same result. If the proposal that there should be unanimity in the one case was good, why should it not be necessary all along the line? If they were going to give a verdict to a majority in a special Bill of this kind, after having constituted the Judges the jurymen, why not apply the same principle to all cases? If it was available in one particular instance, why not adhere to it always? In the Court of Appeal they might have one or two Judges differing from their colleagues, and, although, as Judges, they were men of judicial power, calmness, and great decision, they were not to have the same weight and authority as an ordinary jurymen in the most trumpery criminal case. The disagreement of a jurymen with his colleagues would upset the whole trial; but one of the Judges of the land, a man who was not likely to arrive at any conclusion until he had given the case the most careful consideration, and who would fully appreciate the gravity of the position, was thought so little of in this Bill that, although he disagreed with his colleagues, his dissent would not be sufficient to upset the conviction. Was this the position Her Majesty's Government wished to take up? In establishing the Court of First Instance they praised the Judges to the highest possible pitch. They said the Judges were a tribunal they must all respect, that they were men of impartiality, standing, candour, and so forth; but, nevertheless, they were not of sufficiently high character to warrant Parliament in intrusting to them the lives of Her Majesty's subjects. In an ordinary tribunal, if one man thought that a man put upon his trial for a criminal offence was not guilty, he could upset the whole proceeding; whereas one of the Judges of the land, in a case of murder, was to have less power than a jurymen in an ordinary case of felony. This Bill was a bundle of inconsistencies from first to last; but of all the inconsistencies of which the Government were guilty, the worst was in placing the measure before Parliament with two voices. While, on the one hand, they praised the Judges as the only tribunal which could give a fair and impartial decision, on the other, when it came to a question of appeal, they thought so little of them that they refused to repose in them the powers that were given to an ordinary jurymen.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not think that the Judges would be degraded by this proposal. If they were, they had been degraded long ago, because upon questions of law which did not deal with questions of fact, a man's life might depend upon a majority of one. In the Court of Criminal Cases Reserved questions of law in a murder case were decided by a majority. There might be 11 Judges, or any number, sitting in the Court, and a decision involving the life of a man would be determined by the vote of a majority, although the majority might, perhaps, be only one. One Judge could not, therefore, in that Court veto the opinion of all the rest. In the House of Lords, which was the highest Court of Appeal, the Lord Chancellor had no power to veto the opinion of the rest of his Colleagues if that opinion was given against him; and, therefore, in all the cases where the Judges acted as a Court of Appeal, the decision was really by a majority, and sometimes by a very small majority indeed, and the Judges did not exhibit any appearance of having been degraded by the practice. It was quite true that in some parts of the United Kingdom, although not in all, they adopted the principle of unanimity; but many people thought that, excellent as that principle was, it was one which might be reformed. But as regarded the position of the Judges being affected by the fact that one Judge had no power to veto the decision of the majority, that was the ordinary practice at the present moment, and he saw no reason whatever why it should be changed.

MR. METGE said, he thought that the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as it went, was a good one. But the Government seemed to evade the question as to what the grounds were for leaving the case to the determination of the majority of the Judges. He could not understand why in one case unanimity was necessary, while in the other the opinion of the majority was sufficient. If the Government had no confidence in the decision of the majority of Judges in the Court of First Instance, why should they have confidence in the decision of the majority in the Court of Appeal? He could not see any difference between the two cases, and he thought the Government should give some strong ground before the Committee consented to depart from the rule which had been already laid down in regard to the Court of First Instance.

MR. SYNAN said, he could not concur with his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Metge) that the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had at all met the real objection which was raised by this Amendment, because his reference to questions of law, decided by the Court of Appeal, had nothing whatever to do with this case, which was in reality that of a new trial before a new tribunal.

[Fifth Night.]

At the same time, he thought the Amendment of his hon. Friend went a little too far. He thought a disagreement among the Judges ought not in the Appeal Court to secure an acquittal; but that unanimity ought to be necessary in order to secure a conviction, so that a man might be put upon his trial again. Therefore, if his hon. Friend would shape his Amendment in the manner he (Mr. Synan) suggested, he would certainly support it. The argument of the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had nothing to do with the case, because the hon. and learned Gentleman had placed the question on an analogy with the case of a new trial before a new jury, asserting that if they disagreed there would not be an acquittal, but that the man would be put on his trial again. But unless this was a new tribunal deciding on a question of fact, the only effect of a disagreement among the Judges, in order to make the analogy complete, would be that a conviction would not be secured, but that the accused would be put upon his trial again.

MR. GIBSON said, that the suggestion made by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the county of Limerick (Mr. Synan) practically amounted to this—that if one Judge dissented from the decision of the Court of First Instance, it would be impossible to obtain a decision upon anything. He was bound to say that the Bill, as it was drafted, was exceedingly mild. They had in the Court below given the power to one Judge to overrule the decision of two. That, in itself, was rather a strange power to give; but he would pass that by, seeing that it was already decided, and he had no wish to go back upon it. But to say that in the larger tribunal of five Judges they would allow one to negative the possibility of a decision being given by the Court of Appeal was absurd. He failed, himself, to see any argument in support of the Amendment; and, unless everything was to be reversed according to the ordinary rules by which judicial tribunals were governed, he did not see how a Committee could adopt the principle which had been proposed.

MR. REDMOND said, it seemed to him that the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken did not count for very much. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the action of a single Judge would be sufficient, if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) were adopted, to overrule the decision of the Court below.

MR. GIBSON: And his four colleagues in the Court of Appeal?

MR. REDMOND: Certainly. But that did not affect what he was about to say. It was, in fact, not really a new trial upon the question of law, as in the case of a criminal appeal for reserved cases, but a completely new trial on questions of fact as well as questions of law. The whole circumstances of the trial might be changed. New facts might be disclosed that were not known at all to the Judges who decided in the first instance; and he must say that it seemed extraordinary to him, in a case of this kind, that the action of a single Judge should be sufficient to secure the conviction and, perhaps, the execution of the prisoner. He had always thought that in criminal cases of this kind the benefit of the doubt was to be given to the accused man; but, in this instance, there might be so strong a doubt as to the facts that two Judges out of five might be convinced that the man was innocent, and yet that doubt would not be sufficient to save the prisoner, perhaps, from execution. It seemed to him that there was another matter that was raised by this Amendment, and that was the way in which the Irish people would look at this tribunal. They must take into consideration the feelings with which the Irish people would view this Bill. They would view the measure, from beginning to end, with distrust; and, instead of attempting to invest the tribunal they were creating with anything that would increase the confidence of the people, they were doing all in their power to diminish that confidence. When the Irish people saw that, in a particular case, a reasonable doubt was entertained by two Judges out of five, and yet this was not sufficient to save a man from execution, they certainly would have very little confidence in the tribunal; and, as he desired to secure a fair trial for every criminal who might be tried under the Bill, he trusted that his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) would press the Amendment to a division.

MR. FIRTH said, the difficulty of the case was that they were dealing with an entirely new and exceptional tribunal. The ground upon which they claimed to establish this tribunal was not that the verdict of the jury ought to be unanimous, but that the verdict would be likely to be biassed by, or subjected to, intimidation. Upon questions of fact, he failed to see that any case had been made out for allowing the judgment of the Court to be that of the majority. With respect to questions of law, the observations of the Home Secretary would certainly apply; and the majority of the Judges might very well decide on questions of law. But, although the decision of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved was given by a majority, it must be borne in mind that it was never given upon a question of fact. Therefore, when sitting as jurymen and judges of fact, he was of opinion that each Judge should have a veto, such as jurymen now possessed.

Mr. Synan

MR. NEWDEGATE believed that a question had been raised by an hon. Member near him as to the Bill, involving a stigma on the character of the Irish Judges. Now, the case of Ireland was an utterly distinct and exceptional one. The Government had declared that Irish juries could no longer be trusted to give fair and impartial verdicts upon the facts of a criminal case submitted to them, and Parliament had assented to that proposition. All this proved that they were dealing with a totally exceptional case; and he thought that a special tribunal ought to be constituted for the trial of cases under such exceptional circumstances. In short, he shared the opinion which he knew prevailed among a large number of Members on that side of the House—that it would have been better to establish Martial Law than to constitute this new tribunal. As the case was a totally exceptional one, so the treatment should be exceptional; and all attempts to accommodate the forms of the Common Law to a state of things which was practically a state of warfare were most objectionable. He thought it was a dangerous precedent, that it would be perfectly understood, and that it was calculated to undermine the respect which the people should entertain for the Common Law. He hoped the Committee would excuse him for expressing so strong an opinion; but he certainly thought that the employment of the Irish Judges upon the proposed tribunal was a grave mistake.

MR. R. T. REID said, the declaration of Martial Law would really have meant no law at all; and the last example of establishing Martial Law in Jamaica was by no means satisfactory. At the same time, it appeared to him that it would be a most shocking thing if any man in Ireland were to be executed by a Court consisting of five Judges, when two out of the five were of opinion that he was innocent. It must be remembered that the Judges were by this Bill made judges of fact in place of juries; and it was not unreasonable to extend to them the principle which now applied to the decisions of juries. Juries must be unanimous, or otherwise there could be no conviction; and when, instead of 12 jurymen as the first tribunal, they were to constitute a Court of three Judges, and refer their decisions to five other Judges sitting as a Court of Appeal, it was not unreasonable to say that, instead of the unanimous opinion of 12 jurymen, there ought to be the unanimous opinion of the Judges who sat in the place of the jury before a conviction could take place.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he thought that there was great force in the observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman below him (Mr. Gibson), that it was objectionable to require the decision in one case to be that of a majority, and in the other to be unanimous. It was proposed by this section to refer appeals to a Court of five Judges, the conviction being affirmed if three were in favour of it, although two might be in favour of an acquittal, and these two, in professional language, strong Judges. He quite agreed with his hon. Friend near him that if such a case as that did occur there would be a feeling on the part of the people of Ireland that the view of the two Judges who were favourable to an acquittal should not be set aside. Therefore, if there happened to be a powerful public opinion upon any particular case, a difficulty might arise. If unanimity was impossible, he would suggest that they might make the proportion greater. Perhaps if it were decided that four-fifths should be in favour of a conviction, they might get rid of a good deal of the objection.

[Fifth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought that the arguments advanced on both sides were rather self-destructive. His hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Reid) supported the view of the hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Synan), that there should be a new trial in case of a difference of opinion; but he thought, on consideration, that his hon. Friend would see that there could not be a new trial. Who was to institute the new trial? Was it to be the very same tribunal who had given the first opinion? The Judges being appointed by rota, there would be nobody else to send to it. In criminal cases, when they had a new trial they had a new jury. Then it was said that they ought always to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. Every Judge in the Court, sitting as a jurymen, would be bound to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt in the decision at which he arrived; but it was not necessary to give prisoners the benefit of the doubt in cases of criminal appeals, as they were now heard. Doubts might exist in matters of law, but not upon matters of fact; and if there was a doubt in a matter of law it was just as material to the prisoner as a doubt upon a matter of fact. But they did not give the prisoner the benefit of that doubt. In the Court of Criminal Appeal there might be five or six Judges who entertained a doubt or a strong opinion that, by law, the prisoner was not guilty. But did they give him the benefit of that doubt? Not at all. There might be five Judges on one side, and six on the other. The five might think that, by law, the prisoner was not guilty; but he was, nevertheless, liable to be executed if the other six thought that he was guilty. Then, again, it was argued that a strong popular feeling would exist against the execution of the criminal sentence if one or two Judges felt a doubt as to the propriety of the conviction; but that equally applied to a case where five or six Judges entertained a strong opinion that by law a man was not guilty. In point of fact, all these arguments as to the feeling of a doubt in a case were much more proper to be addressed to the Crown, in regard to the exercise of mercy, or upon the question whether the actual sentence should be carried out. No doubt, in such a case it would become a proper matter for consideration. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) said the difference between doubts of law and doubts upon questions of fact was very great. He (Sir William Harcourt) was unable to appreciate the distinction. What was the difference between entertaining a doubt whether in fact a man was guilty or whether in law he was guilty? To his mind there was no distinction at all. He could not see why a man's life should be more in jeopardy upon questions of fact than upon questions of law. He ought to have the full benefit of the doubt in either case, and he got the benefit. It seemed to him that both the doubts amounted to exactly the same thing. But upon questions of law it was not so necessary that there should be unanimity as upon questions of fact. It was necessary to guard, in the first instance, against any careless mode of procedure; against anything having been overlooked. It was not unusual for something or other to be overlooked in the first consideration of the matter, and, therefore, it was most desirable to afford an opportunity for re-consideration. It was with this view that the Bill proposed to give an appeal; but it was not considered necessary, in the case of an appeal, that the decision of the Judges should be unanimous, but that if the majority were of opinion that the man was guilty the conviction should then stand.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he wished to point out the great distinction between the law in regard to cases of criminal appeal, and the law as it would exist after the passing of this Bill. The cases reserved for the decision of the Judges in criminal appeals were altogether dependent on points of law, and the Judges decided whether the law was clearly stated, and was applicable to a certain condition of facts which had been previously presented to the consideration of the Judges on points of law alone. But he understood that the appeal under this Bill was not entirely an appeal on points of law, but that it amounted to a complete re-hearing of the case; and, for the life of him, he could not see why they should require, in the first instance, complete unanimity or a complete acquittal; and, in the second place, should give to the majority of the Court, on re-hearing, the right to say that the judgment of the Court below should pass without question. In fact, what they did in creating this Court of Appeal at all was to afford facilities for the consideration of doubts as to the justice of the first conviction. There was no way of getting out of the difficulty except by having an appeal to a single individual; and he ventured to think that an appeal to a single Judge would be better for the prisoner than an appeal to a number of Judges, if the majority were to decide the case; and for this simple reason, that the appeal to a single Judge, if that Judge happened to be in the prisoner's favour, would acquit him, whereas the appeal to a number of Judges merely meant this—that if the prisoner's case were not sufficiently strong to secure a majority in its favour on questions of fact as well as of law, the judgment of the Court below would stand. They were all familiar with the continual reversal of judgments in the Courts below, and it was rarely asserted that in that reversal there was any denial of justice. On the contrary, it frequently happened, on the re-hearing of a case, that new lights were flashed upon it, and it became, as it were, a trial de novo. What it was proposed to do in this case was, that where there was a case for a second trial, and sufficient material to shake the judgment of the Court below—indeed, if there was enough to shake it almost completely—nevertheless, if by a majority of one the judgment of the Court below was affirmed, the prisoner would be left for execution. It was not a sufficient answer to the objections that were raised to say that such a case would commend itself to the mercy of the Crown. The point was, not whether the mercy of the Crown should be extended or not. It was whether a man should have been found guilty in the first instance or not, and whether they were to decide that the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed or not. His own opinion was that the Court of Appeal should decide, once for all, without merely shaking the decision of the Court below. There might be new questions of fact throwing an entirely new light upon the whole of the case, which new questions of fact might not have been submitted to the Court below at all. If it were considered necessary to obtain the confidence of the people of Ireland, he thought the Government should satisfy them that the judgment of the Court below was unshaken, and that, although there had been practically a new trial on questions of fact, no doubt had been expressed as to the propriety of the first decision. It was very well known that cases were frequently remitted from the Courts above to the Court below, with instructions to inquire into statements of fact, so that, in point of fact, cases frequently did occur in which the Court above were of opinion that some questions which had been disposed of ought to be re-considered. He thought that in one shape or another they ought to require the unanimity of the Court before they passed a sentence upon a man which involved the forfeiture of his life.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary seemed to think there was an analogy between this case and the cases referred to in ordinary Courts of Appeal. He (Mr. Charles Russell) failed to see the analogy. On the contrary, there was a wide distinction to be drawn between the majority of Judges deciding upon such questions as those which would be referred to them under this Bill, and the majority upon the ordinary questions of law which were sent up to the Court of Appeal. The questions which came before the Court of Appeal were legal questions; but they were legal questions which assumed admitted questions of fact, which brought home to the prisoner clear moral guilt; and the question which went before the Court of Appeal was generally whether certain technical difficulties existed in regard to the law which had been provided as a safeguard for liberty and life. It seemed to him, therefore, that there was a clear distinction between the two cases, and that the analogy did not hold good. In this case the Judges were to be judges of fact. They were to be the jury as well as the Judges, and the ordinary rule of law with regard to the decisions of the jury was that there should be unanimity. His right hon. Friend seemed to see some difficulty in having a new trial. He said there was no machinery in existence by which a new trial could be ordered. But that did not seem to him (Mr. Charles Russell) to be any real difficulty at all. If the Act provided that there should be a new trial, then the Lord Lieutenant would be called upon to issue a new Commission; and there was nothing to prevent the machinery for a new trial being created by an Act of Parliament. He thought it was desirable, as this was a very serious departure, and a departure which he, for one, sincerely regretted, and which he viewed with very great apprehension, that if the change was to be effected it ought to be surrounded in every way by safeguards, as far as possible, especially when it had been already pointed out that the confidence of the Irish people in the administration of justice so to be administered was already shaken.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. WARTON wished to remind the Committee that all this difficulty, and a very serious difficulty, indeed, it was, arose from the ill-considered nature of the clause. If last night the Committee had not exhibited that extreme desire to hurry through Sections 2 and 3 in the course of half-an-hour, they would have saved the time of the House by listening more patiently to the arguments of those who had given the subject mature consideration. He was not saying this for the purpose of embarrassing the Government, because, as far as his humble power went, he wished to give them every assistance; but he wished to point out that they were now a consultative Body, and the questions they were in consultation upon had reference to the constitution of a very complicated Court of Appeal. He was not surprised at the very large number of difficulties which had been raised in regard to the proposal of the Government. One difficulty was, to give an appeal at all on matters of fact. An appeal was generally confined to disputed questions of law; but he regretted to find that hon. Members, possessing minds and intellects of the highest order, like the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), were stooping to the level of advocates who endeavoured to get off a prisoner at whatever cost. He hoped still to see the Government take courage and strike out of the Bill everything in it that related to giving an appeal upon matters of fact. In regard to an appeal on matters of law, the Home Secretary had already stated what the practice was in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved. In that Court, six Judges could over-rule the opinions of five; but by the constitution of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, an appeal on matters of law was heard, in the first place, by five Judges; and if these Judges differed, then it was heard before all the Judges. Therefore, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary expressed an opinion that there was an analogy between the two cases, that analogy was not quite complete, because, if any Judge out of the five differed at all, the case must go to the Court above. Personally, he objected to this appeal altogether; and, considering the limited number of the Irish Judges, and also the fact that they would already have appointed three to act upon the Special Commission, he did not see how the ordinary business of the country was to be conducted if many of these cases came before the Court of Appeal. He would suggest to the Government that the Bill was also defective in reference to the reasons of the Judges which were to be submitted to the Court of Appeal. A shorthand-writer was to take notes of the evidence; but he failed to see how any shorthand-writer could give the reasons of the Judges. He could only give what he imagined to be their reasons. So far as the present Appeal Court was concerned, the practice was for the Judge who tried the case to state a case for the information of the Court above; but there would be no such case stated for the information of the Court above, under this Bill. He would suggest that no point of law should be reserved unless it had been taken by the counsel at the trial.

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he concurred with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), that there was no analogy between an appeal on questions of fact and the appeal to the Court of Crown Cases Reserved on questions of law. The jury found a man guilty of the offence charged against him, and the subject of appeal was always upon questions of law, irrespective of any question of fact. The matter for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved was simply and solely the question of law, and it was no part of the province of the Court to determine a question of fact. The arguments of his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary were, therefore, illogical. This was a matter which went altogether beyond the domain of politics. It was a matter which had to do with public sentiment, and the House of Commons ought not to ignore that public sentiment. Take the case of murder. They gave an appeal from three Judges to a higher Court, composed of six Judges, or, taking the lowest number mentioned in the Bill, five Judges. Did anyone think that it would be possible for any Government to execute a man who was found guilty by three out of five Judges only? He ventured to think not. The public feeling would be outraged, and such a Court would not be endured at all. If that were the case, why should they not require unanimity? Why should they be satisfied with a conviction by three Judges, when they felt that they ought not to act upon it, and when they dare not act upon it, because, if they did, they would outrage public opinion? Then why should they not require that all convictions upon matters of fact should be unanimous? At the same time, he could not support the Amendment, because he thought it was too large. But if the hon. Member would introduce words requiring the decisions of the Court to be unanimous on questions of fact, he should certainly support it, and he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would re-consider the Amendment with that view. He was afraid that the Bill was altogether an outrage upon the natural instincts of Englishmen. Englishmen were accustomed to trial by jury, and it was a tremendous wrench all of them were making when they agreed to take away that safeguard which had been provided for the liberties of the people, and when they were deliberately depriving a prisoner of the judgment of his peers. He deeply regretted that the Government had been obliged to introduce a clause of this kind. He was afraid, however, that it was an inevitable necessity, although he should have much preferred to see some other mode adopted for dealing with the question. Perhaps a jury of 18 instead of 12, requiring the unanimous verdict of 12 out of the 18, would meet the case. He presumed this question had been fairly considered by the Government, but that they had not been able to see their way to the adoption of such a plan. But as they had taken away trial by jury in order to meet a special emergency, he thought they were bound to guard it in every way, so as not to ignore the well-known principles of our jurisprudence further than was absolutely necessary. It had always been held that there should be unanimity on questions of fact. The real analogy lay there, and not between the provisions of the present Bill and an appeal on questions of law. The true analogy would be obtained by carrying out the principles of unanimity on questions of fact, leaving questions of law as they were now to be decided in the Court of Appeal by a majority. He hoped the hon. and learned Member would accept this suggestion, and amend the Amendment.

Mr. Charles Russell

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that it was not the principle of giving a prisoner the benefit of the doubt that they were now trying to assert. What they were trying to assert was the principle of unanimity. If the Bill were allowed to stand as it was now drawn, the result would be this, that out of eight men who tried a case, six would be able to convict, although two might dissent, and be in favour of an acquittal. But as the law stood at present, before they convicted, they required the unanimity of 12 men. He quite agreed with the Home Secretary that a new trial was not to be thought of, and for this reason, that the going before the Court of Appeal would be in reality a new trial. It was proposed to take a case before a new Court composed of five Judges, not for the mere purpose of trying questions of law, but for re-hearing the whole case and deciding on questions of fact. That, in itself, was a new trial, and ought to be guarded by all the circumstances of a new trial. The Home Secretary failed to see any distinction in regard to the purposes of the Bill between questions of law and questions of fact; but already an analogous tribunal existed for the purpose of deciding criminal appeals, and in that tribunal the distinction which the Home Secretary failed to see was drawn. The law fully recognized that a majority on questions of law might be sufficient, but that in regard to all questions of fact there must be absolute unanimity. There was also this distinction to be borne in mind. An attempt had been made to create an analogy between this case and the case of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved; but there was no analogy whatever between the two

[Fifth Night.]

Courts. One was a Court solely for the consideration of questions of law; while the Court of Appeal it was proposed to establish was as much a Court for the decision of matters of fact as a jury of 12 men. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the cause of the dissent of two Judges was a thing which would weigh with the Executive just the same as a recommendation of the jury to mercy, when it became a question of inflicting a severe punishment. But he was sorry to say that this was not the experience they had had in Ireland in analogous cases. They had had cases in Ireland where jurymen had disagreed one day, and where a new jury was sworn to try the same case, and on the second jury convicting, the sentence was carried out. Therefore, they could not hope that this result would invariably follow on the dissent of two Judges, because the mere fact of a disagreement on the part of the first jury, in the case he mentioned, showed that there were doubts entertained, and that there was a considerable amount of dissent. He would suggest to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum) that he should add to the Amendment words to this effect—

“That the appellant should be acquitted unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concurred in the determination of the appeal on questions of fact.”

He thought it might be possible to add these words, and the principle of the majority deciding on questions of law would not be disturbed.

MR. MARUM said, he should be glad to avail himself of the suggestion which had been made on the other side with reference to the distinction between matters of law and matters of fact. The Amendment would then run in this way—

“The appellant shall be acquitted on matters of fact unless the whole Court of Criminal Appeal concur in the determination of the appeal.”

He would, however, if the Government accepted this suggestion, leave the drafting of the clause in its details to the Government themselves. After the expression of opinion which had been elicited from all sides of the House, he trusted the Government would, in the face of so great a body of feeling, consent to the amendment of the clause in its present shape. He concurred in the statements which had been made that, as a matter of sentiment, the proposal to deprive the people of Ireland of trial by jury would be very distasteful in this country, and, therefore, it ought to be safeguarded in every shape and form with reference to the sentiment of the people. They were now going to try persons accused of crime by a Judge without a jury, and they ought to throw around the proceeding all the elements of trial by jury as far as possible. One of the most important of these elements was that there should be unanimity in the decision. If the Government desired to secure the confidence of the Irish people in their legislation, they would certainly accept this Amendment.

MR. GIBSON said, that, as for high considerations of proved expediency, it was thought right to suspend trial by jury for the purposes of this Bill, why, in the name of common sense, should they set up in its place an impossible and unworkable tribunal? They should either retain the existing system with all its imperfections, or else set up in its place something that would work satisfactorily. When hon. Members talked of safeguards, what was evidently present in their mind was that it was desirable to make the working of the new tribunal impossible. They might surround it with so many safeguards that they would make it absolutely impossible to arrive at any decision at all. Take the statements that had been made that there must be unanimity throughout in regard to matters of fact. It was said that the Court of First Instance was to follow the analogy of the jury, and to be unanimous in their conviction of an accused person; but they had got more than that in the Bill, as framed by the Home Secretary. If a jury disagreed and was not unanimous, the consequence was not an acquittal, but that the man could be tried again. Here, however, the Court of First Instance was so constituted that if it disagreed, the analogy of the jury system was not followed, but an acquittal resulted. That being so, he should like to ask if the analogy of the jury was followed up? The three Judges of First Instance were supposed to be in the place of a jury, but in the existing system of a criminal jury trial there was the power of getting a second trial before another jury. There was nothing of that kind here. In addition to the changes he had indicated, there was the power of taking the case to another Court, on dissatisfaction being expressed at the result—because, really, it came to that, without any certificate of the Judge that there were reasonable grounds for an appeal. On the mere motion of the criminal that he would like to have another chance, and without any suggestion from the Bench that they themselves desired to have certain cases referred, the case could be reviewed. The prisoner, who naturally would always be dissatisfied with every sentence, and extremely dissatisfied with every conviction, had power to bring on the case again on an appeal from one tribunal to a larger tribunal; and the contention now was, that that larger tribunal was again to be subjected to all the analogies of a jury trial. If that were done, they practically surrounded the case with what were called safeguards to such an extent that they ran the risk of giving far greater impunity to crime under the new system than could possibly exist under the old one. In the Amendment suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Marum), the hon. Member himself departed from the analogy of the jury system, because in the event of the Court of First Instance being unanimous upon the question of guilt and sentence, the Court being composed of three of the highest Judges of the land, the case was to go before a tribunal of five Judges. In that tribunal the judgment might be affirmed by four to one, the four being four of the highest Judges in Ireland. Practically, therefore, there would be seven to one in favour of a conviction; but the result would be that the dissent of the one Judge would acquit the prisoner. The effect of the dissent of the one Judge would not be the same as the disagreement of a jury, but would amount to a direct acquittal. He thought it was impossible to carry safeguarding to a more absurd extreme.

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had listened very carefully to the debate, and he was bound to say that it had not altered the views he had already formed on the subject. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Limerick (Mr. Synan) would see how utterly impracticable it would be to give a new trial. It was absurd when, for instance, a man had been unanimously convicted, and four Judges out of five had affirmed the decision, that the dissent of one Judge should operate to send the case for a fresh trial. The result would in that case be three distinct trials. In his opinion, the introduction of such a provision would entirely defeat the object of the Bill; and, after all, they would not get rid of this doubt which was spoken of as being of so much importance in regard to the sentiment of the people. Even if a new Court confirmed the decision of the first tribunal, the prisoner would always be able to refer to one Judge as having been in his favour; and however many Judges might give a decision in the case, and however many convictions there might be, he would always be able to turn round and say there was one Judge who differed. Therefore, no trial would, in the least degree, cure or mend the evil they were asked to guard against. The only question to consider was, whether they would get a sufficient preponderance of opinion on the part of the Judges in the case. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. O. Russell), who, no doubt, had had great experience, had stated that the Court for Crown Cases Reserved was always confined to the consideration of questions of law. His hon. and learned Friend said the questions brought before that Court were technical questions. But they were not all of them technical questions. Take the question of treason. Supposing an appeal to the Court of Crown Cases Reserved were made in a case of this kind, and the question was whether a certain thing was treason or not. Certainly, that was not a technical question, but it was a question of substance and of Common Law, whether particular conduct of moral guilt amounted to treason. The matter would stand thus. There would be certain conduct on the part of a certain man, or of a number of men, and the question of law would be whether that conduct constituted treason. They allowed that to be determined by the vote of one Judge. It was quite true that by long immemorial practice unanimity was required in all cases that were tried by a jury; but when they came to a Bill which changed the whole of the procedure in cases of this kind, there was no sort of reason why they should be bound by anything beyond the desirability of the thing. Certainly, nothing which had occurred during the course of the debate had altered his opinion, and the suggestion which had been made to confine the unanimity to questions of fact would do very little towards removing the evils that were complained of in regard to dissenting Judges. He was bound to say, having carefully considered the whole subject, that he saw no reason for departing from the principle laid down in the Bill.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was not much surprised at the line of argument used by the Irish Representative of the Front Opposition Bench (Mr. Gibson)—or, rather, the Representative of Irish coercion on the Front Opposition Bench, for the term "Irish Representative" was rather a misnomer. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Representative of the University of Dublin objected to the multiplication of safeguards in connection with the new tribunal. The drift of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's speech was to support the proposition that the great thing was to hang somebody; and it must be remembered, in justice to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that that was the great principle of the packed jury system during all the long years of Tory domination in Ireland. Juries were then so constituted that they certainly hung the men they were asked to hang. Her Majesty's Government were not satisfied with this packed jury of Judges; but they objected to having even unanimity in their packed jury. It must be said on behalf of the old system in Ireland that a packed jury had to be unanimous. They had now a distinct packed jury, and the fact that the jurors were paid Government nominees, instead of being unpaid supporters of law and order under the old system, was by no means an argument in favour of the new packed jury. It was only yesterday that the Home Secretary mentioned in that House that the appeal to the five Judges would be really a new trial on new facts. Well, he wanted to know why unanimity was to be required in regard to the facts brought forward at the first trial, and unanimity was not to be required in regard to the new facts—which were, at least, matters of as great importance—that were brought forward on the second trial? The Government asked them to consider the case of four Judges being in favour of the guilt of the prisoner on the second trial, and one Judge being in favour of his acquittal; but it might be the case that three Judges only were in favour of finding the prisoner guilty, and that two Judges might be in favour of an acquittal, and yet the Government would hang the prisoner on a bare majority of one vote in a packed jury of Government nominees. They had been talking about the effect of all this on popular feeling in Ireland. He asked the Committee to consider for a moment what must be the effect upon a packed jury of Government nominees. He asked what must be the effect on public opinion in Ireland of a man being hanged on a single vote in a packed jury of Government nominees? The Government might call that execution as long as they liked; but the people of Ireland would call it murder. He said that a man convicted in a lower Court upon his first trial got his second trial, as he had a right to get it, in the Superior Court, and was there only condemned upon new facts, and upon new evidence given by new witnesses. This constituted absolutely a new trial, and he was to be condemned on that absolutely new trial on the vote of three Government nominees against two. The people of Ireland would consider that the negative of two nominees against conviction would be of more weight than the decision of three nominees for the Crown. When a man was condemned to death by only three votes against two, when he suffered that penalty of death, would it not be universally agreed in Ireland that that man had been judicially murdered? He asked the Government what must be the effect of such a rule as this bearing upon the great question of evidence? That difficulty could not be removed by the proposals of this Bill, for although witnesses would always be ready to give evidence before a fair tribunal, before a tribunal where the dice were clogged against the prisoner's life; the witness before such tribunal would, in fact, share the odium of the tribunal itself; aye, and in the tribunal of his own conscience, he would feel himself an accomplice in that judicial murder. Let it be remembered that the only ground on which the Government refused trial by jury was the ground of the alleged partiality of jurors. If it were not for the partiality of jurors they said they would be happy to maintain the existing jury system. That was the statement of Her Majesty's Government; but they could not, on their own principles, impugn the partiality of the tribunal which they themselves selected; and where, then, was the ground of their objection to unanimity on the part of a jury consisting of impartial and intelligent Judges? In this case the question of unanimity could not arise in an ordinary way, because this jury was to be composed of impartial and intelligent jurors. But the Government denied that intelligent and impartial jurors were to be obtained, and that, therefore, they were obliged to have a jury of impartial and intelligent Judges. Why not, a fortiori, insist on the unanimity of the tribunal of impartial and intelligent Judges? The Government attacked either the intelligence or the bona fides of their own tribunal for the purpose of insuring the condemnation and execution of the accused. The Government, then, professed their want of belief in the capacity of the new Judges, because, had they regarded these Judges as capable, intelligent, and honourable men, they would have insisted upon a verdict by unanimity of votes. That was their own declaration upon their own case. Were this simply a matter of dealing with a question of law, he could understand the action of the Government, because the majority of Judges might be led to decide on the question of law, but not so on questions of fact. The appeal to this Court would constitute a second trial as completely and absolutely as the proceedings before the Special Commission Court or the Court of First Instance was the first trial. As he had already pointed out, it was a new trial, upon new evidence that had never been before the jury on the first trial; and he said that, if unanimity were necessary in the case of the first trial, it was still more necessary to have unanimity on the part of the Judges in the second trial, because the jury in the second trial would be labouring under that great disadvantage to the accused man—they would be labouring under that injury to the accused man—namely, the fact that the jury of Judges in the first trial had found against him. In order, then, to redress the balance in favour of the prisoner, in order to make his trial really a new trial, it was absolutely necessary to have unanimity amongst the new jurors; otherwise, unquestionably, the new tribunal would be prejudiced against the prisoner by the fact that the first trial went against him. He said, therefore, it was absolutely necessary, if the Court was not to be detested by honest men from one end of Ireland to another, as judicial murderers, to have unanimity on the second trial, where so great a prejudice already existed against the prisoner, owing to the result of the first trial. If there remained any respect for the old maxim, "That it was better that 99 guilty men should escape rather than that one innocent person should suffer," then he said there was no justification or palliation for the conduct of a Government which would insist upon having a man tried for his life, found guilty, and executed by the mere majority of one individual in a jury of only five jurors.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he proposed to amend the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) by substituting for the words, "whole Court of Criminal Appeal," the words, "four-fifths of the Court of Criminal Appeal."

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the Amendment could not now be put, inasmuch as the Question before the Committee was, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MARUM said, he understood that the hon. Member who last addressed the Committee had an Amendment to move to the clause; if that were so he would not now move the Amendment standing in his name.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for South Warwickshire came up to the Table of the House with an Amendment, and he informed him that it was impossible that such an Amendment could be put, because the Question before the Committee was, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill." That Question was then put to the Committee, and decided in the affirmative.

MR. SYNAN said, he had an Amendment to Sub-section 3, which he considered he had a right to move.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the words were now part of the clause, that the determination of any appeal should be according to the determination of the majority of the Judges who heard the appeal. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) had an Amendment upon the Paper next in order, and, consequently, his Amendment had priority.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea, not having moved his Amendment, was it not in Order that an Amendment which another hon. Member wished to move could be put?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea had given Notice of the Amendment on the Paper after the word "appeal," and it was his right now to move that Amendment.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. The words down to "appeal" had not been agreed to by the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the words down to "appeal" had been carried by the Committee on the Question "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," which was determined in the affirmative. The words did, therefore, stand part of the clause. That being so, after the word "appeal," the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea had priority.

MR. SYNAN begged to remind the Chairman that he had given him Notice that in case the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend were negatived, he should move one that was substantially the same. He was quite willing to put his Amendment after the word "appeal."

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must ask the hon. Member not to disturb the proceedings of the Committee. The hon. and learned Member for Chelsea, according to all rule, had priority to move his Amendment after the word "appeal." When that was settled the hon. Member could move.

MR. FIRTH said, he was bound to say, if the question was one of right, that he should be quite willing to waive his right. If, however, the question was one of the ruling of the Chair, he should proceed with his Amendment.

MR. SYNAN said, as the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea had not moved, he would now submit his Amendment to the Committee. In doing so he did not intend to occupy any length of time, as the subject had already been fully discussed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 9, to insert "on the determination of any appeal the whole Court shall agree to secure conviction."—(Mr. Synan.)

The Chairman

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that the words "determination of any appeal shall be" were already part of the Bill. He would now call upon the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea.

MR. FIRTH said, he accepted the ruling of the Chair, and begged to move the Amendment standing in his name. He had already remarked that we had never had a Court of Appeal on questions of fact in criminal cases, although such appeal existed in civil cases where the Court was equally divided. There was no provision in this Bill as to the number of Judges being odd or even. Having regard to the fact that the Courts of Law had always had a tendency in favour of innocence, he thought, in case the Court were equally divided in opinion, that the appeal should be allowed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 10, after "appeal," insert "but if such Court be equally divided in opinion, the appeal shall be allowed."—(Mr. Firth.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he regretted that he was unable to accept this Amendment; but he had given instructions for an Amendment to be put down to the effect that the Court should always consist of an unequal number of Judges.

MR. FIRTH said, on that understanding, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 10, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "except in questions of fact, when such determination shall depend on the unanimity of the judges."—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 216: Majority 161.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked if it were in Order to add, after the word "appeal," the following words:—

"Except in cases where fresh evidence shall be adduced, in which case the appeal shall only be rejected by the unanimous decision of the Court."

MR. HEALY asked whether it would be in Order to move the omission of the sub-section altogether?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the sub-section had been agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was inadmissible in its present form, inasmuch as it would not agree grammatically with the clause as it stood.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Longford, as far as he understood it, was substantially the same as the Amendment which had just been negatived by the Committee. That Amendment was that, except in questions of fact, there should be unanimity; whereas the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for Longford was that, except in questions of new fact, there should be unanimity on the part of the Judges. The Amendment, therefore, was not in Order, and could not be put.

MR. REDMOND said, he should not occupy the attention of the Committee at any great length in moving the Amendment which he was about to propose, inasmuch as it turned upon questions which had already been discussed; but, as had been pointed out in the course of this discussion, he was bound to say that it seemed to him the most monstrous thing that a man should be executed for murder in a case where two Judges actually protested that he was innocent. The execution of a man under the present clause of the Bill was really dependent upon the voice of one Judge. It was not fair to say that they must take into consideration that the three Judges in the previous trial had been unanimous in their decision, because, in the previous trial, the facts before the Court might have been incomplete, and the five Judges might have to try the man on a totally different state of facts and evidence to that which the Court below had before it. In point of fact, it would be an entirely new trial, and in the Court of Appeal a man's life depended, as he had said before, on the opinion of one Judge. It was, he thought, useless to argue in favour of a clause which contained a provision of this kind, and it was useless to think there would be any respect among Irish people for a tribunal which convicted a man on one vote. If the Government desired that the people in Ireland should believe that it was not the wish of the House of Commons that a man should be convicted, although innocent, and executed for crimes which he had never committed, it was essential that they should make some provision of the kind which he ventured to propose in his Amendment. He desired that there should be a new trial. Hon. Members had been told it would be a mischievous thing to have three trials; but there had been instances of three trials in cases where juries had disagreed; and he could not see why, now that the safeguard of a jury had been taken away, there should not be a third trial. It had been pointed out clearly by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) that there would be no difficulty in this; and, as he (Mr. Redmond) had already pointed out, in reality there would not be three trials, for the trial he had in view would be only a second trial. It would be that the Judges were to decide on a new set of evidence and new facts. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) seemed to object to the introducing of any safeguards into this Bill. [Mr. Gibson: No.] The right hon. and learned Member said "No"—he did not actually use the words that he objected to the introduction of any safeguards; but he said that their introduction might lead to interference with the tribunal, and that they would not work satisfactorily. He seemed to go on the principle that trial by jury should be maintained in its present form, or else that they should sweep away every safeguard that the accused man should have. He was unable to see how the right hon. and learned Gentleman could get out of that position if he objected to introduce safeguards whereby the accused possibly might escape conviction for crimes they had not committed, by the provision which enabled the Judges to disagree upon new facts. He could not see how he could object to the introduction of this Amendment, if no new evidence were forthcoming before the second tribunal. He could understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman arguing in favour of the proposal in the Bill; but where new evidence might be forthcoming, and where new facts might have come to light, he said then that it was right that the Judges should be just as unanimous in the second case as they were in the first. The Amendment he was about to move exempted from the operation of the Bill cases of treason and treason-felony and cases of murder.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words "except in cases of murder, treason, and treason felony, when such determination shall depend on the unanimity of the judges."—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member had very fairly admitted that there was not much more to be said upon the subject. The hon. Member asked whether it was conceivable that any man's life and death, that the fate of a man, should depend on the voice of one Judge, either in England or Ireland? But, in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, it was well known that, in matters of law, the fate of a man might depend upon the voice of one man. He had said, over and over again, it was plain, if a man was not guilty in law, he was just as much not guilty as if he were not guilty in fact; and if you executed a man not guilty in law, it was just as great an outrage as executing a man who was not guilty in fact. A man might be executed under circumstances in which a considerable number of Judges had declared their opinion that, according to the law of the land, his life was not forfeited.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, there was a family resemblance of a very strong character in the reception which the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave to all the Amendments of an important character proposed from those Benches. The attitude of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, from the beginning, had been one of absolute non possumus. He had not admitted a single Amendment of importance.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had accepted 10 yesterday.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, for all he knew, might have accepted 400; but he still maintained his position that he had rejected every Amendment of importance emanating from those Benches. The Amendment before the Committee expressed not only the views of hon. Members near him, but it was also supported by Members of various shades of political opinion on the opposite side of the House—the noble Lord the Member for Calne (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice), for instance, and other hon. Members. To every one of these Amendments—supported as they had been by a consensus of opinion from all independent sections in that House—the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given a refusal. When the right hon. and learned Gentleman sought support for the measure which he now endeavoured to carry through the House, he applied to those two right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin, who knew—probably better than he did—the purpose to which this Act would be applied in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, and his two supporters on the Front Opposition Bench, looked upon this Bill not as a means of putting down crime in Ireland, but as a means of giving a few more years of life to that system of landlordism which he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) said was doomed. His hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment before the Committee objected that the life of a man should depend on the voice of one Judge. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in reply, said that that was a thing which took place every day. Now, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) had a large faith in the powers of the Parliamentary face of the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but he thought upon that occasion, in putting forth such a statement, he had almost excelled the unrivalled powers which he possessed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said a man's life depended on the word of a single Judge, because it rested with a single Judge to lay down the law.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the majority of one in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved decided the question of law. [Mr. T. P. O'Connor: No.] The hon. Member said "No;" but, unless he were misinformed, the hon. Member was not in the House at the time his statement was made. His statement was that, no doubt, on appeal in case of murder in the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, the question was determined by the voice of one Judge whether the accused was guilty on questions of law, although a minority of five Judges might be of opinion that he was guilty on questions of fact.

Mr. Redmond

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, it was an utter perversion to say that the life of a man was dependent on the voice of a single Judge in England in the same sense as it would be under this Bill. He challenged the right hon. and learned Gentleman to produce from recent history a single case in which a prisoner had been executed, or whose execution depended on the voice of a single Judge. So far as the Court of Crown Cases Reserved was concerned, the result might depend on the verdict of a single Judge; but the Committee must bear in mind that behind that Judge there stood the verdict of 12 jurors. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had not adduced a single argument to show that the Court of Appeal would not be virtually deciding a new case in matters of fact and matters of law. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) altogether disputed the dictum of the Home Secretary—high authority as he was on matters of law—that a decision on a matter of law was the same as on a matter of fact. In the Court of Crown Cases Reserved, the smallest breach of regulations at the trial, or the smallest breach of the Law of Evidence, or of any other detail, might invalidate a trial for murder. He appealed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite whether that was not so? But if there was a second trial it might involve the question of fact, whether the offender was at the time in the place where the crime was committed. Would anyone say that the small details which he had alluded to as invalidating the trial of the Court below were of the same importance as the question of an alibi, which might be raised in the case of a prisoner accused under the present Bill? He thought the Home Secretary very much mistook the spirit of himself and his hon. Friends if he supposed that he was going to carry this Bill easily through the House of Commons without the most strenuous opposition, so long as he took his cue from the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen upon the opposite Benches—the Members for the University of Dublin.

MR. FIRTH said, that the argument was complete that there had not been any occasion where a man had been found guilty and punished for the offence of murder, unless the tribunal before which he came was unanimous in their judgment with regard to the facts on which their judgment was based. It could not be suggested that in Ireland or anywhere else a man could be hanged for murder if two Judges of the land said that the identity of the man who committed the offence had not been established.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he wished to treat this question from a common-sense point of view. He imagined that it was impossible, where the guilt of a man was thoroughly and absolutely established to the entire Court of First Instance, consisting of three Judges, that there should not be a real unanimity in the case of the Appeal Court, consisting of five Judges. He assumed that the Government did not wish to hang anyone who was not certainly guilty, or punish them for manslaughter or any other offence dealt with in this Bill; and, therefore, he could not see why they should so much object to the unanimity proposed. As the matter stood at present, there would be eight Judges trying the case, assuming that there was an appeal. Now, if six Judges were capable of agreeing on matters of facts and matters of law, surely eight Judges might also agree. He believed it would be quite as easy to get unanimity in the upper Court as in the lower Court. As he had already pointed out, it was not conviction that was wanted, but the punishment of guilt; and he was, therefore, quite at a loss to understand why the Government so determinedly opposed everything relating to this Court of Appeal, which was in favour of the prisoner. Her Majesty's Government should remember that they were dealing with exceptional legislation, and that, therefore, exceptional Amendments were permissible. It was only reasonable to suppose that persons who objected to the Bill as a whole would object to it in all its parts. Moreover, it was absolutely their duty to reduce the mischievous effect of the Bill as far as it lay in their power. It was with that object that hon. Members on those Benches, and upon the Benches in front of him, proposed Amendments seeking to mitigate the effect of the Bill. He was sorry that the arguments which had been adduced in favour of this Amendment had been thrown away upon the Home Secretary, of whom it might be said, in the words of the popular song, that—

[Fifth Night.]

“In spite of all temptation
To understand another nation,
He remained an Englishman.”

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, it was hard to understand the views of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary; but he supposed that the difficulty in his own case arose from the fact that he did not possess a judicial mind. As far as he understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he gave it as his opinion that fact and law were one and the same subject, and that the Judges were just as well qualified to judge of fact as a jury could be. If that were the position, why not abolish the entire system of trial by jury? What could be the use of going through the form of putting 12 men into a box, when a single Judge could settle both questions of fact and law to the satisfaction of the persons charged and of the community in general? After all, this section of the Bill constituted, in certain cases, distinctly a new trial. Take, for example, the case where fresh evidence was adduced. There the Court had before them an entirely new set of facts. In the first trial, a man could only be convicted on the unanimous decision of three Judges; but, on the second trial, he was to be convicted by the majority of the Judges. Now, he urged upon the Home Secretary whether this was not peculiarly dangerous in the case of trials for treason or treason-felony, because, although a Judge might be able to decide fairly on fact and law taken separately, yet, where so much depended on the relation of facts to law, and where constructive law came in to assist the imperfect statement of evidence, it was highly dangerous to have anything short of a unanimous verdict. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was well acquainted with history, and at one time he had taken the honoured name of “Historicus;” he must, therefore, have in his mind what evidence was furnished by English history with regard to trials for treason. That being so, he asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman where, in the history of the country, there was any instance in which the integrity of the Judges had broken down so much as upon trials for treason. He assumed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware that the Judges had frequently endeavoured to coerce juries, who had stood up against the constructive law laid down by them into convicting persons of treason. In the trial of Lord Dundonald, then Lord Cochrane, the decision was notoriously unfair, and the jury were almost compelled to find according to the ruling of the Judge, rather than according to their own view of the facts. With these things in recollection, it was most dangerous and reactionary to introduce a tribunal which took away trial by jury from the man who most required it, and left men accused of treason wholly at the mercy of the Judges.

MR. DILLON said, he wished to ask the Home Secretary whether the difficulty with respect to Irish Judges was not likely to arise in regard to the Irish Judges. Nobody, he said, proposed to do away with the unanimity required in the case of a jury; but it was proposed to do away with that in the case of the Judges on the assertion that no jury could be obtained who would not give way to terrorism or to sympathy with crimes, and, therefore, would not convict a prisoner. It appeared to him that the only real argument that could at all apply in the case of not requiring unanimity among the Judges, who were practically a jury for trying matters of fact, was that the Judges seemed to have sympathized with treason and murder; and he did not see how the Government could get out of that dilemma. Then there was another consideration in favour of the Amendment, which he was glad to see proposed, and that was this—he always believed that one of the greatest objects, from a Constitutional point of view, to be gained by the institution of trial by jury, and one of the reasons which induced the people of England to value it so much as a protection for liberty, was not so much that it came into action in regard to ordinary crime, as that the common sense of the country should stand between them and a too strict interpretation of the law on treason and treason-felony, and which might place the subject at the mercy of an Executive too often infuriated by agitation. It was not so long ago that in England—perhaps not 50 years ago—

Mr. Macfarlane

men held their lives simply by the fact that an English jury could not be got to bow strictly to the legal interpretation of the law on treason; and he knew that the Law of Sedition, which was passed for the purpose of dealing with certain men in Ireland, if legally and strictly interpreted, would place himself and other men who took part in the Land League movement outside the pale of the law. He had heard it laid down by an Irish Judge that practically almost any political action would come within the law on sedition. He had studied that law, and he believed no man could condemn the action of the Judges without being held guilty of sedition, if the interpretation of the law was strained. There was nothing to prevent anyone who had been trained to lay down the law in the strictest way from sweeping into the net of these Acts every man who spoke strongly in condemnation of the action of the Government. If these laws had been enforced in England according to their strictest letter they would long ago have been repealed or modified; but the reason why they had been left on the Statute Book was that the juries were a sufficient security to the subject against the law being strained. It was now proposed to take from the people of Ireland that protection of the common sense of juries, and to leave them at the mercy of Acts; but if this was enforced he was sure public feeling, and the feeling in this House, would revolt against that enforcement. He could not understand why the Government had determined to withdraw that protection from the people of Ireland in regard to political action, and also to refuse to give to them the slight protection of the unanimity of the Judges. He could not see why such refusal did not amount to an impeachment of the Irish Judges; and surely, from an English point of view, it was a very much worse charge than ever the Irish Members had aimed at the Irish Judges. They were prepared to prove that the Irish Judges, by their speeches from the Judicial Bench, by their well-known opinions in private, were not fit to try matters of fact where politics were involved. Nine out of every ten people in Ireland believed that, but they had never said the Irish Judges had sympathized with treason or murder; and, therefore, the refusal to accept this Amendment was a more severe charge against the Irish Judges than the Irish Members had ever made against them.

DR. COMMINS said, he hoped the Committee would credit those who supported this Amendment with having no intention to propose anything that would protect any person who was really found guilty of murder. What they wanted to do was to protect the innocent, and, as was done in every country that had any jurisprudence at all, to introduce checks against the abuse of the powers under this Act. Judges might have a clearer view of evidence, and be better able to sift the facts and convince each other by argument, than a jury; yet juries were practically unanimous. In England they seldom acquitted, and, notwithstanding all that had been stated, he ventured to say that in Ireland juries seldom acquitted where the evidence showed the accused to be guilty. The Irish Members wished to protect accused, but possibly innocent persons against an abuse of power or a mistake by those who had to administer the law; and one of the great advantages of the English jury system—the praises of which had been sung by the greatest of English political philosophers—was that the jury interposed the strongest and best protection against arbitrary, illegal, unconstitutional, or corrupt action by Judges. Juries stood between innocent persons and a possible abuse of the power of the law. It seemed to him that those who argued in favour of the clause had forgotten that the Criminal Law was an instrument that might be used for a great many purposes than the putting down of crime. It did not lie with the Government to set the law in motion. Any person might set the Criminal Law and all its powers in motion against any person—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that the only Question before the Committee is whether there shall be a unanimity among the Judges of Appeal in regard to treason, treason-felony, or murder, and there is no question of unanimity of juries.

DR. COMMINS said, his point was that in these cases of treason or murder the unanimity of the Judges of Appeal was as necessary as with the three Judges in the Court of First Instance, because without that unanimity the one great protection previously interposed between the people and the arbitrary power of Judges was taken away—namely, the protection of interposing juries. If a case was clearly proved by the Court of First Instance, it could not be supposed that the Judges of Appeal were not as clear-sighted and as equally anxious to ascertain the facts as the Court below. New light might be thrown on a case; new evidence might be produced before the case reached the Court of Appeal, in view of which, though it might convince one or two of the Judges, a majority of Judges was yet to be sufficient to support a conviction. There ought not to be that distinction at all, because the protection of juries was being taken away, and the only protection against an abuse of the law was in the unanimity of the Judges of Appeal, as in the case of the Judges of First Instance. In cases of treason, treason-felony, or murder, the Government was not only the nominal, but the real prosecutor. The Government were the power that moved the whole case; they had all the strength to secure a conviction. They could not, and would not, be separated in the minds of the people from the prosecutor; and the Judges were so identified with the Government as their appointees and paid servants, that they ran the enormous risk of having their opinions coloured, and their minds to some extent prejudiced—at all events, they would be believed to be prejudiced, and to have their minds warped by their identification with the prosecutor in these cases. In regard to cases of murder, there was an equally strong reason for unanimity, because there, although the Government were not identified with the Judges, and were not the actual prosecutor, but only nominally so, private malice in every case of murder might accuse any innocent person, and weave round him a web of seeming evidence which it would require the greatest possible skill to appreciate, and there would be one thing which the Judges would not have—namely, the popular instinct, the popular power of knowing whether a witness was telling the truth or not, and of appreciating the character of the prisoner. All these things the Judges would want. The power of the law might be misapplied, and the Judges might be made the instruments of atrocious crimes in regard to innocent persons accused of murder. Let the guilty be punished, but with proper safeguards for the protection of innocent persons. If the

Dr. Commins

Judges were not to be degraded by being made the instruments of private vengeance; if that distrust which at present justly existed in Ireland with regard to the Judges was to be removed, there must be unanimity. The last point of the matter was wholly important. It used to be a principle of English law that it was better that 99 guilty persons should escape than that one innocent person should suffer; but this clause reversed that principle, and seemed to say that it was better 99 innocent persons should suffer than that one guilty person should escape. That was how the Act would be read by the people, and the disposition to regard the law as their enemy would increase instead of diminishing. He could quite understand how difficult it was for English and Scotch Members to realize the state of things existing in Ireland; but every hon. Member was acquainted with the history of his own country—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment, and it will be impossible to proceed with the work of the Committee if hon. Members discuss the whole Act and all the clauses upon a single Amendment. The Question before the Committee is, whether the Judges of Appeal shall be unanimous in cases of treason, treason-felony, and murder; and I must ask the hon. Member to keep to that subject.

DR. COMMINS said, he was trying to keep to that question, and he was about to ask English and Scotch Members what, judging from the history of their own countries, would have been the state of things, if the Judges had had sole power, without juries, to convict people by a majority? Yet that was the kind of tribunal now to be set up in Ireland; and he maintained that, in all these cases, there ought to be this unanimity in the Court of Appeal as in the Court of First Instance.

MR. SYNAN said, that a great Revolutionist had stated that audacity was the great secret of success in a revolution. He was sorry the Home Secretary was not then on the Treasury Bench, as he wished to pay the right hon. and learned Gentleman a compliment. It seemed to him that audacity in a statesman and a lawyer was also the great secret of success, for the Home Secretary had attempted to repeat, in the presence of lawyers in that House, that the Judges of the land in this country every day found persons guilty of treason and treason-felony and murder. He had never heard such a proposition; but the oftener it was contradicted the oftener it was repeated by the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman wished to deceive those who were ignorant of the law, or he did that knowing that he was perverting language by using words in a double sense—confounding verdicts of juries on facts with questions of law—and he wished to see whether simple Members would accept that notion. The plain question was this. The Government proposed to make the three Judges a jury; they were to form the Court, return the verdict, and pronounce judgment. Then there came the Court of Appeal, which was substantially a Court for a new trial, and again the Home Secretary wished to deceive the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has used the expression that the Home Secretary tried to deceive the Committee. I am sure he did not intend to use that expression, and the hon. Member will withdraw that expression.

MR. SYNAN said, he would not say the Home Secretary had tried to deceive the House, but that he had used language calculated to deceive the Committee. The primary Court was to be a Court and a jury, and to pronounce judgment; but to the Court of Appeal a different rule was applied by the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman called it a Court of Appeal; but it was not a Court of Appeal upon questions of law. It was a tribunal to try facts, and really to enter upon a new trial; and their verdict or judgment would not be an affirming of the Court below, but a new verdict or judgment. In the Court of First Instance the three Judges were to be unanimous; and upon what principle was it that the five Judges in the Court of Appeal need not be unanimous in pronouncing judgment, not upon law, but upon facts? Upon what principle was there a different rule, and upon what principle was it that three out of five Judges could convict a man of treason, treason-felony, or murder? The proposition was ridiculous, and could not for a moment hold water. It could not be believed in by those who made it, and it was calculated to deceive Members of the House who were unacquainted with the law, and had to accept the authority of Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench.

MR. D. GRANT said, he regarded the Amendment as one which it would be wise for the Home Secretary to accept. The present position was such that it was of the greatest importance that the Irish people should feel strongly and distinctly that the judgment given was on the lines of an effort to do justice to them. If, however, under existing circumstances, the people saw sentences passed simply by a majority of Judges they would feel that they were not being fairly treated. He, therefore, hoped the Government would accept the Amendment, not so much because of the question itself, as on account of the evil of a wrong impression in the minds of the people; and he should vote for it himself.

MR. LEAMY said, it appeared to him that for the next three years prisoners would not get the benefit of the doubt. In cases of capital offences the Judges always told the juries that if they had any reasonable doubt they should acquit the prisoner. Irish Members were now asking that in cases in which an appeal was made—in cases of treason, treason-felony, or murder—the Judges to whom the appeal was made should be unanimous in their judgment; and they were asking that simply because it would often happen that new facts would be adduced, which, if they had been produced at the first trial, might have prevented the Judges finding the prisoner guilty. The question had been put several times to the Government whether they would dare to hang a man who was found guilty by a majority of Judges. Everybody knew they would not, and yet they refused to accept this Amendment, knowing that they would not dare to hang a man in England for murder or high treason unless the Judges were all agreed. Under these circumstances, he thought the Government ought to accept the Amendment. Although the Irish Members had proposed many Amendments, the Home Secretary had not assented to any single important Amendment. This Amendment, however, was supported not only by Irish Members, but by many supporters of the Government; and he thought it was nearly time that the Home Secretary should show some readiness to meet the

[Fifth Night.]

Committee by accepting this Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, that in cases of treason or murder the prisoner always got the benefit of the doubt, and even if only one Judge out of eight—which was the smallest number that should deal with questions of this kind—was in favour of acquittal, it must be quite clear that there was a substantial doubt as to the justice of the sentence; and more especially was it desirable that the law should not be pressed in such a case, because, of course, if a sentence for murder was carried out, there was no means of restoring a man to life should he be proved to have been innocent. Even in England, where Party prejudices did not run as high as in Ireland, innocent people had often been executed for murders. Not very long ago the man Habron was convicted at Manchester, and he would have been sent to penal servitude if another man had not confessed that he had committed the crime. He believed that some, at least, of the Members of the Government did not desire to have the power of sending people in Ireland to the scaffold when there was reasonable doubt; and in Ireland, under the old system of jury-packing, people had been hung who had afterwards been proved to be perfectly innocent. A disagreement among the jury had in many cases been very beneficial, where it was subsequently proved that the accused persons were innocent, although if they had been convicted they would have been hung. There was the case, for instance, of George M'Cormack in Tipperary, who had a quarrel with two brothers, and afterwards went to America, without telling anyone of his intention. He was supposed to have been murdered, and the men he had quarrelled with, being the last men seen in his company, were put on their trial for his murder. The first jury disagreed, but another jury found them guilty, and they were executed; and yet, a short time afterwards, the man returned from America, and so proved conclusively that the men executed were innocent.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not speaking to the subject before the Committee, which is the question of appeal in a particular class of crimes.

MR. BIGGAR said, he understood the question to be whether the Judges should be unanimous; and he submitted that he was thoroughly justified in showing that there ought to be unanimity, by the fact that innocent persons had been executed for murder. In Armagh, a few years ago, a man was condemned and hung who was afterwards proved to be innocent; and in another case, in which the governor of the gaol represented to the Dublin Castle authorities that he had evidence of the innocence of a certain prisoner; but they insisted on his being hung, because they did not wish the public to discover that they had convicted an innocent man. That was how justice was administered in Ireland; and he did not think there ought to be very rigid rules in discussing such matters.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already warned the hon. Member, and must now ask him to keep strictly to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, if the Judges were practically unanimous, there could not reasonably be any doubt as to the guilt of a prisoner; but if two out of the five were of opinion that he was not guilty, did the Committee think the authorities would be justified in hanging the man, more especially as according to the police arrangements in Ireland any evidence which the police might have which was calculated to tell in favour of a prisoner would be suppressed, and nothing would be brought forward but what they thought most likely to bring a conviction? It was also known that means would be used by the police to get evidence of a perfectly untrustworthy character with regard to an alleged crime. He thought he had made it pretty clear that such a thing as hanging a prisoner by a bare majority of the Court of Appeal ought not to be allowed, and that the Government ought not to hold that the life of a person should be taken when, in the view of some of the Judges, he was as likely to be innocent as guilty. In all such cases there must be absolute certainty—or, at least, there should be no reasonable doubt; but if two of the Judges held that the prisoner was not guilty there would be something more than a reasonable doubt. Under the circumstances, he thought the Government might agree to this particular Amendment. Then with regard to the question of treason or treason-felony, he did not know that that part of the subject was of so much importance, because, according to experience, for many years no prosecution had taken place in Ireland, or, he believed, in England, for treason or treason-felony, so that the presumption was that during the three years during which this Bill would last probably no person would be put on his trial for either of those offences. At the same time, the fact remained that the Government would have so much power of influencing all the legal machinery in Ireland, and that they had situations for Judges and their relatives. It seemed to him that in these cases, in which the Government and the accused would come into such direct conflict, absolute proof ought to be required to convict a man of guilt. In England, in former times, persons who agitated for the reform of Parliament were put on trial for high treason, with, however, the intervention of a jury. But in this case that intervention was to be taken away; and he could not see on what grounds it could be refused in regard to such charges as treason or treason-felony, such charges being liable to so much doubt as to what constituted the offence. A great deal had been said as to what constituted an offence of treason or treason-felony; and it would only be right that in all cases where there was a reasonable doubt the prisoner should have the benefit of the doubt.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he could not support the Amendment, because he did not see why there should be less unanimity among the Judges than among jurymen. He deeply regretted that his Amendment had not been put, prescribing that a proportion of four-fifths of the Court of Appeal should decide. Hon. Members on both sides of the House were prepared to accept that proposal; but he was sure it was some unintentional haste on the part of the Chairman which prevented his putting the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: There was no haste on the part of the Chairman. I did simply what it was my duty to do. The hon. Member brought up an Amendment, which could not be moved, on the Question "That these words stand part of the Clause," and not being able to put that Amendment, it was my duty to put the Question, "That these words stand part of the Clause."

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, the Chairman had not intimated to the hon. Member in charge of the Amendment—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to Order. The Chairman had ruled that the Amendment could not be put; but the hon. Member was now questioning that ruling, and he submitted that the hon. Member could not have done that even at the time, and it was doubly objectionable to do so now.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT begged to move that the Chairman should now leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Baronet cannot question what I have already ruled. The Question is that I now leave the Chair.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he thought the Committee need not go on quite so fast, although the Motion to leave the Chair was a very useful safety-valve. An hon. Member had been bringing in cases to show—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is now raising another question of ruling which has been previously settled, and upon this Motion the hon. and gallant Member cannot raise that question.

COLONEL NOLAN said, the question before the Committee was that of the unanimity of Judges, and the hon. Member had been giving certain cases in which innocent persons had actually been hung; and he thought hon. Members ought to have an opportunity of referring to general matters—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member cannot, on this Motion, discuss any general Amendment. The hon. Baronet had a right to move that I leave the Chair; but the Committee cannot discuss the ruling I have already given.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he believed any Member could discuss any general subject connected with the Bill on the Motion to leave the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Member is under some misapprehension. The hon. Baronet has moved that I do leave the Chair with the hope of discussing questions of Order upon the ruling I had given on an Amendment being out of Order; but he was not in a position to discuss the ruling, and, therefore, the object with which he moved does not exist. As to the claims of the hon. and gallant Member to discuss the Bill generally on a Motion to leave the Chair, that latitude may exist in the House; but it is certainly not allowed in Committee when the Amendment alone is under consideration.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. BIGGAR said, he understood that if the Motion of the hon. Baronet should be agreed to, this Bill would fall to the ground; and, therefore, he submitted that the Committee might discuss some of the questions connected with the merits of the Bill. On the Motion to leave the Chair he thought it was advisable to discuss the general merits of the question.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Baronet moved that I do leave the Chair for the specific purpose of raising a point of Order; but the particular point which the hon. Baronet wished to raise could not be brought before the Committee, and any observations must now be upon a point of Order within the Motion. The hon. Baronet's observations were not within the Motion.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the Chairman's last ruling corroborated his own view; but as the Motion was not made to get leave to discuss some question already decided, and as something had taken place which might kill the Bill, he thought the Committee had a right to discuss the Bill upon this Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must see that it is perfectly impossible to discuss the general merits of the Bill in Committee under any circumstances. The subject of discussion must be the Amendment which is before the Committee for the moment.

COLONEL NOLAN asked whether the Committee might not speak on the Bill upon the Motion to leave the Chair, believing that on such a Motion they were at liberty to discuss any question connected with the Bill. If this Motion would be fatal to the Bill if carried, it was important to discuss everything connected with it; and probably some hon. Members, who would be shut out by the Chairman's ruling, would wish to enter upon some general observations which they could not make on specific Amendments.

The Chairman

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, the discussion in the Committee had hitherto proceeded in so orderly and amicable a manner that he hoped the ill-timed intervention of the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) would not be allowed to act as a firebrand thrown into the discussions. He thought he might draw attention to the fact that this Motion had not been made by an Irish Member, but by an English Conservative, and the full responsibility of the Motion should rest upon that hon. Member's shoulders. He earnestly entreated the hon. Member not to press his Motion.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he was the last person in the House to wish to interpose and delay the Business of the Committee. He had hitherto given a cordial support to the Bill, and should continue to do so; but, in rising to speak to the Amendment, he had simply referred to what he thought had been an injustice to himself in regard to an Amendment respecting the unanimity of the Court of Appeal. He regretted that he had done anything to delay the Business of the Committee, and he would respectfully ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

MR. BIGGAR said, that this incident was only another illustration of the absurd idea some people had as to trying to save time. The invariable results of these attempts to save time was a waste of time. He believed he had a right to offer such arguments as he thought were legitimate with regard to any particular Amendment before the Committee; and he thought the hon. Member was entitled to the thanks of the Committee for having given them an opportunity of complaining of the manner in which some of their arguments had been treated.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, "That those words be there added," again proposed.

MR. METGE said, it was of vital importance to everyone connected with Ireland to endeavour to enforce this proposal. The whole theory of this clause of the Bill was that the jury system had broken down in Ireland, and two or three methods of reforming that system had been suggested—one was to raise the status of the jurymen, the other was to limit the number who would decide. By this clause Judges were to take the place of a jury. It was the first duty of all Irish Members to press one and all their Amendments; but, apart from that, he thought the three crimes which it was proposed to place under the control of the Judges were those very crimes upon which the Government had admitted that it was possible to get juries to convict. In regard to charges of treason and treason-felony and murder—and certainly in regard to treason-felony—there had not been a single case brought forward in which a jury had decided in opposition to the weight of evidence; and in regard to murder, he did not believe a jury could be found in Ireland at this moment who, if a case were proved, would deliberately decide against the evidence. Some cases might be cited in which that seemed to be the fact; but Irish Members who had had experience of these things in Ireland knew how such cases were got up, and for that reason he held that they ought to offer their most strenuous opposition to these proposals. He wished the Government could see their way to making some concession in the direction urged by the Irish Members, even if only by raising the majority of Judges from a majority of one to a majority of four. But whether they did that or not, a new departure was being proposed in regard to Ireland. Under the old system the juries were invariably packed by the Government; but under this new system the jury would not only be a packed jury, but it would be a jury of paid officials who had been chosen because of their known opinions and the tendency of their education and career officially and privately. Further, each of them was a member of that Executive which would, in the first instance, issue the laws, which the Judges would afterwards have to decide; and that, he believed, would upset for ever any little confidence that existed in Ireland in regard to the judicial system. That confidence was now very slight, and, in his opinion, that fact was one of the causes of undetected crime being so rife in Ireland. The people were in direct antagonism to the judicial system in Ireland, and regarded it as intended to oppress them; and this new tyrannical measure, he was confident, would sweep away from the mind of every man who had any national aspirations all respect for the judicial system in Ireland, and increase to an enormous extent that crime which the Bill was designed to prevent.

MR. O'DONNELL said, they had arrived at an extremely disappointing part of the Bill. It had already been pointed out that the Government now asked the Committee to authorize the execution of accused persons in Ireland by the casting vote of a single paid servant of the Crown. It was clear that if that provision was maintained, the object of the Bill was not to do justice, but to exasperate the people. The result of the Bill would be only to perpetuate the régime of exceptional government. It would be impossible in any excess of crime to introduce so monstrous a proposal into England. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Metge), who had just spoken, appealed to the Government whether they had in view, or professed to have in view, the reconsideration of this subject. He (Mr. O'Donnell) believed that the Government had nothing in view in this matter but the satisfaction of English prejudice, and in that point of view this clause was admirably calculated to carry out their purpose. It was a simple act of savage Lynch law, carried through the House with certain State formalities. A proposal that a jury of this kind, composed of salaried Crown servants, were to be empowered to sentence a man to death by the casting vote of a single one of their number, on every point of morality, was infinitely below the verdict of a tumultuous Texan crowd who sentenced a horse-stealer or a murderer to instantaneous execution, and proceeded to carry it out on the bough of the nearest tree. For his own part, he sincerely regretted the obstinacy with which the Government stuck to this clause. He had never despaired of conciliation between England and Ireland until now. He altogether discarded the idea that it was through any real horror of crime that this Bill was being thus persevered with.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has just come into the House, and he seems to think that the Question before the Committee is that the clause should stand part of the Bill. That is not so; but what is before the Committee is only an Amendment dealing with murder, treason, and treason-felony.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. O'DONNELL said, the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. He had been present when the clause was moved, and during three-fourths of the discussion which had taken place upon it; and, although it was only a clause for the trial of Irishmen for treason, treason-felony, and murder, still the observations he was making were intended to impress upon the Government the propriety, the prudence, and the expediency of giving Irishmen a somewhat greater chance for their lives than was proposed to be given to them by this Bill. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should mistake the object with which he was speaking, because, naturally, these interruptions from the Chair interfered with his line of argument, and retarded the progress of the discussion. He would conclude, therefore, by saying that a measure such as this came very badly from the Government of a country whose great rivers rolled hundreds of victims of undiscovered murder to the sea every year. If this clause were passed without Amendment, if the Government of England insisted upon Irishmen being liable to conviction and execution upon the casting vote of a single bad Government servant, he could only say that it was the bounden duty of every Irishman to prevent the success of the Bill by every means in his power.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, before the Amendment was put from the Chair, he wished to make an appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had charge of the Bill, and some people said it was through his influence that so stringent a measure was being brought in. Whether that was so or not he did not know, and did not very much care. If it were the case, he presumed that it was only for the purpose pointed out by his hon. Friend the Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), that in the exigencies of the so-called Liberal Party it was considered necessary. But he wished to make an appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman on this ground—that as far as his (Mr. Biggar's) observation went with regard to his conduct in the capacity he filled as Home Secretary under the present Government, he had always shown, as far as he (Mr. Biggar) could form an opinion, a desire to mitigate the severity of the law, and not to press it to the full extent of its power. They all knew, or, at any rate, it was the common report, that not nearly so many executions in proportion to the number of convictions had taken place under the régime of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as had taken place under other Governments. They knew, further, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had mitigated the punishment of juvenile offenders; and throughout he had exercised the Prerogative of Mercy invested in the Crown to an extent that was unknown in this country prior to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's term of Office. Under these circumstances, he would appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he would not act towards the people of Ireland, as far as his influence went, upon the same principle and upon the same lines as those which he had considered it his duty to act upon in his capacity of Home Secretary? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do so, he (Mr. Biggar) had not the slightest doubt in his own mind that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be at once prepared to agree to the Amendment now before the Committee, which simply required that a man, convicted and sentenced to capital punishment by the Court of First Instance, should have an appeal to a second Court, and that the Judges of the Appeal Court should be unanimous before the conviction could be affirmed. That was the entire length to which the Amendment went. If the question contained such an element of doubt that one or two out of the five members of the Court of Appeal should be in favour of an acquittal, he thought, with propriety, the sentence of the first Court should not be carried out. In regard to the other part of the clause, the right hon. and learned Gentleman must be fully aware that in political cases prosecutions never took place except in a time of great excitement; and it was clear that convictions would never take place at all unless the evidence and proof of guilt was of the strongest nature. If there was any room for reasonable doubt as to the guilt of a prisoner charged with treason or treason-felony, it was the custom to give the prisoner the benefit of the doubt. A case of treason, or treason-felony, was not so strong as one of murder, because a man convicted of treason, or treason-felony, would only, at the worst, be sent to penal servitude, with almost the certainty that, after a lapse of time when the excitement had subsided, he would receive a free or conditional pardon. It was different in a case of murder. A prisoner, under such circumstances, ran the risk of being tried, in a time of excitement, by partizan Judges, and of having his life sworn away, although he might be perfectly innocent.

MR. HEALY said, he thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had put the case with extreme moderation; and he trusted that the Home Secretary would see his way to accept the Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman found it necessary to interpose in many cases in order to mitigate the severity of a sentence; but the necessity for that interference would be much stronger in a case of treason or treason-felony, or murder, where there was a liability of penal servitude or execution following, than in many of the trumpery cases in which he was now required to interpose. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman was willing, in his own person, to supersede the action of the Courts after sentences were inflicted, the objection to the clause would probably not be so strong; but he did not understand that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would take upon himself the power of reviewing the sentences passed by the new tribunal. At the same time, he could not be of opinion that the Irish Judges—men of learning and legal knowledge—could be persons against whom the Government could apply the faintest suspicion of partiality, or otherwise they would not impose upon them this extra duty. Therefore, when they came to revise a sentence, and were not unanimous in the view they took, he (Mr. Healy) hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be prepared to listen to their doubts in the manner his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had pointed out. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who himself exercised the Prerogative of Mercy in many cases, remained quite passive when it was argued that a similar prerogative should be exercised by the Irish Judges. The objections to this provision of the Bill were not at all answered by the argument that the Judges were Irish. Personally, he would rather be governed by Englishmen, under the present régime in Ireland, than by Irishmen. He would rather have the Home Secretary as an Irish Judge, or as an Irish Law Officer, than an Irishman. He said this with all respect for the Irishmen who filled Offices of the Crown in Ireland; but he would rather deal with Englishmen for this reason. An Englishman was brought up, to a large extent, without bias; he was not reared in the region of prejudice, and fed on all the miserable stories of past Irish history. For his part, he had no sympathy with the complaints that were constantly made in Ireland, that the Chief Secretary, the Lord Lieutenant, and other officers, were Englishmen. He thought it was much better to have Englishmen than Irish place-hunters who sold their country; and it was no answer to the argument now raised to say that the Judges were Irish. He would far rather have an Englishman, reared in English traditions, than a man reared in the Irish traditions prevalent in Dublin Castle. Therefore, he had no objection to urge to the fact that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Chief Secretary were Englishmen. In this case they had a number of Irish Judges to deal with. No doubt there were a limited number of them who were above all suspicion; and, in the opinion of the Irish people, the verdict given by Baron Fitzgerald in one of these cases, upon a single appeal, might overtop and outweigh the decision of all the other Judges who might sit with him on the Irish Bench. He would give an instance to justify this assertion. A case recently occurred down in Kerry, in which a prisoner was convicted of posting a "no rent" notice; and in a case, either at Leitrim or Carrick-on-Shannon, Baron Fitzgerald refused to allow it even to go before a jury. He (Mr. Healy) knew that was so as a matter of fact. Then, again, in Ireland, it was highly probable that they might have a Judge, with a strictly judicial mind, taking one view, and a partizan Judge taking another; but it appeared to be the view of the Government that a conviction must be had at all hazards, or that justice would not be done. But if the Government really desired justice to be done, they must pay some respect to the popular feeling. In England, not many years ago, they found all the people disagreeing with the decision of the Judge who tried the case of the gas stokers. In that case the whole popular mind was against the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett, and the Home Secretary was obliged to interfere and cut down the imprisonment which had been awarded. That was a case in which the unanimous opinion of England was against the Judges, and the public opinion in England was allowed to have its due effect. But in Ireland what did they have? He was not going to find fault with the Attorney General for Ireland; but he knew that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been brought up to entertain certain views in regard to treason. The Bill dealt with treason, and it was now proposed to exclude treason, treason-felony, and murder from a non-unanimous decision. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was a very amiable gentleman to deal with in that House. He was always courteous to the Irish Members, and easily approached; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman upon the Bench would be a very different mortal, and he said it with all due respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would, in that case, have to deal with his own personal views and his own conscientious opinions of what strict law was. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's view of law, however, might be perfect, or it might be imperfect; but, whatever it was, he would have the full power of enforcing it; and he had already intimated that, in his view, the declarations of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) amounted to rank treason. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the course of time, would find his way to the Irish Bench; and holding this view that certain declarations amounted to treason or treason-felony, with all due respect to the opinions of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought it was necessary that any view taken by the Irish Judges should be unanimous. He asked the Government if it was worth their while to get verdicts by what he might call the skin of their teeth? Let the Home Secretary, for a moment, take a review of public affairs. Was it desirable, in a time of political passion—and he should not be afraid of this particular portion of the Bill, except in a time of political passion—to put in force a clause of this nature? He was not apprehensive of any verdict which an Irish Court of Appeal might give, except in a moment of political passion. They all knew very well that if his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had been before the Judges when the Prime Minister made his Guildhall speech, he would inevitably have been sent into penal servitude, seeing the views which prevailed at the time with regard to treason and treason-felony. Taking a careful review of human agencies, was it worth while, seeing that the number of cases would be very few in which this Amendment would come into operation, to waste the time of the House by resisting it? Without putting it as a question of law, but rather as one of administration, was it worth the while of the Government, as public administrators desirous of seeing justice done, to enforce so arbitrary an opinion? While the Home Secretary in that House was so very severe on O'Donovan Rossa, and what he considered to be the ram-pagious course of certain Irishmen, as an Englishman the right hon. and learned Gentleman was an ornament to the position of Home Secretary; and he could scarcely pay a sufficient tribute to the merits of the right hon. and learned Gentleman in that capacity. But, while he said this, in his dealings with Irish crime the right hon. and learned Gentleman had no stronger opponent than he (Mr. Healy) was. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman had allowed his views and prejudices to run away with his judgment; and he asked him whether, on this particular point, he could not import something of English judicial temper into the matter? Why should he allow O'Donovan Rossa to run away with his judgment? They were dealing with a very simple state of facts. He doubted whether two such cases would come up during the three years the Bill was to last. There would certainly not be more in which the majority of the Court of Appeal would differ from their judicial brethren. He would, therefore, appeal to the Home Secretary whether the matter was worth contesting, for, as, he confessed, there was no principle involved in it? He really could not see why the Government should refuse to give way upon the point. The Home Secretary had obtained several clauses of the Bill with great celebrity. It was astonishing, considering that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not given way upon a single point, the absolute ease with which he had obtained the most important clause of the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was not able to make such rapid progress in the case of the Rabbits Bill, introduced a few years ago, although it only dealt with hares and rabbits, and not with the lives of the Irish people. On that occasion the House was kept up night after night by hon. Members who sympathized with British poachers. Then, why should not the views and feelings of the Irish Members be taken into account here? What was there in the position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as the man in charge of the Bill, to prevent him from casting away altogether this exceptional treatment of cases of treason, treason-felony, and murder? The Irish Members believed that the Irish Judges were appointed as a jury to try these cases, because they were Government nominees; and he should have thought the Government would desire to escape from the reflection that a few Government nominees might be afraid of the decision of the more impartial of the Irish Judges. He trusted that the Home Secretary would import into his decision on this point some of that judicial temper and of those attributes of mercy which he had so signally displayed in dealing with the administration of justice in England.

Mr. Healy

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, after the personal appeal which had been made to him by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Metge), he could not refuse to say a few words, notwithstanding the fact that he had already spoken several times on the subject, and had said all that he had to say. He had certainly not said much upon this particular Amendment, because he considered that the opinion of the Committee had already been taken very fully upon the principle involved in the Amendment. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had been good enough to pay a very undeserved compliment to him upon the administration of the Department with which he was connected; but he wished to point out once more that the administration of the Prerogative of Mercy was a totally different thing from the decision which these Courts would have to give. He had already indicated that if any of the Judges differed upon questions of facts, it would be a very proper consideration to place before the Executive Government in reference to the carrying out of any sentence; and there was not the smallest doubt that a circumstance of that character would have the greatest effect upon the mind of a person occupying the position which he had now the honour to occupy. It would require very strong circumstances indeed to induce him to allow the execution of any person who had been recommended to mercy by the jury, and it would be the same in a case in which doubts were entertained upon questions of fact. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) said the judgment might be confirmed by a majority of partizan Judges; but that was an argument which he (Sir William Harcourt) could not listen to. The real truth of the matter was that the Government had gone to the extremest limits in protecting the accused. In point of fact, the Bill placed a convicted prisoner in a much better position than he was in at present. There was ordinarily no appeal, either in Ireland or in England, upon facts at all. [Mr. HEALY: Yes; but there is a jury.] He assumed that a tribunal of Judges, for the purposes of the present Bill, would be thoroughly impartial; and, so far as the prisoner was concerned, would be quite as good as a jury. A prisoner tried in England would certainly be quite as safe, as fully under the protection of the law, and subjected as much to a merciful construction of the law, as he would be if tried before any jury. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Irish Members.] That, at any rate, was his conviction. In this Bill it was considered advisable to grant an unusual appeal simply from a desire, not to prevent a conviction by partizan Judges—for there was no reason to anticipate that any of the distinguished men upon the Irish Bench would assume the character of a partizan—but because, in creating a new and extraordinary tribunal, it was considered necessary to provide an appellate machinery in order to give a chance to prisoners which they would not have under ordinary circumstances. The Government felt that that was a desirable thing to do, because the tribunal was a new and extraordinary one, and because they thought it ought to be fenced round with reasonable provisions of this character. He could honestly say that that was the sincere desire of the Government. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) asked why they would not yield. They did not yield because they could not come to the conclusion that it would be right to yield. They had undertaken a grave responsibility in framing this Bill. Of course, they knew that objections would be taken to some of the provisions of the measure. It was only natural that there should be objections. Many of the objections were obvious, and were, of course, in the mind of the Government when the Bill was framed. They had carefully considered every matter, and they were quite aware that there was hardly any question upon which a good deal might not be said on both sides. He trusted that hon. Members opposite would give the Government credit for a desire to arrive at a right conclusion; and they had come to the conclusion that the course which they proposed in regard to an appeal was at once a safe and a humane course towards the prisoners themselves, and that it was also a course consistent with the fair and due administration of justice. Having come to that decision—and the House of Commons, after hearing the arguments on both sides, having pronounced, by a large majority, in favour of the view of the Government—was it reasonable to ask them now to yield to that which they deliberately thought was not the best plan? He was sure that hon. Members opposite would acquit him of anything in the nature of personal obstinacy, when he said that Her Majesty's Government declined to yield, because, in a matter of such consequence, they had already gone to the extreme verge compatible with the proper administration of justice and the maintenance of law and order in Ireland.

MR. HEALY said, he would ask one question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman before the Committee went to a division. In providing for an appeal, the Government had made no provision in the Bill for the payment of fees to counsel in cases of murder, treason, and treason-felony. Would they be willing, in the event of an appeal to the Appellate Court in the case of a poor prisoner, to do what they had agreed to do in reference to the expenses of witnesses before the Court of First Instance?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, in a matter of that kind, the Government would always be willing to do what was fair and reasonable; and the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would find no obstinacy in him on such a question.

MR. HEALY: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman bring up an Amendment in that sense?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 64: Majority 29.—(Div. List No. 112.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. BIGGAR said, the clause, as it stood, was of a most objectionable character, and its most objectionable feature was that it provided that if the Court of Appeal was composed of six Judges, and they were equally divided in opinion, the decision of the Court below must be confirmed and the conviction stand. In case of such a division of opinion, he certainly thought the benefit of the doubt ought to be given to the accused. There was also another objection to the clause, and that was that it did not recognize the right of appeal in criminal cases. If the Government had agreed to an Amendment which had been proposed to the clause now under consideration, the clause might have been beneficial in its operation; and, in addition, it would have acknowledged a principle of great importance, and one which, sooner or later, must become a common principle of English jurisprudence—namely, the right of appeal in criminal cases. It seemed preposterous that, in civil cases—in which, as a rule, the consideration was merely a monetary one—the right of appeal should be given; but that in criminal cases, in which the liberty, and possibly the life, of a man might be involved, that right was withheld. Under all the circumstances, he considered his Party would do well to divide against the clause.

Sir William Harcourt

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 29: Majority 53.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 4 (Intimidation).

MR. HEALY proposed, in page 3, line 13, before "every," to insert—

"An agreement or combination by two or more persons to do, or procure to be done, any act or thing in contemplation or furtherance of any dispute between landlord and tenant of the character commonly known as agrarian, shall not be indictable as a conspiracy of such act or thing, when committed by one person, would not be punishable as a crime."

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think that this Amendment comes within the scope of the clause under consideration. As, however, it is within the title of the Bill, it can be brought up as a separate clause.

MR. HEALY asked if the Chairman was aware that the Amendment of which he had given Notice was taken almost word for word from the Conspiracy Act of 1875, and that he proposed to insert the words in a precisely similar place to the place they occupied in the Act he had mentioned? He really was at a loss to know what they were to do if they were not to follow precedent. The only alteration he had made in the words was to substitute for "master and servant" "landlord and tenant;" and he submitted that, having followed the line which Mr. Playfair's Predecessor had permitted in regard to the English Conspiracy Act, if Irish Members were unable to insert the same words in the present Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: I told the hon. Member the words came within the title of the Bill, but that they could not be properly entertained at this stage of the Bill. As a separate clause the words would be quite in Order.

MR. HEALY said, he presumed that, without being disrespectful to the Chairman, he might venture to offer his opinion. ["Oh!"] Hon. Members seemed to imagine that the Chairman was beyond the region of argument. Now, he thought the Chairman was a very competent person to argue with; and, therefore, he ventured to submit a point to him for his decision. The clause dealt with intimidation, and he proposed this Amendment because, if something of the kind were not adopted, it would be quite possible for a magistrate to hold that such a thing as combination between landlord and tenant amounted to conspiracy. What he wanted to do was to make it clear to the mind of the magistrate who had to administer the Act that such a combination would not be conspiracy.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Gentleman did not seem to understand what the point of Order was. In the Conspiracy Bill this paragraph did appear; and, subject to the Chairman's ruling, he (Sir William Harcourt) would venture to submit that in an Amendment to a clause they could not sweep away everything in the clause, and then interpose at the commencement something altogether new, in the shape of a new Amendment. According to their Rules, it was necessary that something should remain, even if it be only the word "that." The Amendment of the hon. Member, as he would see, left nothing of the clause.

MR. HEALY: It does not interfere with the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the hon. Gentleman proposed to bring in a whole paragraph before the first word of the clause, so as to make it a new clause in itself.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no doubt whatever about the ruling I have given. The hon. Member drew attention to a previous Act, and seemed to indicate that in the Intimidation Clause of that Act the words which he has placed on the Paper were put in as a preface to that clause. That is not so. The words are not in that clause at all, but in another clause. These words must, if they are moved at all, be moved as a new clause.

MR. HEALY said, he bowed to the ruling of the Chairman. He had taken the words from the 1st clause of the English Act; and he would like to ask the Chairman if he was not entitled to move the words at the beginning of Clause 4; whether he might not move their insertion at the end of the clause? At the end of the Bill the words would be absurd.

cluded from the mind of the Committee who was to be the party to take the initiative. Whether it was to be the local police or the local magistrate there was no indication. The clause simply said—

“Every person who wrongfully or without legal authority uses intimidation, . . . shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Who was the person to form an opinion as to intimidation? Let the Home Secretary get up and answer that question.

MR. DILLON said, a case occurred a short time ago in the county of Clare bearing on the question involved in the Amendment before the Committee—that was to say, an answer was given to a Question in that House, on the authority of two magistrates—Mr. Clifford Lloyd and another. It was said that certain tenants on a well-known estate had remained out of their houses because they were intimidated from re-entering. Shortly afterwards a document was placed in the hands of hon. Members of that House, signed by every one of the tenants, and not only so, but the document was accompanied by a letter from the parish priest, stating that no intimidation had been exercised on the tenants; that the signatures were obtained in the Presbytery of the chapel without the slightest pressure being put upon the tenants. This was a very serious case, because the statement was made in the House, on the authority of Mr. Clifford Lloyd and another magistrate, that intimidation of the grossest character had been exercised, and was being exercised, towards the tenants. Numbers of men had been sent to gaol for six months, with hard labour, for the intimidation alleged to have been exercised; whereas they had the testimony of the tenants themselves, backed up by the evidence of the parish priest, that no intimidation had been practised towards them, and that the intimidation was alleged simply for political purposes. As the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) put it, they should know, before the clause passed, who was to institute proceedings for intimidation. He must say that men—and he was not the first to say it, for he believed the late Chief Secretary had said it, and he was certain Mr. Justice Fitzgerald had said it—were such cowards that they were afraid to complain that this House was very badly employed in defending them. He did not believe, moreover, that the House of Commons would be able to protect them. Any man who was coward enough to be intimidated, and was afraid to bring his case before a tribunal, was not worthy of the attention of that House, or of any other assembly of men; any woman would be ashamed to display the cowardice which was exhibited by some men in Ireland. It was now a question whether they were to allow a combination and conspiracy of Resident Magistrates and landlords to trump up charges of intimidation against obnoxious men, and cast them into prison. There were two kinds of intimidation. Intimidation might be used for political purposes. They knew that in several instances it had been alleged that intimidation had been practised upon a whole body of people, and that afterwards the people had come forward and sworn that they had not been intimidated. They knew that intimidation had been exercised upon witnesses to prevent them coming forward against the popular side. They knew that landlords and agents did exercise intimidation, and would, if this clause passed in its present shape, exercise it. They knew that tenants who wanted to go to Court to give evidence in favour of an accused person would be told to stop at home, and that if they did not keep quiet they themselves would be charged with crime. He considered the Amendment an exceedingly important one, and he intended to vote for it.

Mr. Healy

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Home Secretary how it was possible to get at the fact of intimidation unless the man intimidated came forward and lodged a complaint? There must be someone to set the law in motion, and the proper person to do so was the person aggrieved. [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary shook his head. That was the law of this country. It constantly happened, in case of strike, that the blackleg went and lodged his charge with the police or magistrate, and thus the law was set in motion by himself. That was what the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) wanted to provide for in the case of intimidation in Ireland; all the hon. Gentleman wanted to do was to provide that the man intimidated should himself set the law in motion. He (Mr. Joseph Cowen) had often heard the Home Secretary denounce grand-motherly Government; but it seemed to him that this was the best specimen of it they could very well have.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he must differ from the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Joseph Cowen) as to the principle of English law. The hon. Member said it was only the person injured who took proceedings; and he said, moreover, that that was the principle of the law of this country. Why, it was the general principle of the Criminal Law that the State should prosecute in cases of injuries sustained. The hon. Member for Newcastle had entirely misapprehended the principle of the law of England. It happened, over and over again, that where a person did not wish to proceed with a case, the Public Prosecutor stepped in and compelled a prosecution in the interest of society.

MR. PARNELL said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that the Public Prosecutor, in cases of injury, was the person upon whom the duty devolved to initiate proceedings. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Or the police.] He (Mr. Parnell) ventured to say it was nothing of the sort in either England or Ireland. He did not pretend to know very much of the law; but, at least, he knew that where a person was assaulted and desired to obtain his remedy before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, he laid the complaint himself, and not the Public Prosecutor. In Ireland, the only cases in which the police took the initiative were those in which the public generally were injured. For instance, if a donkey was found straying on the road, the police would summon the owner. In a case where an individual was affected, it was left to that individual to apply to the magistrate for a summons to protect himself, or to obtain the punishment of the person injuring him. That was the practice in Ireland in cases of summary jurisdiction, and he believed it to be the practice in England. They knew that, over and over again, there were many cases where the police had actually desired that prosecutions should be instituted, and where the parties had not. In cases where the parties injured felt there had been no intention to intimidate, or where there had been no absolute vindictiveness, they had not desired to proceed further, and the police had not felt themselves justified or able to initiate proceedings. What were the facts? In a clause of 20 lines, the Government had attempted, in this extraordinary Bill, and in this most extraordinary part of this extraordinary Bill, to set up in Ireland a new Law of Conspiracy and Intimidation. Open combinations among Irish tenant farmers had not been usual in times past. There had been combinations of a secret character. According to the statement of a former Chief Secretary for Ireland, in 1849, no bargain with regard to the letting of land in a large district—in a whole province in Ireland—could be made without the consent of the Secret Ribbon Lodges. Open combinations of tenant farmers in Ireland were attempted for the first time after the institution of the Irish National Land League. He said upon the second reading of this Bill that he had no objection in the world to the passing of a Statute dealing with combinations of Irish tenant farmers, and dealing with the Law of Conspiracy as regarded combinations of Irish farmers, on the same principle as the combinations of English workmen were dealt with in the Conspiracy Act of 1875; an Act which, by the way, was introduced and passed by a Conservative Government. They were asked to deal, in a clause of 20 lines, with a subject which was dealt with in the English Act relating to working men in a Bill of 10 pages. Now, was that reasonable? Was it reasonable to compress their regard for the right of combination amongst Irish tenant farmers into 20 lines, and to take away, at the same time, the right of trial by jury which they gave in the English Act? He did not believe the House of Commons would submit to the attempt this Liberal Government was making to so alter the Law of Conspiracy and Intimidation as to make it practically impossible, after the passing of this Act, for any Irish farmers or Irish working men to combine to any legitimate purpose. He saw the master hand of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) in these clauses. He was quite sure this clause was designed by the right hon. Gentleman, and that it was the result of the careful study he had made of Irish questions during the 24 months of his official existence. He knew something of the practical results of the working of the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. He knew that the right hon. Gentleman had arrested hundreds of men in Ireland on the charge of intimidation, simply because they refused to pay their rents or asked that their rent might be reduced. He could give the names of many most respectable tenants who were arrested by the right hon. Gentleman and sent to Kilmainham, and who were in Kilmainham Gaol still, simply because they presented a petition, adopted by the tenants of an estate at an open and public meeting, to their landlord praying for a reduction of rent. He would give one name, that of Mr. Crosbie, a tenant on the estate of Colonel Boyce, in the county of Wexford. Mr. Crosbie was the occupier of two farms of considerable extent; he was also a trader, with a large business in his village; he was a man of an unassuming and retiring disposition, and he was asked to take the chair at a meeting of the tenants of Colonel Boyce held last October, and at that meeting a resolution was passed in favour of paying no rent until they got a reduction of rent. Mr. Crosbie, a gentleman of about 60 years of age, of portly and respectable appearance, was selected as the leading tenant on the estate, and the leading man in the neighbourhood, to present a petition to the landlord. He did so, and Colonel Boyce replied—"I will go up to Dublin tomorrow, and I will see Buckshot Forster, and get you arrested." The right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland was in his place, and if he was able to contradict the facts he had stated—namely, that he arrested Mr. Crosbie last October, that Mr. Crosbie was still in Kilmainham prison on a charge of intimidation, that Mr. Crosbie committed no other intimidation than that alleged to be contained in presenting a petition to his landlord, and that a day or two subsequently the right hon. Gentleman was visited by Colonel Boyce, and compelled to arrest Mr. Crosbie on a charge of intimidation, he (Mr. Parnell) would very cheerfully withdraw the statement he had made. He mentioned these facts to show the Committee the way in which these things were done in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford stated, when the Coercion Bill was being carried last year, that he would act as if he were a sworn juror, and that he would refuse to arrest any man whom he did not conscientiously believe to be guilty of the offence with which he was charged. Was there any outrage committed last October on the estate of Colonel Boyce, or in the neighbourhood of it? Was there the slightest intimidation exercised there? He might extend the area from the estate of Bannock to the whole of the county of Wexford, from which county there had been, he supposed, fully 20 persons arrested under the Coercion Act—

[Fifth Night.]

MR. HOPWOOD rose to Order. Had these remarks any earthly connection with the clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member is going very far away from the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not wish to go any further away from the Amendment than the Chairman thought right; but he desired to point out that he was surprised the hon. and learned Member for Stockport, by whose side he had fought in that House to abolish the infamous practice of flogging in the Army, and to secure for English working men the right of combination, should be so zealous in interfering to limit his (Mr. Parnell's) illustrations in support of his argument in favour of the right of combination for Irish farmers. They wanted to know—and the question had been asked several times, and had not been answered by the Government—they wanted to know who was going to initiate the prosecutions for intimidation? They were told that Mr. Clifford Lloyd was not to be trusted to administer this law; he was not to be allowed to initiate prosecutions against individuals. If the prosecutions were not to be instituted upon the complaint of the persons injured, upon whose complaint were they to be instituted? They were told the other day by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that in certain cases of alleged intimidation—in such cases as the erection of wooden huts for the purpose of sheltering evicted tenants—the Lord Lieutenant would be the judge as to whether it would be right that prosecutions should be instituted. He would be perfectly willing that the Lord Lieutenant should be the judge in such cases; because, just as they had left the initiation of the prosecutions of trials without jury to the Lord Lieutenant, so they should also leave the initiation of the trials before the special tribunal and Resident Magistrates to the Lord Lieutenant. He was not willing to leave the initiation of these prosecutions to the stray Resident Magistrates throughout the country. The people were entitled to know what the law was in the first place; and, in the second place, they were entitled to know what they could do, so as to keep within the law. Under the clause as it now stood it was perfectly impossible that anybody could know what the law was, and what they could do to keep within the scope of the law. In asking for information as to who were to initiate prosecutions, they were asking for uniformity in the administration of the law throughout Ireland. If the initiation of the prosecution was to be left to the Resident Magistrates in Ireland, they would find offences differing in every county and district in the country; and it would be impossible for anyone to know what the law really was. The law would depend, in that case, for its interpretation and its administration upon the whims of 40 or 50 different stipendiary magistrates. He, therefore, thought that, upon the threshold of the clause, they were entitled to know who was to initiate the prosecutions for intimidation. Was it to be the police-constable, was it to be the Resident Magistrate, or was it to be the Lord Lieutenant? The Government ought to give them some information, some light as to what men must do to obey the law. They wanted to obey the law, they were willing to obey the law; but under an Act of this kind it would be quite impossible for them to obey the law, because they would be left completely in the dark as to its nature and extent.

Mr. Parnell

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to make a few remarks, in consequence of the observations of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had arrested, or caused men to be arrested, simply because they had paid their rents. He absolutely and entirely denied the statement.

MR. PARNELL: What did the right hon. Gentleman arrest Mr. Crosbie for?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the hon. Member, without giving him the slightest Notice, questioned him with regard to a particular arrest. Though he had had no Notice, if the hon. Gentleman was prepared to raise a discussion on the subject, he would be prepared to meet him. Mr. Crosbie was arrested because he (Mr. W. E. Forster) believed he had been guilty of intimidation. Mr. Crosbie was not arrested because he refused to pay his rent, but on the charge of intimidation.

MR. PARNELL: What was the intimidation?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the hon. Member was perfectly aware that the Protection of Person and Property Act was obtained upon the ground that it was impossible to give the reasons for arrests. If they had given the reasons for arrests—

MR. HOPWOOD rose to Order. He could quite understand the right hon. Gentleman's desire to answer on the spot anything the hon. Member for the City of Cork might have said; but he asked whether they were to enter into an interminable debate upon matters which had nothing to do with the Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: Allowance is always made by the Committee for a personal explanation. I must state, however, it would be quite out of Order to continue the discussion on this subject.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must repeat, although he did not wish to dwell upon the point, that it was a very well known fact that the reasons for arrest could not be given without endangering the personal safety of the people who gave the information. ["Oh, oh!"] Really, hon. Gentlemen seemed to think there was no such thing as intimidation in Ireland. He should have thought that any person who had paid the slightest attention to what had happened in Ireland during the last six months would have been aware that there was such intimidation in the country that, if the names of the persons who had given information upon which any man had been arrested had been published, the lives of those persons, and their property, and their comfort and peace, would have been seriously endangered, and they would have had very little chance of carrying on their daily occupation.

MR. O'KELLY: I rise to a point of Order. The right hon. Gentleman rose to make an explanation with reference to the case of Mr. Crosbie; and he repeats now, for the twentieth time, his infernal speech.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: I move, Sir, that the words of the hon. Member be taken down. He has said, in my hearing, "the right hon. Member's infernal speech." I move that those words be taken down.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the words 'the right hon. Member's infernal speech' be taken down."—(Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

THE CHAIRMAN: Order! Is it the desire of the Committee that the words of the hon. Member be taken down?

MR. PARNELL said, it was a well-known precedent in that House that words could only be taken down if they had been heard by the Clerk at the Table, and immediately upon utterance. [Cries of "Name, name!"] No; there was another method of procedure open. A Motion had been made that the hon. Member's words be taken down; but his words had not been heard.

THE CHAIRMAN: They were heard by the Chairman quite distinctly.

MR. PARNELL: I confess, Sir, that although I was sitting very close to the hon. Member, I did not hear him make use of the words mentioned.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I rise to Order, Sir. I believe on these matters there can be no debate. The Chairman heard the words; therefore he can direct that they be taken down.

MR. PARNELL said, that in the last Parliament, as he distinctly remembered, there was a debate which lasted, not only for a few minutes, but for the whole evening—a debate in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the present Home Secretary took a very distinguished part—upon the Motion of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), that some words uttered by an hon. Member sitting on that (the Opposition) side of the House—he thought the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell)—should be taken down. A debate arose, and the present Home Secretary, then in Opposition, entered very strongly into the debate, and proposed the taking down of the words; but finally the Motion to take down the words was withdrawn. On the present occasion, he submitted, the situation was precisely the same. Words were uttered by his hon. Friend as to the precise nature of which there seemed to be some difference of opinion. He (Mr. Parnell) confessed that though he sat very near the hon. Member for Roscommon—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot debate the question as to whether the words are to be taken down or not. The Rule is that if a Motion is made that the words of an hon. Member be taken down, and

"It does appear to the Speaker, or the Chairman of Committees, that it is the evident sense of the House that they shall be taken down, he will then direct that the words be taken down, and will then put as the question that the words be reported to the House."

The words having been taken down by the Clerk—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question I now put is, that the words taken down—namely, "the right hon. Member's infernal speech," be reported to the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to ask the Chairman, as a matter of Order, whether it was a Rule of the House that this Motion should be put to the House or the Committee, and decided without debate, and whether there were not precedents for a debate, and a very lengthened debate, taking place on such a question?

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he might suggest, with a view to the general harmony of the Committee, that as this was a matter calculated to create bitterness of feeling on the part of some hon. Members, and as the debate had been, so far, conducted in good temper, the way out of the difficulty would be for the hon. Member for Roscommon to withdraw the expression he had used.

MR. PARNELL said, he certainly did not catch the exact adjective used by his hon. Friend; but some hon. Members said that a certain adjective, which he would not repeat, had been used. He was sitting behind his hon. Friend when the objectionable word was used, and sound did not travel backwards as well as it did forward. That was the reason, perhaps, that the exact phrase had not reached him, there having been considerable noise in the House at the time of the occurrence. Since he had last spoken, however, he had consulted his hon. Friend, who had told him that he did use the objectionable adjective. His hon. Friend, he was sure, would see, if the Motion that the words be reported to the House were withdrawn, that it was desirable that he should withdraw the expression he had made use of. The hon. Gentleman would, no doubt, be glad to withdraw it, and to express regret for having made use of it.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the matter may be settled without carrying it further; but I am bound to say that I do not think, with regard to the Order of the House, that a mere withdrawal would be sufficient. The House is certainly entitled to an expression of regret from the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must explain to the hon. Member, who, I have no doubt, will do so, that a mere withdrawal is not sufficient, but that he must express regret for having used the words.

MR. O'KELLY: I confess at once that I did use the adjective, and I must say that it escaped me in the heat of debate, and quite without my intending to use that particular adjective. I withdraw it, and express to the Committee my regret for having used it.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have been aggrieved, to have.'"

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Healy,) —put, and negatived.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, continuing, said, he did not wish to make any further remark in regard to the facts alluded to by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He should not have spoken at all had it not been for words the hon. Member had used. With regard to the Amendment, it would make the clause of no use. If the clause was required at all, it was required to prevent extensive and constructive intimidation. He believed it was necessary for that purpose; but, whatever had rendered it necessary, the person intimidated would be very easily prevented by fresh intimidation from initiating a prosecution. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had said he understood he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had alluded to people being cowards in this matter. He did not know what remark he might have made; but he might state that he considered that it would require great courage—more, indeed, than they had any right to expect from the average of individuals—to initiate prosecutions with the system of intimidation known as "Boycotting" existing.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he wished to say a few words in reply to that small portion of the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) which was relevant to the matter before the Committee. This 4th clause dealt with offences that would include breaches of the peace and acts of violence towards the person intimidated by the person intimidating, and the Amendment was to the effect that no person should make complaint of these acts of intimidation, except the person intimidated. Apart from the question of policy, if this Amendment were accepted, it would be another innovation in the law of the country. The general law was that, whenever a breach of the peace was committed, any person could make complaint of that breach of the peace; but it was proposed to make exception to that law, and require that the person who had been the victim of a breach of the peace alone should complain. How often did they not hear of persons assaulting women or children? In these cases, who made the charges? Not the persons assaulted, but some other person who was aware that a breach of the peace had been committed. Any person would make the charge; and the Amendment, which, it was said, would carry the general law into effect would, if applied, limit the right of complaint to the person assaulted, who might be afraid to make complaint. Let him give an instance that closely approached the condition of things sought to be dealt with by the clause. Reference had been made to the Act of 1878, which was an Act to prevent intimidation and persons being interfered with when doing that which they had a perfect legal right to do. Who could make complaint under this Act? Not only the persons intimidated. They had had constant complaints under the Workman's Act of 1875, not only from masters—who declared that their workmen were intimidated—but from persons who stood by and witnessed the acts of intimidation. The workman would be the last person to make complaint, and those by whom complaint would be made would be, in most cases, persons who represented society, and their complaints would be heard. They had been asked to make an exception, as against the general principle to which he referred, where breaches of the peace occurred. The whole purpose of the Act was to protect people who could not protect themselves. It was by the shield of the present legislation that they were endeavouring to protect those who were in a state of terror, and were unable to protect themselves. They had had to deal with a very paralysis of action in which, in Ireland, persons could not protect themselves, and especially in this case, where terrorism of two kinds existed—namely, that which was immediate and worked on the people directly, preventing them from doing lawful acts; and then, when the people were intimidated, that secondary intimidation that prevented them from making complaint of the primary intimidation. If they accepted this Amendment, people would intimidate with this knowledge—that no consequences could possibly ensue if they only intimidated still further, and prevented their victims from making complaint.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. BULWER said, he wished merely to say one word as to the extreme inapplicability of the Amendment to the clause under discussion. The clause was one for the definition of offence, and it said—

“Every person who wrongfully and without legal authority uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation, with a view to cause any person or persons, either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do, or towards any person or persons in consequence, either of his or their having done any act which he or they had a legal right to do, or of his or their having abstained from doing any act which he or they had a legal right to abstain from doing, shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.”

Then it was proposed, in the definition of the offence, to introduce words pointing out how intimidation was to be proved. Why, the absurdity of the thing was self-evident to introduce into a clause which dealt with the definition of an offence words referring to proof of that offence. The words of the Amendment were—

“Shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have been aggrieved.”

The Attorney General

But the clause dealt not with proof, but with the definition of the crime. He submitted to the hon. Member who had brought forward the Amendment that this was not the proper time to do so. If the Amendment was appropriate to the Bill at all, the right time to propose it would be when they were dealing with the proof by which the offence was to be established.

MR. PARNELL said, the Amendment of his hon. Friend was really a very important one, because at the very threshold of the clause they were met by the question—“Who is to initiate these prosecutions?” The Chief Secretary for Ireland informed them the other day that complaints, as regarded intimidation in connection with the erection of wooden cabins for evicted tenants, should only be brought before the magistrates for decision after they had been first investigated by the Lord Lieutenant. If, however, this clause was passed, it would practically override the announcement which the Chief Secretary made. Did the Chief Secretary make the announcement in ignorance of the effect of this clause, or did he only intend it to be taken as referring to the present law in force until this Act should have been passed? The matter was of great importance, whatever reply were given to this question. Under the present law, charges of intimidation could only be dealt with in two ways, and the punishments to be inflicted for such offences were much less in magnitude than the punishments to be inflicted under the operation of this clause. At present, a person who was charged with intimidation could be required by the magistrates, under a section of the Statute of Edward III., to give bail, and in default of giving that they could be sent to prison for a period not exceeding six months. They were treated as untried prisoners, were allowed to supply themselves with food, and there was, in fact, the clearest distinction drawn between them and prisoners convicted of crime. The other remedy against intimidation, under the present law, was that magistrates could send a person to prison for three months, with or without hard labour, with the option of a fine, and from that decision of the magistrates there was an appeal to the Quarter Sessions. If it was necessary to reserve to the Lord Lieutenant the right of putting into action a charge of intimidation under the present law, it became much more necessary to reserve such a right to the Lord Lieutenant, under the very stringent provisions of this clause. Now, the Irish Members wished to know did the Government intend that this Intimidation Clause was to be put in force by every policeman in Ireland—was every policeman in Ireland to have the right to drag any man, woman, or child, at any moment, before the nearest stipendiary magistrate? There was no limitation in their Intimidation Clause. It was not necessary to summon a person offending under it—he could be taken at once, at any hour of the day or night, before the stipendiary magistrate, and charged with intimidation. Did the Government intend that the provisions of this clause were to be exercised in this way, doing away with the right of trial by jury, doing away with the right of appeal, doing away with the option of a fine, and increasing the punishment from three months to six months? Did they intend that these provisions should be exercised in the spirit of the statement made the other day by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with regard to the erection of the huts for evicted tenants, or did they intend that they should be exercised in the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) and his pet, Mr. Clifford Lloyd?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could answer the hon. Member in a single sentence. It was intended that the clause should be exercised in exactly the same manner, and the informations given by exactly the same people, as was the case under the English Act of 1875. The two cases were precisely similar. There was no limitation in the Act of 1875 as to the persons who were to lay the informations for offences under that Act; no more would there be under this Act. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, on the second reading, he thought, or two or three nights ago, made a fair statement as to this Intimidation Clause—namely, that he wished it to be a clause resembling the English law on the subject, with such modifications of that law as the condition of Ireland rendered necessary. That, he (Sir William Harcourt) thought, was as fair a statement of the case as could possibly be made. Well, that was the intention of the Government with reference to this clause; and everything which tended to show that it did not resemble the principle of the English law, with such modifications as the peculiar circumstances of Ireland rendered necessary, were matters which, he thought, would properly command the attention of the Committee, and also its assent to any Amendment which might be requisite to carry out the intention of the Government. But if the Amendment were accepted it would make the clause differ altogether from the English law; and he, therefore, claimed the support of the hon. Member for the City of Cork on his own principle in opposing this Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he, on the other hand, claimed the support of the Home Secretary for the Amendment of his hon. Friend, on account of the principles the right hon. and learned Gentleman had defended, and the measures he had introduced into the House, at an earlier and more independent stage of his career. The right hon. and learned Gentleman would not forget that golden youth of his, when he was prominent in the House in demanding the largest right of combination for the working men of this country, and when he brought forward Motions for the adjournment of the House, for doing which now the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) brought on himself the thunders of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. There was no analogy with regard to the initiation of prosecutions for intimidation between the cases of England and Ireland. As far as he was concerned as to the other part of the proposition, he was ready to accept it. If the intimidation was clear and defined, as in England, he would be content; but the initiation of proceedings was quite a different matter. In England they had not a whole class of magistrates who were officials of the Crown. The magistrates in England, and those in Ireland, were men of an entirely different order. The police, likewise, were different. Here they were the servants of the people, there they were their masters, licensed to stare at, accost, search, and offend every person they met. The Irish magistrates were men who did the things referred to by the exploded politician he was sorry his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork had brought into notice again this evening.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. BULWER said, he rose to Order. The Question before the Committee was the definition of an offence. ["No, no!"] Yes. Whoever did a certain thing would be guilty of an offence. The Amendment, as to how the offence was to be proved, was out of Order, and out of place. It was not for them on this occasion to discuss the mode in which the proceedings were to be initiated, in order to determine whether or not an offence had been committed.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, it was very inconvenient that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Bulwer) should attempt to take part in the discussion without having taken the trouble to read the Amendment on which the Committee was engaged. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would allow him, he would read the Amendment which the hon. and learned Gentleman should have read for himself. It was to insert the words—

"Shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have been aggrieved, to have."

Plainly the question was as to the initiation. The hon. and learned Member had told them the other night they were rather asleep on questions affecting Ireland; but the hon. and learned Member himself did not seem to be very wide awake with regard to these Amendments. He would ask the Home Secretary how he could reconcile the fact that all prosecutions under this Bill were to have the sanction of the Attorney General, or the Solicitor General for Ireland, for the time being, with his position now, which left to the lowest and meanest policeman the right of initiating proceedings? [A laugh.] The right hon. Gentleman laughed. He was like Job in one respect—he laughed at the vows he had made, he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would not say in love, but in politics. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had no more solemn expression than a smile for the Bill he had brought in. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would make the prosecution dependent on the initiation of the Lord Lieutenant, as the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had consented to do in the case of the huts, it would meet the objections of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL would put it to hon. Members opposite whether it was worth while to press on the Amendment, which would have the effect of stultifying the clause? He would suggest to the Home Secretary that in the matter of the initiative he could adopt a much better model than the English model—namely, the Scotch model. They had a much more complete system of jurisprudence in Scotland than they had in England. In Scotland the Lord Advocate and his subordinates controlled prosecutions, for though they might be initiated by private individuals, they could not be initiated without the sanction of the Lord Lieutenant or the heads of the Criminal Department.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he wished to know whether, in working this Act, the Government would take account of intimidation practised on the Irish people by the police and the landlords? These had been the real terrorists they had had in Ireland for many a long year. They had heard a great deal to-night about intimidation; but only one view of the case was taken; only one side of the question was looked at. Could any hon. Member in the House deny that intimidation of a most cruel and serious kind had been practised, and was being practised with impunity, against the Irish tenants by the Irish landlords, the bailiffs, the agents, and the police? Why, the fact was that in many towns and villages in Ireland no young men dared to walk abroad two or three together without being followed by policemen and intimidated or cautioned. Policemen listened at their windows at night. [A laugh.] Yes; he had good reason to say this. [Renewed laughter.] He had very good, sufficient, reliable authority for saying that policemen went and watched and listened outside the windows of law-abiding people at all hours of the night, and that they intimidated people in every way they could morning, noon, and night. As to the Irish landlords, had they not been intimidating the Irish tenants, preventing them from doing what they had a legal right to do? Had they not intimidated the Irish tenants, compelling them to do that which they had a legal right to refuse to do if they chose? It was because the landlords had been intimidating the Irish tenants that they had in Ireland and in America to-day thousands, yes, and millions of Irishmen, sworn enemies to Irish landlordism.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not within his right in referring to such intimidation, which is not in the Amendment before the Committee. The Amendment is to insert the words—

“Shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have been aggrieved, to have.”

It does not in any way define intimidation.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he hoped the tenants of Ireland would take care that this Act should not be a one-edged, but a two-edged sword, and that they would avail themselves of the so-called protection of this law against the intimidation practised on them by their landlords. If they did that, hon. Gentlemen in this House and their friends outside it would, perhaps, be sorry they had taken such pains to forge this weapon in the House of Commons.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he looked with grave apprehension upon the probability of what this new and stringent law might bring about. He should like to see some provision adopted that would save the people from the arbitrary action of policemen and magistrates. It had been suggested that the operation of this new law should be placed under the control of the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and with great respect to the late and the present Chief Secretaries, and with perfect confidence in their personal justice, he would say that their control would only be a nominal one, and that the Act would be open to very serious abuse, because he knew, as a matter of fact, that the ultimate decision as to prosecutions would be left to the Resident Magistrates, not the ordinary magistrates, but those special magistrates who had been appointed to meet the present emergency in Ireland. He knew the feeling of the country was that this would lead to a great deal of abuse. There was another authority which should be placed in control of the operation of the Act, and that was something analogous to the authority suggested by the hon. Member who had spoken last but one (Sir George Campbell). Some control should be left with the Attorney General for Ireland, and an Amendment to effect that object would, he thought, meet the emergency. The punishment for this—he would not call it a new crime, but, at least, a crime which was to be tried under very new circumstances—would be very heavy, and the jurisdiction would be very summary. He trusted that the prosecutions would not be numerous; and he did not think it was too much to ask that before this machinery was put in motion, the authority of the Law Officer of the Crown should be obtained.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, they were discussing matters which were really not germane to the Amendment. The object of the clause was to define the nature of the offence—to point out what the offence of intimidation was to be; and the Act by no means left it indefinite as to who was to put it in motion. There was a clause which expressly provided how the Act was to be set in motion, and who was to be the prosecutor; and yet they had been discussing the measure all the evening on the assumption that there was nothing whatever in it to provide for putting it in operation. He agreed that wherever the intimidation came from, whether from the landlord or tenant, it was equally reprehensible, and ought to be equally punished under the provisions of this Act; but the question was, who was to put it in motion? They were discussing all this on the definition of what the offence was to be; and if they looked at page 9, Part IV., they would see who was to put it in motion, and that the prosecution was to be in a certain definite way. It seemed to him that when they came to page 9, would be the time for them to consider this subject. He did not say whether it was right or wrong; but if it was right that the Motion of the hon. Member for Wexford should be adopted, the time to bring it forward, in some shape or other, would be when they came to Part IV., which dealt with the machinery for working the Act and the punishment for intimidation. He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) that they were now discussing what the definition of intimidation was to be.

MR. MACARTNEY said, the hon. Member who had just sat down seemed to forget that the proposal made by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) was to substitute for words in the Bill, the words—

"Shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have been aggrieved, to have."

If these words were introduced now, they could not discuss, at a later stage, who were to be the persons to make the complaint, because the matter would have been settled; and it was, therefore, clear that what they were now discussing was not the definition of the crime, but the person who was to put the Act in motion. He, however, had only risen for the purpose of saying this—that that much-abused body, the Irish magistrates, found it necessary very often, when severe assaults had been committed in their neighbourhoods, and when the injured persons would not bring forward complaints, to get the police to go to those persons and ascertain why they did not prosecute. The answer generally given was, "I am afraid;" or "I dare not do it." The magistrates then gave instructions to the policeman to go to the Sub-Inspector, and he instituted a prosecution in the name of the Crown, and summoned witnesses who were present at the assault. This was an excellent system allowed by Common Law. In this way cases were very often brought before the magistrates, with the result that not only one side, but both sides, were punished. Sometimes these assaults were of such a character that the person assaulted was brought to the brink of the grave. As the Sub-Inspector, then, was allowed to initiate prosecutions under the existing law, it seemed to him that it would not be such an anomalous thing to introduce it into the present Act.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the hon. Member had given good reason why they should go on with the discussion. He had explained that the Irish magistrate was not a person under intimidation, and that he could set the law in motion—that was to say, he could suggest to a constable to go round and see, when an assault had taken place, who had been intimidated, and whether he could not persuade someone that he was the victim of intimidation. There could not be a better argument for showing that when they defined a new offence they should say who was to work it. A new offence must depend on the mechanism by which it could be made to operate and bring persons within the reach of those who were to inflict the punishment.

Mr. Macartney

His contention was, that it was perfectly legitimate, and even essential, when they were creating an offence, to define distinctly by what process it was to be brought under the control of the law. The right hon. and learned Home Secretary had told them that in this clause he had followed the lines of the English Act of 1875. Let him remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman of the conditions under which that measure was prepared. The Act was passed, he might say, roughly speaking, altogether in favour of the working class. It was an Act passed to relieve the working man from legal responsibility for doing certain things which, up to that time, had been held to be illegal. By that Act these things were declared to be legitimate. A great variety of combination which the working man had entered into, and which the law previously held to be illegal, was held to be legal, and he was relieved from punishment for doing certain things for which, before that time, he was liable to be punished. But the present Bill was one which was altogether against the class who, in Ireland, represented the class in England in whose interests the Workmen's Act of 1875 was passed. This was to be an Act against, and not in favour of, the Irish tenants. It imposed new penalties upon that class, and invented new crimes of which they could be guilty. In the former case it was easy enough to see why there was no occasion to distinguish, first of all, by what means the Act was to be brought into operation. The class who were suffering a grievance were relieved from that grievance, so that they would not be likely again to employ those weapons of so-called intimidation, by which they had compelled Parliament to attend to their claims and relieve them of their grievance. But, by the present legislation, they were inflicting new grievances upon a class aggrieved already; and it was only fair and just, even from the example of the English legislation, that they should define the machinery by which the new penalties were to be brought to bear on the people.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he quite admitted that there was more in the opposition of the Home Secretary to this Amendment than there had been in his opposition to some of the previous Amendments; but, at the same time, he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite had made out a strong case, if not in favour of this Amendment, at any rate in favour of an Amendment of a similar kind. Ireland, it must be remembered, was peculiarly situated. It was not England. In Ireland the landlords had long confederated together against the tenants, and they had a Resident Magistracy in the country, who had to decide on these cases, who were in many ways allied to the landlord class. What hon. Gentlemen feared was that there would be some species of unholy alliance between the landlords and Resident Magistrates; that persons would be brought up for intimidating; that the landlords would give evidence against them, and that the magistrates would condemn on that evidence. They knew perfectly well that many of the people who were put in prison by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland—though, no doubt, the right hon. Gentleman believed they had been guilty of intimidation—were held by the present Heads of the Irish Executive and the Government not to have been guilty of the offences for which they had been put into gaol on suspicion. Fully one-third of those the late Chief Secretary for Ireland thought ought to remain in prison had been let out by the present Chief Secretary for Ireland; and amongst the number, he took it, were a good many who had been put in on a charge of intimidation. As he had said, he admitted there was some point in what had fallen from the Home Secretary. It was rather an absurdity to suppose that if A intimidated B, C should come forward and complain; still there might be some wretched, timid creatures in Ireland who were absolutely afraid to complain of intimidation practised upon them. ["No! no!"] Hon. Members said "No!" but he (Mr. Labouchere) was repeating what had been said by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). He had no sympathy with these people; still, if the person was one of so timid a nature, it was necessary that the law should step in. But he was anxious to ask—and many on the Ministerial side of the House were anxious to ask—were they to understand that a person was to be condemned by a Resident Magistrate, on the complaint of a third person, for intimidation, without the person who had been intimidated coming forward as a witness, and the person who was said to have intimidated having an opportunity of cross-examining the man he was accused of having injured? That was what he wanted to arrive at; and if the Home Secretary did not intend to accept this proposal, if he did not intend to take the view that he (Mr. Labouchere) had stated, he might accept the Amendment before the Committee—that was to say, provide in the Bill that in every case where there should have been a conviction, the person supposed to have been intimidated should have been called as a witness, to give the prisoner or his legal adviser an opportunity of examining him.

MR. GIBSON said, he was not surprised that a good deal of attention had been directed to this clause, because, unquestionably, it might be one of the most important clauses in the Bill, and it dealt with one of the most important incidents to be found in the present condition of Ireland. He supposed that no one, at this time of day, was ignorant of what the offence of "Boycotting" was, or the terrible weapon that it had been found in keeping Ireland in a state of demoralization for a considerable number of months. It was a great deal better that this clause should be discussed with a full knowledge of what it was it purported to deal with. It purported to deal with the most insidious forms of terrorism that had ever been applied to any country, the forms of terrorism that, in many cases, had almost eluded definition, and that must be grappled with, and that must be overcome, if Ireland was to be restored to a state of quiet and peace; and if any attempt were made to cut down the efficiency of the clause, no matter on what specious pretext it might be put, it was really an attempt to leave Ireland in its present state of disturbance, and, he ventured to believe, it would not deceive any sane person in the community. The Committee would not have forgotten what had occurred within the past few days. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had pointed out that he would not condemn "Boycotting;" and even the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—who tried, it seemed, without direct authority, to explain that remarkable speech of the hon. Member for Tipperary—in cautious and measured language had said he would only condemn "Boycotting" when it was not applied to cases of unjust eviction. So that it would be seen they were dealing with the most dangerous and difficult forms of terrorism, which had had such a hold upon the minds of the people, and upon the minds of those who led the people, that it was difficult to get from them a clear, distinct, and open definition of them. Now, this Amendment was the first attempt that had been made to fritter away the clause, and to hamper it with conditions that would make it difficult, if not impossible, to work it; and that was the reason he felt it to be his duty, at this stage of the proceedings, at once to point out the meaning which he placed on the Amendment, and to express the hope that in this and the other Amendments, which were sometimes more insidious and sometimes less, the Committee would not lend themselves to hon. Members who—to use a common expression—sought to "drive a coach and four" through the salient provisions of this Bill. The Amendment before the Committee was one which proposed that no prosecution for intimidation should be initiated unless the person who was intimidated came forward. The mere statement of it showed that it was intended to kill the clause. Well, the person who came forward to defend it was the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), who spoke the other night in such a remarkable manner, not only in support of "Boycotting," but in denunciation of hon. Members who had previously expressed some disapproval of "Boycotting." The hon. Member for Tipperary had said that a person who was afraid to come forward and complain of intimidation was unworthy to be protected, or some such thing as that. In plain English, what was the meaning of that? That a person who had been treated in society as a leper, who had been ostracized and shunned in every way, and did not shake off his terrorism—which, he ventured to say, even a courageous man would feel a little of if he were resident in Ireland under the present conditions—if such a person did not shake off his terrorism, go into Court and give evidence against the accused, and then go back to the same atmosphere of terrorism, there was to be no prosecution. Surely it was obvious that an Amendment of this kind, if it were intended or not, would have the effect of thoroughly and entirely destroying the clause; therefore, he hoped that in this, as in the other Amendments that might be proposed to this particular clause, the Committee would take care that this terrorism, coupled with the "Boycotting" with which they were all familiar, would receive a blow from which it would never recover.

DR. COMMINS said, that, unless the Committee exercised great care in amending it, this clause would be made an instrument of most grievous oppression. The section created no new offence and defined no new offence, and hon. Members who, in the course of the discussion on it, had said so had been wide of the mark, and had not had a proper appreciation of it. The offence that it proposed to deal with existed already, and against it a number of Statutes had been passed in this country. In the Act of 1871 considerable pains were taken to define the offence, and the opinion the country had of its provisions and of the almost revolting operations of the whole Statute were such that it was repealed in four years. In 1875 another attempt was made, and the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, which also defined the offence of intimidation, was passed, and pointed out what the prosecutions were to be. He must say he thought the Home Secretary had failed to refresh his memory by referring to that Act, or he would not have compared its provisions with those of the present Bill. The Act of 1875 provided that, whenever a charge of this kind was made against a person, and where the result of the charge might be a fine of £20, or one month's imprisonment, then the person accused might elect to be tried by a jury, and might refuse to submit himself to the jurisdiction of even the very excellent, impartial, and exemplary stipendiary magistrates, who mostly had to try offences of this sort in England. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was very wide of the mark in assuming that this Bill did nothing more in the case of Ireland than the Conspiracy Act of 1875 did for England. But there was this difference between the Act of 1875 and the present proposal of the Government. The Act of 1875 was only put in motion in the large municipal towns of the country, such as Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds. Now, in every case where the attempt was made to apply the Act to one of these large towns, the matter had to be submitted to a Watch Committee, before whom all charges were brought by the police before a summons was applied for, the evidence being in all cases thoroughly examined by the Watch Committee. But there was no such thing as a Watch Committee in Ireland, and the police could put this Act in operation by themselves. And, again, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) might have given a different description of the state of affairs in Scotland in matters of this kind. In all towns in Scotland there was a Procurator Fiscal, and every complaint, before a summons was issued, passed under the hand of that official, when, if it was found that the charge was a credible one, and rested upon respectable testimony, application was made to the Court because it was supposed that a conviction might reasonably be expected. But in Ireland there was no protection of this kind. The parties there would simply be worried to death by the manner in which this Bill would be worked. There had been many instances in Ireland tending to show how Acts of this kind might be used for the purposes of the most atrocious oppression. As an instance of this, he reminded the Committee of the manner in which a charge of intimidation had been brought against persons who were subsequently imprisoned for collecting money on behalf of the Land League. In the case to which he referred, the party supposed to be intimidated swore that no intimidation had been practised upon them, and that they had subscribed their money willingly. Now, unless some means were taken to prevent charges being made by the police, in spite of the evidence of the party supposed to be intimidated that no such offence had been committed at all, the people would be simply at the mercy of informers and busybodies. There was no check whatever proposed in this Bill upon any of the prosecutions which might be instituted under its operations; there was nothing to prevent the Act being made an instrument of oppression, and, in the default of some such measures in the Act, he felt it his duty to vote for the Amendment of his hon. Friend, notwithstanding that the Amendment made some slight innovation upon the existing law of the country. Undoubtedly the law of the country was, as the Attorney General had stated, that any person might be imprisoned for breach of the peace; but this Act was altogether an innovation on the law of the country. It was, moreover, an innovation in the wrong direction, which could not but result to the people of Ireland in further trouble and vexation.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) suggested that the best course to pursue would be that the directory and management of this Bill should be left to the Attorney General for Ireland. An exemplification of the absolute necessity for the Proviso which was before the Committee had occurred in his own county not long ago. A person went to a spot to take a photograph of a Land League hut constructed for an evicted tenant; a policeman came up to the place, probably hoping to be included in the group standing around. He approached too near the photographic apparatus, and was told that he had better take care, as there might be dynamite about. The policeman was not alarmed, or in any way intimidated; but on the 26th May the gentleman in charge of the photographic apparatus was arrested, during the sitting of the Petty Sessions at Dundalk, and brought before the magistrates; and the stipendiary magistrate, on hearing the evidence, directed that he should be sent to prison without bail. He presumed the case had come before the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, because the Crown Prosecutor was sent down to prosecute this unfortunate photographer for alluding even to dynamite. He had a report of the case in his hand, from which it appeared that the policeman swore he was not afraid; he was asked why he had not made a complaint, and he said he had no complaint to make. The complaint here was not the complaint of the policeman, it was the complaint of a Sub-Inspector; the same man who, the other day at the sessions, called a certain farmer a blackguard, and added, afterwards, that if a man had called him one, he would have put him into the mill-pond. This Sub-Inspector brought up the gentleman to whom he had referred, and charged him with having used language calculated to intimidate. Hon. Members would understand from this the way in which the Bill would be used in Ireland. As he had said before, the policeman was not frightened; he made no complaint; but on the 26th May his superior officer complained, and a State prosecution followed for using intimidating language. But he (Mr. Callan) pointed out that the only intimidation which had been used in this case had been exercised over the magistrates by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, who sent down his Crown Prosecutor. He hoped that his hon. Friend would proceed to a division on his Amendment, in which case he should feel it his duty to support him.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, that this Amendment had been opposed on the ground that it constituted a very serious innovation and an entire departure from the ordinary law. But he replied that the whole Bill was a serious innovation and departure in this sense—inasmuch as it created a number of new offences, and made things which were formerly not offences at all, crimes, to which penalties of the most serious kinds were attached. As he repeated, it was a most complete departure from the law of the country. For instance, it was no actual crime in this country to make use of any verbal threat to kill or murder, and it was not an actual crime to write a threat of killing; but by this Bill it was made a crime to threaten by looks, acts, or words. The remedy in this country for intimidation, by means of verbal threats to murder, was merely the binding over of the person to good behaviour and the keeping of the peace. But, then, when that took place, it was necessary that the person who had been intimidated should himself come forward and swear the information on which the recognizances were required. What was done in England, he and his hon. Colleagues asked might be done in Ireland. They could not conceive a more serious innovation of the law than that which was proposed by the present Bill; and the Amendment of his hon. Friend simply went to the extent of providing that the Government should at least preserve so much of the law in Ireland as existed at the present time in England, in respect of proceedings of the kind. The hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. A. Dickson) had pointed out, with great truth, that it was no uncommon thing in Ireland, that a man who, unhappily for his country, occupied a seat on the Judicial Bench, should both instigate proceedings and sentence the individual afterwards. That was done in Ireland at the present time; and Irish Members therefore asked that the person alleged to be intimidated should come forward in open Court and state the facts. It was not enough in this country that the person should say he was intimidated, because it was for the Court to judge whether the alleged intimidation was sufficient in that particular instance to affect a person of ordinary firmness and strength of mind. If it was not shown that the alleged intimidation was insufficient to disturb the peace of an individual of ordinary strength of character, the Court would then decide in favour of the complainant. But here, in this Act, the police were to be allowed to come forward and say that a man had looked or spoken a word which, in the terms of the Act, would amount to intimidation. Now, it was very difficult to say in what intimidation consisted, because that which appeared to one person to be intimidation might, in reality, be nothing more than salutary advice. It was almost impossible for anyone except the persons threatened in these cases to state, with anything like certainty, whether intimidation was intended or advice. Therefore, it appeared to him that nothing could be more moderate than the proposal of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), that the person alleged to be intimidated should come forward. The reply of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General showed not only how these matters would be settled in Ireland, but also how oblivious he was to the law as it at present existed in this country.

Mr. Callan

MR. HEALY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had made an extraordinary admission in saying that the Government would be quite ready to apply to Ireland the same law which existed in England. Now, if that were the case, Irish Members were quite willing to meet the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Under the Workmen's Act, anyone who was desirous was entitled to be tried by jury. In that sense the right hon. and learned Gentleman might be well assured that they would be ready to agree with him in applying the same law to the two countries. It was said, "You could not have complaint made on the prosecutor's application, because the prosecutor himself was liable to intimidation." But, he asked, would there not be as much intimidation against the man who came forward and gave evidence as the man who prosecuted? But the Government must have evidence in some way or other; and unless the policeman was going to swear that he himself had been intimidated, he did not see that evidence could go before the Court. According to the theory of the Government, a man could not prosecute because he was going to be intimidated—ergo, a man could not give evidence because he would be intimidated. A witness who was intimidated might not come forward, and if he came forward he could not be said to be intimidated. He trusted the Government would give some further information on this point, and be induced to abandon for a time their masterly policy of silence. Unless some information was forthcoming, he might feel it his duty to take another step.

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was one of the characteristics of intimidation that the person intimidated was unwilling to come forward and state the fact. He had in his hand a considerable budget of cases of intimidation, from which he would make one or two selections. The first was a case of intimidation of a gentleman, which began in August, 1881, and constituted a typical case of intimidation by means of "Boycotting." In his case, no person, save two or three permanent labourers, could be got to work for him; persons were warned not to work for him; he had great difficulty in getting his stacks in, and patrols had to be kept constantly about the place. In this case a notice was put upon the 7th of August at the chapel gates, calling on every person to "Boycott" him, and warning persons not to deal with him or work for him. Now if the police, or any private person, saw this notice being posted, and identified the persons who posted it, that, of course, could be used as evidence, without resorting to the evidence of the person intimidated. In the next case of "Boycotting," a manuscript notice was posted up in the town and in the vicinity; in some cases there was a manifesto issued; and in another a bellman was sent round to say that a man was not to be dealt with, or his goods bought. Here, also, if you could get the bellman to come forward, you would have clear evidence without resorting to the person intimidated.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought it was quite clear that the notices the right hon. Gentleman had described would come under the category of illegal notices, and could be dealt with fairly by the ordinary law of Ireland. He did not object to special cases of intimidation being forbidden and punishable by law; but he wanted to know what such acts were. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say such and such acts were what the Government objected to; but they were not in the clause. Certainly it was a common thing, and an act of intimidation, to send a bellman into a town or village to call upon the people to "Boycott" a certain person; and he did not desire, but should reprobate, that practice. If such things had happened during the last six months, it was because Constitutional agitation had been put an end to, and people had been driven to put up illegal notices, and to resort to other practices that were illegal. He did not defend those practices, for they were clearly illegal, and he should be perfectly willing to give the Government power to punish men for such acts; but this clause went much further than that. A short time ago two tradesmen in Mil-town Malbay refused to supply a certain man with goods, and Mr. Clifford Lloyd, regarding that as intimidation, gave them so many days within which to supply that man, on penalty of being arrested under the Coercion Act. It was in reference to constructive intimidation of this kind, which was not defined in the Bill, that he objected to give the Government powers. He and his hon. Friends were quite willing to see the Government exercise their ingenuity to define the kinds of intimidation against which they wished to guard; but those acts should be put in the Bill, as in the case of the Conspiracy Act, and then much of their preliminary objection would be removed, and it would not be necessary to insist on the insertion of safeguards such as that moved by the hon. Member. Intimidation was defined in the Act of 1875, but not in this Bill, where it was left entirely vague and open.

[Fifth Night.]

MR. FIRTH said, he did not think the question discussed by the hon. Member quite arose upon this Amendment; but with respect to this Amendment, he thought, in three-fourths of the cases that occurred, the complaint of the person aggrieved ought to be given. That would not, however, be necessary in the remaining fourth.

MR. O'SHEA said, he did not think a more outrageous exercise of despotic power had recently occurred in Ireland than that referred to by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) at Miltown Malbay. The shopkeepers in that town were called together by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and told that unless they sold goods to a certain person in the neighbourhood, within three days they would be sent to gaol; and they were not licensed victuallers, who, under their licences, might have been brought under the operation of the law by Mr. Clifford Lloyd or any other magistrate, but ordinary tradesmen, several of whom sold bread and flour, and provisions generally. They were unable to sell to the person in question, because they would, by so doing, have lost all their other custom; and they were accordingly sent to Limerick Gaol. He (Mr. O'Shea) had done his best at Miltown Malbay—and, he believed, not unsuccessfully—to abolish "Boycotting;" and all the people asked for was that it should be clearly laid down what intimidation was. If that was defined, he was sure the people would keep within the law; but it was impossible to keep peace in a neighbourhood where such illegal action was carried on by Mr. Clifford Lloyd.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he would ask his hon. Friend to withdraw the Amendment, if he thought coercion would be exercised on both sides alike. He had heard of a case in which a policeman had met a respectable lady, named M'Cormack, walking with two other ladies through a town in Limerick, and, without assigning any reason, had ordered her to leave the town at once. He was not aware of any Statute which empowered a policeman to act in that way, and such an act was intimidation of the strongest kind. Would the Government prosecute that constable, or any other constable who acted in such a way? He feared the prosecutions would be one-sided, and, therefore, he should support the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the point made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a reasonable one; but his Amendment did not deal with that. As the hon. and learned Member for Chelsea (Mr. Firth) had said, that Amendment dealt with a three-fourths majority; and if the Government would bring up an Amendment in that direction, he would be quite willing to make a concession, and withdraw this Amendment. It was not desirable to allude to oneself; but he was arrested by a magistrate, who had got up a case against him, and sent for trial on a charge of intimidation. Yet the man who swore the information against him had also stated that he did it at the request of the Resident Magistrate, but said he was not intimidated. He wished to prevent "fishing" cases being got up; and he would like to know whether the Government would meet him upon that point? The Government might have power to deal with threatening letters; but that was a different thing from the powers to be given under this clause. In one town, a year and a-half ago, the magistrates summoned certain people for collecting money for the "Parnell Defence Fund." Those people were arrested, and charged with intimidating the shopkeepers. The shopkeepers swore they were not intimidated; but the magistrates fined the accused £10 or £20 a-piece. When that decision, however, came before the Quarter Sessions it was quashed on appeal; but that was very poor satisfaction for the shopkeepers, many of whom could not provide the fine. Such cases it was that the Irish Members wished to prevent. As they were willing to meet the Home Secretary as to the cases he brought forward, they hoped he would meet them upon their cases.

Question put, "That the words 'shall be proved, on the complaint of the person or persons alleged to have aggrieved, to have,' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 27; Noes 219: Majority 192.—(Div. List, No. 114.)

MR. DILLON, in moving to insert, in page 3, line 13, after "uses," the words

Mr. Parnell

"in a proclaimed district, and after such district has been proclaimed," said, that Clause 20 of this Bill provided that—

"The Lord Lieutenant, by and with the advice of the Privy Council in Ireland, may from time to time, when it appears to him necessary for the prevention of crime and outrage, by proclamation declare the provisions of this Act which relate to proclaimed districts or any of those provisions to be in force within any specified part of Ireland."

But there was very great vagueness in the Act as to what were the provisions of the Act, and whether those now being discussed would apply to the whole of Ireland or only to portions; and he proposed to insert these words, so that those portions of the Bill creating new offences should not apply to any part of Ireland where the crime was not of such a character as to require proclaiming. He did not suppose any hon. Member would pretend that every portion of Ireland was in such a state of disorder as to require exceptional legislation; and he thought even the Chief Secretary would admit that the vastly greater part of Ireland had been as peaceable and free from outrage as any part in England. Those districts in which disorder prevailed were the districts heard of; but there were enormous districts where there had been no outrages. It would be monstrous to say that large districts where no outrages had been committed, and no organized intimidation had been carried on or even alleged, should be brought within this Act; and he saw no reason why the question of proclaiming districts should not be left to the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant. There was one other point. The present Coercion Act contained an obnoxious provision—which was largely used and created bitter feelings among the people—and that was the retrospective provision, under which men could be proceeded against for things done before the proclamation was issued. That was a new feature in Acts of this kind; and it was very invidious and improper to make a man subject to a law when he could not know what was an offence. With these views, he moved this Amendment to provide that an offence must have been committed after the district had been proclaimed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 13, after the word "uses," insert "within a proclaimed district, but after such district has been proclaimed." — (Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that under the Amendment it would be necessary to proclaim the whole of Ireland. If Ireland were proclaimed, a number of other and severer clauses would be called into general operation; whereas now they were confined to the proclaimed districts. He did not see what hardship there was in making a general law that people should not intimidate others. Intimidation which existed in the manufacturing districts of England had made it necessary to pass a law for its suppression, and that law had been made general to the whole country.

MR. HEALY said, it was proposed to appoint special magistrates to administer this Act. If it was the intention of the Government to appoint special magistrates all over Ireland, was not that exactly the thing which the right hon. and learned Gentleman deprecated? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said, in answer to a question put to him, that it was intended to appoint special magistrates all over Ireland, including Ulster.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the promise which he gave was that technically so-called special magistrates would be appointed to sit in the Summary Jurisdiction Courts; and then he went on to say, alluding to a passage in Lord Spencer's letter, in which His Excellency promised that a magistrate who had acted in getting up the case should not sit in judgment on it in the Summary Jurisdiction Court, that it was believed by the authorities that the present staff of Resident Magistrates would be adequate to deal with all the cases under the Act.

MR. DILLON said, he would not proceed with the question then. He, however, considered it of such consequence, on account of the declaration made by the Home Secretary, that he would bring it up again on Report. He hoped the Government would, between this and Report, consider seriously whether they could not make a concession in the direction of the Amendment. The Home Secretary had declared that the whole of Ireland was in such a condition that this law against organized intimidation was absolutely necessary. The point raised by the Amendment could not be adequately discussed in the short time at their disposal now. Therefore, he asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

[Fifth Night.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL, in moving, in page 3, to leave out lines 14 and 15, and insert—

“By acts or threats of violence, or injury to person or property, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation,” said, he considered this Amendment of great importance. He had no desire to conceal the real meaning of the Amendment from the Committee; he desired to have it clearly and openly understood what the effect of the Amendment would be, and he equally desired to have it plainly defined what was to be considered intimidation within the clause. He wanted the intention of the Committee to be clearly expressed in language, so that it should not be left to the arbitrament and decision of a particular magistrate as to what should and what should not, merely according to his view, be intimidation. His Amendment was addressed to two objects. Those objects were to limit the extent and application of the new crime of intimidation, as he ventured to call it, and also to have in the clause itself as exhaustive a statement as possible of what intimidation was meant to be in the clause. He could not avoid saying, at the outset, that the clause in its initiatory words was a very extraordinary one. The opening words of the clause were—“Every person who wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation,” and so on. He hoped the framer of the clause, if he were in the House, would inform the Committee what were the cases in which a man could “rightfully, and with legal authority, use intimidation.” He hoped to have some explanation given of what this wrongful and illegal use of intimidation was. Passing by the intention, or “view,” as it was called, of the person—

“To cause any person or persons, either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do,” &c.

The clause went on—“In this Act the expression ‘intimidation’”—and he particularly called the attention of the Committee to the next words—“the expression ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken or act done,” &c.; “includes” thereby implying that this was not an exhaustive explanation; “includes” all the things which followed that word. It was left, therefore, practically to the imagination of the particular magistrate who was to administer the law to say what should and what should not be considered intimidation. Recollecting that intimidation was to be made a new crime, it surely could not be the wish of the Committee that the Bill should be drawn in this imperfect way. Then the Bill went on—

“Includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

That was not considered sufficient; but beyond and outside those things were to be certain other things such as in the opinion of the magistrate might mean intimidation. It seemed to him important, in discussing the clause, to inquire what was this crime of intimidation, and what was its history, as we had it in our law. Speaking subject to correction, it was only in recent times—he believed it was the Act of 1873 or 1875—[An hon. MEMBER: 1871.] He thanked the hon. Gentleman for the correction. It was the Act of 1871 which first formulated this crime. Up to that time threats were not strictly so called a crime. They came within the purview of the law in this sense, and in this sense only—that if they were uttered under circumstances likely to provoke a breach of the peace, the person against whom they were uttered had the right, for the sake of preserving the peace, to go before a magistrate and have the offending party bound over to keep the peace towards him. Beyond that, until the Statute of 1871 was passed, intimidation was not considered a distinct offence. The Act of 1871 was followed by the Conspiracy Act of 1875, under which particular acts of intimidation could be dealt with. Both of those Acts applied to Ireland as well as to England; and he would like to know what part of this new enactment was required by the case of Ireland that was not covered by the general law of the two countries found in the Statute of 1875? The Amendment that he proposed would, perhaps, bring out more clearly and more particularly what he desired to convey to the Committee. He proposed that there should be omitted altogether lines 14 and 15; that was to say, the words—

Mr. Dillon

“Wrongfully and without legal authority uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation.”

And he also proposed to omit the whole of the last paragraph of the clause—namely,

“In this Act the expression ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

The clause would then run thus—

“Every person who by acts or threats of violence, or injury to person or property” —which, of course, would include a threat of injury to a man’s wife and family—

“Uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation.”

He maintained that those words were clear, intelligible, not contrary to any existing law, and they were adequate to the case. It would be said they were not; and his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who had taken the offence of “Boycotting” under his special protection, would say it would not meet the case of “Boycotting.” [Mr. GIBSON: Hear, hear!] He expected the right hon. and learned Gentleman to say so, and he (Mr. Charles Russell) would speak with candour too. What were the cases of “Boycotting” that the Government meant to deal with under this clause? Were they cases of individual “Boycotting,” or were they cases of “Boycotting” carried on in concert by several persons and amounting to a conspiracy at Common Law? If the Government had in their mind, in framing this clause, “Boycotting” carried on in concert to injure a particular individual, which would amount, at Common Law, to a conspiracy, they would find the clause would not touch such cases; and if the clause was directed at individual cases of “Boycotting,” it would create an offence unknown to the law at the present moment. It was to that point he wished to direct the attention of the Committee; and he hoped that the Committee, whether they agreed with him or not, would at least understand that he did not desire to blink the question. Did the Committee desire that there should be created the new offence of “Boycotting” by individuals, and that that new offence should be made a crime under this Bill? [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Yes.] The hon. Member for North Warwickshire gave an emphatic assent to the proposition that individual “Boycotting” should be a crime under the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he only affirmed that an individual might be a representative.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL, continuing, asked what was “Boycotting,” as it was generally described? There were two kinds of “Boycotting,” as one might easily see. There might be individual “Boycotting.” For instance, a man might say to another—“If you do or do not do a particular thing, I will not deal with you; I will not speak to you; I will not recognize you.” That was what might be rightly and fairly described as individual “Boycotting.” Was that to be made a crime? If so, it would certainly be, of all the novel things that this Act proposed to introduce, the most novel. On what principle, when dealing with the acts of individuals—and he hoped the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) would recollect he was speaking of the acts of individuals—could they, by Statute, declare it to be an offence for one man to say to another—“If you do or do not do a certain thing, I will not deal with you; I will not consort with you; I will not be on terms with you; I will not employ you or any of your family?” There was no trace of any such offence in any of the Law Books; there was no such moral offence existing in the purview of the law. But then it was said there were other kinds of “Boycotting.” He was not defending “Boycotting” in detail or in general. He was arguing the question as a lawyer, desiring to see crime put down. Individual “Boycotting” ought not to be included within the purview of the Bill. Those acts of “Boycotting” which received their sanction in threats of violence against any person, or any member of his family, or anyone in his employ, he admitted, should be covered by the Bill; and he submitted they would be covered by the Amendment he now proposed. How about other kinds of “Boycotting”—

[Fifth Night.]

MR. TREVELYAN said, the date was September 27th, 1881. Then, another most necessary condition of "Boycotting" to bear in mind was its close connection with terrorism. It was impossible to separate the system of "Boycotting," properly so called, from terrorism. In one case, a bailiff and under agent was "Boycotted," because he was supposed to have recommended the eviction of a man who owed several years' rent and would not pay. The "Boycotting" was commenced in August, 1881, and, in order to effect it, a well-known ruffian in the vicinity went about actively engaged in intimidating the persons who had been working for that man.

MR. HEALY: Why was he not arrested under the Protection Act? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would read three or four instances to the Committee from the Government Return, which would show how inextricably this system of "Boycotting" was mixed up with the grosser forms of terrorism, and how impossible it was to separate them. Shots were fired into a house, and the inmates were warned not to deal with a shopkeeper who had been "Boycotted" because he had paid his rent. A threatening notice was posted on a man's door for having taken conacre on the landlord's farm. In the county of Clare shots were fired into the house of a farmer, who had in his employment a workman whose mother acted as laundress to a "Boycotted" smith. He could give various other instances from the Papers before the House, in which outrages had been committed to support the system of "Boycotting," and where that system had been directed against men's businesses and means of living. The extreme cruelty inflicted by the system could be illustrated from every class of life. A blacksmith became thoroughly "Boycotted;" although doing a very good business before, and earning 30s. a-week, he was soon reduced to penury and sickness, and even the medical officer who attended him incurred great unpopularity for doing so. That cruel system was pursued very far indeed. He would mention a case, which had often been referred to as one of hardship inflicted by the authorities—the case of Mrs. Maroney, of Miltown Malbay. She was "Boycotted," she was intimidated by threatening letters, her servants were similarly intimidated and compelled to leave her; while a manservant, an old man named Simmonds, 77 years of age, was shot dead by his own fireside because he refused to leave her. He would not occupy any more of the time of the Committee by reading cases which proved how inextricably "Boycotting" was connected with loss of business and means of living. "Boycotting," which was, in his opinion, so marked in every respect by the result attending every other class of outrage and intimidation, was mixed up with those grosser forms of outrage that everyone recollected, and that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had not lost sight of. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member, he looked upon it with great suspicion, because he could not but think that it laid itself open to the same difficulty that they experienced in connection with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford. He did not think it was easy to bring home cases of intimidation without assistance from the intimidated person, which that person was so often unwilling to give. He would give an instance, which might have been adduced against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), which would show to hon. Members the conclusion which attended so many of these cases of "Boycotting," and the reason why considerable power should be put into the hands of the magistrates, to draw conclusions from the facts before them as to whether intimidation was practised or not. Some years ago, a man named Geelan was evicted from Lord Leitrim's property in the County Leitrim. About a year ago a man named Bernard Beirne took the farm formerly occupied by Geelan, and had since been unpopular. On the 8th November, Bernard Rutledge, a farm-servant of Beirne's, was met on the farm by a party of four men, disguised by having their faces blackened, was knocked down, and a spear held to his chest, one of the men threatening him and a fellow-servant of his—not present—and saying that if Beirne did not give up his farm he would be killed. Police protection had since been afforded to Beirne. On the 11th November, the people at the fair of Mohill refused to have any dealings with either Beirne or his son, in the way of buying or selling. On the 25th November, a letter, signed "Bernard Beirne," appeared in The Leitrim Advertiser newspaper, saying that, as he was unable any longer to stand the "Boycotting" to which he had been subjected, he pledged himself to surrender the farm. Beirne had since given up possession of this farm, and the police protection afforded him had been withdrawn. That was an instance of the combination of violent outrage and "Boycotting," or interfering with a man's business or means of living, by which thousands of people had been brought to ruin. In this case and so many others that system was triumphant. The Government were determined that they would only endeavour to administer Ireland on condition that that system should triumph no longer. They were glad to think that the system was only local, and that there were some counties—he might say many counties—which were free from it; but where it existed they were quite determined that they would not put up with it; and, in order that that end might be accomplished, they considered it necessary for the House of Commons to give them power to deal with the subtler and, generally speaking, with the earlier stages of this dreadful malady.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Dillon,)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SETTLED LAND BILL [Lords].

(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

[BILL 120.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to move that the Order for going into Committee on this Bill be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for going into Committee be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he proposed to leave out all the words after the word "discharged" in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire, his proposal being virtually one for the rejection of the Bill. He (Mr. Arthur Arnold) would be very greatly embarrassed, no doubt, if he were putting his opinion on any matter of law against that of the right hon. Gentleman, or of the noble and learned Lord (Earl Cairns), who was the author of the Bill. But the opposition which he offered to the measure was not inconsistent with a great admiration for the masterly skill which had been displayed in its framing, and the power the noble Author of the Bill had shown in dealing with that "tortuous and ungodly jumble," the English law with regard to real property. In the clauses of the Bill there was not a tittle of amendment of the Law of Settlement in regard to land in this country. If it were reasonable to think, as he confessed he had always hoped, that great learning was combined with a strong desire for the welfare and improvement of mankind, what must be the pain with which such a distinguished lawyer as Lord Cairns framed a measure of this sort, in which he made not the slightest effort to reform abuses which, for many years, had been cried out against. In 1859, Lord Cairns, in this House, had spoken against the law as to transfer of land in language quite as strong as he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) could himself have desired to use. And when the late Government were in the waning months of their power, it was proposed to bring in this amongst other Bills. In the last year of Office of Lord Beaconsfield's Government, the Bill now before the House was brought in by them, with a great flourish of trumpets. To put the matter shortly, his objection to the Bill was four-fold. He objected to it—First, because it was not compatible with any comprehensive measure for Land Law Reform, and could not possibly form a part of any effective dealing with the laws relating to the transfer of land, or the law relating to the settlement of land. Secondly, he objected to it, because it came to this House from another House—

MR. MONK said, he rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask whether it was competent for the hon. Member, at this stage, to enter into an argument against the Bill after half-past 12 o'clock?

[Fifth Night.]

MR. SPEAKER: I consider that the Rule with regard to opposed Business does not apply in this particular case, because the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill does not propose to advance it, and, hereafter, the Question that the Speaker do leave the Chair will be put from the Chair in the usual manner. The hon. Member (Mr. Arthur Arnold) proposes to leave out all the words after the word "discharged." I must point out to the House that the Motion before the House consists of two parts. First of all, the House will have to determine the Question whether the Order of the Day shall be discharged; and I presume that the hon. Member would have no objection to that proposition. Then, the second Question put would be "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee," and on that Question the hon. Member would be in Order in voting the negative. If the hon. Member will allow me, I will first put the Question which refers to the Committee being discharged.

Question, "That the Order for going into Committee be discharged," put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he thanked Mr. Speaker for putting him in Order. He would now propose that they should reject the Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee. The second reason why he wished to see the measure thrown out was because it had been sent down to this House from another House, which was composed mainly of tenants for life, for whose benefit, together with other tenants for life, the measure had been composed and devised. The House of Lords told them distinctly that they did not think that settled land required legislation of a more extensive character. He objected, in the third place, to this measure, because, whereas the great need of the country was the liberation of the land, this Bill would certainly provoke a further settlement of landed estates, and would, it was absolutely certain, largely increase the area of land under settlement in this country. And, fourthly.

Mr. Monk

—and he was sorry to interrupt the conversation of hon. Members opposite—he objected to the Bill, because Her Majesty's Government were pledged to introduce a measure dealing in a comprehensive manner with this subject. The present Parliament, he held, was specially charged by the people of this country to deal with the question of Land Law Reform—some said to restrict the practice of settlement—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member appears to be discussing the Bill in detail, although the question before the House is simply that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee. I must point out to the hon. Member that upon a question of this character he is not entitled to discuss the Bill as a whole.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he should be careful to confine himself to the matter before the House. Why he thought the measure should not be referred to a Select Committee was because he believed it would promote the settlement of land, and because the House of Lords told them, by the voice of Lord Cairns, that this was the full measure of their views as to the legislation that was required on the subject. As to his third objection, the area of settled land in the country was now estimated at 50,000,000 acres—

MR. WARTON said, he rose to Order. The hon. Member was now going into the question of the area of land.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the effect of this Bill would be to increase the area of land under settlement. He would only refer to the opinion of a very distinguished authority on this Bill, which would certainly be very much in point, and which, he thought, would decide many hon. Members with regard to it. Sir James Caird said that, under Lord Cairns' Bill, a limited owner would have power to sell—first, in order to pay off debt; and, secondly, to raise money for improvements—

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is not in Order in going into these subjects. On the Question to go into Committee on the Bill, or on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, the hon. Member would be in Order; but he is not in Order in going into these matters on the Question that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, resuming, said, then he would only say that he objected to the measure, because this Bill could form no part whatever of any comprehensive measure for dealing with the subject with which it professed to deal, because it would tend to increase the area of settled land and hinder the progress of reform by producing some satisfaction among the limited and powerful class of tenants for life; because it tended to confirm and perpetuate the public evil of settlement. He asked the House to reject the proposal for a Select Committee, joining with himself in the hope that Her Majesty's Government would, at the earliest possible date, engage themselves in a comprehensive measure for dealing with the whole of this important subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not wish at that hour to occupy the attention of the House, and having before him the ruling of the Chair, he would not go into details. So far as he had authority to express the views of the Government, they were disposed to give the Bill their careful support, and the best way of giving it consideration was by means of a Select Committee. He could not refrain from saying that they ought to be generous in their way of dealing with the Bill, seeing that it proceeded from those who were the political opponents of the Government, and they could not deal with it in any narrow spirit, accepting the high authority from whom it had emanated. With reference to what had been said, he would only say that he did not endorse the view that they ought to accept no reform unless it was an entire and complete reform. He thought, in the first place, that it would be more prudent if they travelled by degrees, instead of attempting to do that which would shock the feelings of many, by a measure which should be more comprehensive. He thought the step proposed to be taken, to give to tenants for life, and limited owners, power to sell an estate, and so free it from encumbrances, or from being held by persons who could not do justice to the land, was a substantial reform. The step was the more important, and should be gladly accepted as an acknowledgment from those from whom, in the first instance, it would not have been expected to proceed, that they were willing to make great concessions. He felt that on these matters of detail the Bill would be best dealt with by a Select Committee, especially as, he hoped, that Committee would be composed of Members having special knowledge and experience of matters relating to real property. He hoped the Bill would come out of that Committee in a shape that would effect a substantial reform, and as a measure which any sincere reformer would sacrifice personal opinions to obtain.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, as he had a Motion on the Paper for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, he could only express his gratification that the right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to accede to that course, or, perhaps, he had no right to suppose that he had any influence with the right hon. Gentleman; but he was glad the proposal for a Committee had his support. For himself, he gave a general support to the Bill, and, disagreeing with the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), believed it to be a step in the right direction; that it was a measure which, if passed, would give considerable relief to landowners; and, more than that, it would remove several of the more prominent objections rightly made to the system of settlement in this country. It was a Bill that ought to have general support; but, at the same time, it was a Bill as to the details of which most careful consideration was required, because everybody who had taken part in the administration of the Law of Settlement, and had particular acquaintance with a Bill of this character, knew that these details needed to be carefully tested by those acquainted with the workings of these things. It was for this reason, and out of no spirit of hostility to the Bill, he had put down his Motion for a Select Committee. Having said thus much, he would only say that, in supporting the Bill, he considered himself perfectly free, when the hon. Member for Salford, or any other Member, or any Government brought in a measure dealing with the law relating to the settlement of real estate in a comprehensive spirit, or even partially—he considered himself perfectly free to support any measure of the kind. In supporting the present Bill, he did not consider that he or any Member prejudiced himself from dealing with the subject in a larger way. But he felt quite sure of this, that anybody who had tried his hand at legislation of what the hon. Member for Salford called a "more comprehensive character," had felt the extreme difficulty of the undertaking. This he would venture to say, for he had himself tried his hand at it, and had drafted Bills for the purpose, and he had always found the extreme difficulty in his way of in any way abolishing or limiting the power of settling real estate, unless, at the same time, you abolish or limit to the same extent the power of settling personal estate; and, so far as he could judge, he did not think public opinion would sanction or support any measure by which persons would be prevented from making provision for their wives or families on marriage or by will. In that being so was the extreme difficulty; and any conveyancer or lawyer would be able to defeat the best-drawn scheme by charging the real estate, with a sum of money, and settling it, or by vesting the real estates in trustees for sale. But he did not consider that because he was an advocate of a more drastic way of dealing with the subject he was precluded from giving his support to this Bill.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, as the Bill was applicable to Scotland, he hoped that Scotland would be represented on the Committee by Members from both sides of the House. Care was always taken to include Irish Members on every Committee, but Scotland was as often neglected; he, therefore, felt it his duty to say that he should oppose the nomination of any Committee that did not contain a proper proportion of Scotch Members.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he must dissent from the views expressed by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold). The Bill was a very wise and a very safe step in the direction of Land Law Reform, and he was surprised that the House of Lords had passed so sweeping a measure as this was, with respect to the power it proposed to give to tenants for life of settled estates. Though the Bill did not go to the extreme in altering the Law of Settlement, it went, as the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch said, as far as public opinion was prepared to go. When the Bill had gone through the ordeal of a Select Committee, he hoped it might emerge in such a shape that it would pass this Session, and be one of the greatest improvements in the law on the subject that the country had obtained for many years.

MR. MELLOR said, he hoped the Bill would be sent to a Select Committee, and only wished to add to what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch that he was anxious to have a discussion as to the propriety of extending the Bill to the property of intestates. On this subject he had introduced a Bill last Session, but it was blocked, and he had been unable to obtain a discussion, and with the same object he had placed a Notice on the Paper that the Committee be instructed that they have power to extend the Bill to the disposal of land not devised by will, or included in a settlement; and he hoped that if he did not move this Motion to-night another opportunity would be given of raising the question.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was glad to have the views of the Attorney General on this matter. He was not going to say that this was the only reform that could be made, far from it; but he was quite sure that it was a substantial reform, and that it was actually wanted. It would be unwise to object to the passing of a Bill of this kind, because it failed to remedy all the defects in the law on the subject, for it did remove a great many of those blots so often charged against it by owners of land. No doubt the Bill would meet a great many of the difficulties which had to be dealt with, for it would enable the limited owner to act much as the real owner would for the benefit of the estate. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill objected that it did not form a settlement of the question; but it was largely so, and he could not help thinking that when the Bill came into the Committee, of which he hoped the hon. Gentleman would be a Member, it would be found that the reform was a very great one, and ought to be accepted. He agreed with many of the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. H. Davey), as well as those from the Attorney General, and he was quite sure that the Bill would not only enable holders of land who were limited owners to do all that owners in fee ought to do, but it would have this practical effect, that a larger amount of land would be thrown into the market than was the case at the present moment. His hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Colonel Alexander) expressed a desire that Scotch Members should be nominated on the Committee; but the misfortune was that, owing to the peculiar tenure of the land there, this Bill did not apply to Scotland at all, and the hon. and gallant Member would see from the 1st clause that it did not extend to Scotland. It might be wise, perhaps, to extend a similar measure to Scotland; but this Bill did not propose it, and he hoped that that objection would not be pressed. He only hoped the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee at once; that the Committee would sit as soon as possible, and that during the Session the measure might pass. He could only say to the observations of the hon. Member opposite as to the Bill of last Session that if he would again bring it forward he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would do his best, so far as he had any influence, to obtain for it a fair discussion.

Mr. Horace Davey

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he desired to explain that, in his first objection, he had quoted the words used by the present Lord Chancellor himself.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he trusted the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee, and that full opportunity would be given to consider the names of those nominated to serve thereon, because if he did not find among those names that of his Colleague in the representation of Northampton, who had much spare time, and who had a perfect legal right to sit on any Committee of the House, he should add his name to the nominations, and take the sense of the House upon it.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not wish to touch on the last question raised; the hon. Member could take any course he thought proper; but perhaps the proper course now would be to withdraw the Motion actually before the House, and move that the Bill be referred to the same Committee that should be appointed for the Conveyancing Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE rose to Order. Was the Committee to be settled by arrangement between the two Front Benches without the House knowing the names of the Committee? He wished to raise the question of the appointment of his Colleague.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS explained that no Members had yet been appointed. The names would be put down to-night for dealing with both Bills.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, with reference to the suggestion which had been made that the Bill should be extended to Scotland, that no later than yesterday a Bill applicable to Scotland had been introduced in the House of Lords, not only containing conversion clauses similar to those occurring in this Bill, but also provisions for disentailing.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Bill be committed to the Select Committee on the Conveyancing Bill,"—(Sir R. Assheton Cross,)—put, and agreed to.

VAGRANCY BILL.—[BILL 62.]

(Mr. Pell, Mr. John Talbot, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Cropper, Mr. John Holland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Pell.)

MR. DODSON said, he had had some communication with his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) in regard to this Bill. The Government could not accept the Bill in the form in which it stood; but he had suggested to his hon. Friend certain Amendments, and if he would agree to their insertion, the Government would assent to the second reading, with the understanding that the Bill should afterwards be committed pro forma, to receive the Amendments proposed by the Government. It was not necessary to detain the House then with any further observations.

MR. PELL said, he was in hopes that the right hon. Gentleman would, though the hour was late, have mentioned the nature of the changes he proposed should be adopted. They were important; one especially, which touched a principle of the Bill—namely, the removal of the demoralizing distinction the law draws between the class termed tramps and ordinary paupers. In accepting the proposal, he could not do so without observing that he thought they were losing sight of a very mischievous state of things which now existed. We had in our country something like 40,000 or 50,000 persons who, under the invidious term of "tramps" or "vagrants," were treated in a very different way from other destitute persons. In our workhouses as little as possible was given them to maintain life for a few hours; the next morning all the work that could be got out of them was exacted, and then they were dismissed with the certainty that they could not get through the day without some offence against the law; and they passed on to the next workhouse, miserable examples of cruel, impolitic, un-Christian, barbarous treatment. The Government said, if the 4th clause were removed, the Bill could go forward. Now, a great deal had been said about centralization; and over and over again it had been asserted by heads of Departments, and especially by the heads of the Local Government Board, that nothing was more mischievous than the exercise of a centralizing authority. Here, however, in reference to this particular portion of the Bill, while the opinions of Boards of Guardians throughout the country had been taken, and they, after mature deliberation, and on their own experience as local authorities—small, perhaps, but important—were almost unanimous in removing this degrading distinction, the central authority—the Local Government Board—stepped in and set local opinion at naught. There were one or two other matters in which the Government required modifications, though they were not so important as the point to which he had referred; and with the objections to the 6th clause he would not now trouble the House. He was prepared to accept the offer of the Government—thankful for small mercies, and a step in the right direction; and if it was the pleasure of the House, he would ask that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. CROPPER said, he was glad to find that the Local Government Board had accepted the Bill. One important feature in the measure was, that Boards of Guardians would be enabled to detain travelling vagrants for a longer time—a useful provision, that would enable Guardians to exercise some deterring influence over vagrancy. Other portions of the Bill would be best discussed in Committee; and he should be glad to see it passed, in the belief that it would have a good effect throughout the country.

MR. BRYCE said, he regretted that the President of the Local Government Board could not accept the Bill in the form in which it was introduced; but the particular Amendments which the Government proposed to make were matters for discussion in Committee. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire that the Bill was better in its present form than in that to which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to cut it down. But, at the same time, as an instalment, it was valuable; and it was worth while to accept even this modification in the treatment of vagrants. He hoped his hon. Friend would bring in his Bill again next year, and persevere in his attempt until something considerable was done in the direction which the Bill indicated.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, it was the misfortune that there seemed to be no discussion upon anything save that which had relation to Ireland. There was an opportunity for a discussion of this Bill some 14 days ago, on a Wednesday afternoon; but, since then, the condition of things had become intensified, and there was still less prospect of a discussion. In the result, the House was now asked to give assent to the second reading of a Bill on a subject to which many Members, irrespective of political Parties, had given considerable attention, and with which Bill they were not thoroughly acquainted, while, at the same time, they were told the Bill was to be considerably amended, he might almost say emasculated, in Committee. Really, he did not know what the Bill was to which they were asked to give a second reading. Of course, he agreed in the maxim, "that half a loaf was better than no bread;" but he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not give some indication of the alterations he proposed, rather than leave to the hon. Member for South Leicestershire the task of mutilating his own offspring. He, with the faltering voice a parent would naturally adopt under such circumstances, told the House of important changes he was bound to accept in Committee. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) would only now say that he regretted exceedingly that a Bill which seemed to be a moderate and, presumably, an useful alteration of the law,

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, resuming, said, then he would only say that he objected to the measure, because this Bill could form no part whatever of any comprehensive measure for dealing with the subject with which it professed to deal, because it would tend to increase the area of settled land and hinder the progress of reform by producing some satisfaction among the limited and powerful class of tenants for life; because it tended to confirm and perpetuate the public evil of settlement. He asked the House to reject the proposal for a Select Committee, joining with himself in the hope that Her Majesty's Government would, at the earliest possible date, engage themselves in a comprehensive measure for dealing with the whole of this important subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not wish at that hour to occupy the attention of the House, and having before him the ruling of the Chair, he would not go into details. So far as he had authority to express the views of the Government, they were disposed to give the Bill their careful support, and the best way of giving it consideration was by means of a Select Committee. He could not refrain from saying that they ought to be generous in their way of dealing with the Bill, seeing that it proceeded from those who were the political opponents of the Government, and they could not deal with it in any narrow spirit, accepting the high authority from whom it had emanated. With reference to what had been said, he would only say that he did not endorse the view that they ought to accept no reform unless it was an entire and complete reform. He thought, in the first place, that it would be more prudent if they travelled by degrees, instead of attempting to do that which would shock the feelings of many, by a measure which should be more comprehensive. He thought the step proposed to be taken, to give to tenants for life, and limited owners, power to sell an estate, and so free it from encumbrances, or from being held by persons who could not do justice to the land, was a substantial reform. The step was the more important, and should be gladly accepted as an acknowledgment from those from whom, in the first instance, it would not have been expected to proceed, that they were willing to make great concessions. He felt that on these matters of detail the Bill would be best dealt with by a Select Committee, especially as, he hoped, that Committee would be composed of Members having special knowledge and experience of matters relating to real property. He hoped the Bill would come out of that Committee in a shape that would effect a substantial reform, and as a measure which any sincere reformer would sacrifice personal opinions to obtain.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, as he had a Motion on the Paper for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, he could only express his gratification that the right hon. Gentleman had been good enough to accede to that course, or, perhaps, he had no right to suppose that he had any influence with the right hon. Gentleman; but he was glad the proposal for a Committee had his support. For himself, he gave a general support to the Bill, and, disagreeing with the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), believed it to be a step in the right direction; that it was a measure which, if passed, would give considerable relief to landowners; and, more than that, it would remove several of the more prominent objections rightly made to the system of settlement in this country. It was a Bill that ought to have general support; but, at the same time, it was a Bill as to the details of which most careful consideration was required, because everybody who had taken part in the administration of the Law of Settlement, and had particular acquaintance with a Bill of this character, knew that these details needed to be carefully tested by those acquainted with the workings of these things. It was for this reason, and out of no spirit of hostility to the Bill, he had put down his Motion for a Select Committee. Having said thus much, he would only say that, in supporting the Bill, he considered himself perfectly free, when the hon. Member for Salford, or any other Member, or any Government brought in a measure dealing with the law relating to the settlement of real estate in a comprehensive spirit, or even partially—he considered himself perfectly free to support any measure of the kind. In supporting the present Bill, he did not consider that he or any Member prejudiced himself from dealing with the subject in a larger way. But he felt quite sure state of things which now existed. We had in our country something like 40,000 or 50,000 persons who, under the invidious term of "tramps" or "vagrants," were treated in a very different way from other destitute persons. In our workhouses as little as possible was given them to maintain life for a few hours; the next morning all the work that could be got out of them was exacted, and then they were dismissed with the certainty that they could not get through the day without some offence against the law; and they passed on to the next workhouse, miserable examples of cruel, impolitic, un-Christian, barbarous treatment. The Government said, if the 4th clause were removed, the Bill could go forward. Now, a great deal had been said about centralization; and over and over again it had been asserted by heads of Departments, and especially by the heads of the Local Government Board, that nothing was more mischievous than the exercise of a centralizing authority. Here, however, in reference to this particular portion of the Bill, while the opinions of Boards of Guardians throughout the country had been taken, and they, after mature deliberation, and on their own experience as local authorities—small, perhaps, but important—were almost unanimous in removing this degrading distinction, the central authority—the Local Government Board—stepped in and set local opinion at naught. There were one or two other matters in which the Government required modifications, though they were not so important as the point to which he had referred; and with the objections to the 6th clause he would not now trouble the House. He was prepared to accept the offer of the Government—thankful for small mercies, and a step in the right direction; and if it was the pleasure of the House, he would ask that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. CROPPER said, he was glad to find that the Local Government Board had accepted the Bill. One important feature in the measure was, that Boards of Guardians would be enabled to detain travelling vagrants for a longer time—a useful provision, that would enable Guardians to exercise some deterring influence over vagrancy. Other portions of the Bill would be best discussed in Committee; and he should be glad to see it passed, in the belief that it would have a good effect throughout the country.

MR. BRYCE said, he regretted that the President of the Local Government Board could not accept the Bill in the form in which it was introduced; but the particular Amendments which the Government proposed to make were matters for discussion in Committee. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for South Leicestershire that the Bill was better in its present form than in that to which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to cut it down. But, at the same time, as an instalment, it was valuable; and it was worth while to accept even this modification in the treatment of vagrants. He hoped his hon. Friend would bring in his Bill again next year, and persevere in his attempt until something considerable was done in the direction which the Bill indicated.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, it was the misfortune that there seemed to be no discussion upon anything save that which had relation to Ireland. There was an opportunity for a discussion of this Bill some 14 days ago, on a Wednesday afternoon; but, since then, the condition of things had become intensified, and there was still less prospect of a discussion. In the result, the House was now asked to give assent to the second reading of a Bill on a subject to which many Members, irrespective of political Parties, had given considerable attention, and with which Bill they were not thoroughly acquainted, while, at the same time, they were told the Bill was to be considerably amended, he might almost say emasculated, in Committee. Really, he did not know what the Bill was to which they were asked to give a second reading. Of course, he agreed in the maxim, "that half a loaf was better than no bread;" but he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not give some indication of the alterations he proposed, rather than leave to the hon. Member for South Leicestershire the task of mutilating his own offspring. He, with the faltering voice a parent would naturally adopt under such circumstances, told the House of important changes he was bound to accept in Committee. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) would only now say that he regretted exceedingly that a Bill which seemed to be a moderate and, presumably, an useful alteration of the law, should be turned into a mild, he might almost say an inefficient, attempt to deal with a great question. At that hour he would not detain the House beyond saying that he gave his unwilling assent to the second reading of this emasculated Bill, and he hoped that next year a more efficient attempt would be made to deal with the subject.

Mr. Poll

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

COMMONABLE RIGHTS BILL.

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration of Lords Amendments read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Lords Amendments be now considered."

MR. WARTON said, he wished to call attention to the position in which the House stood with regard to this Bill. They had not the Bill as it was printed by the Lords, and they had a Paper of Lords' Amendments, which even in the paging did not correspond with the Bill. He, therefore, objected most strongly that they should be asked to go on with a measure in which they did not even know the effect of the Lords' Amendments they were asked to agree to. He had the greatest respect for the House of Lords—more, perhaps, than was entertained by hon. Members on the other side; but here was the absurd position—the House was asked to leave out something on page 4, and the Bill had no page 4 in it. He begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. BRYCE said, the hon. and learned Member must be under some mistake. He held a copy of the Bill in his hand, and there certainly was a page 4 in it. The Lords' Amendments were simple and short, the Paper contained a sufficient reference to the places where the Amendments came in, and he did not think that any hon. Member, with the Bill and the Paper before him, would have any difficulty in seeing the effect of the Amendments. They were extremely simple, they offered not the least difficulty, and, while they were improvements, they made no considerable alteration in the substance of the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he was under no mistake, and within the last few minutes he had been in the Vote Office. Perhaps the hon. Member had an opportunity of getting a copy of the Bill not open to all. No doubt the hon. Member had a sufficient copy before him; but he (Mr. Warton) had something else, and he repeated that in this something else there was no page 4.

Question put.

The House divided: — Ayes 16; Noes 38: Majority 22. — (Div. List, No. 115.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Page 3, line 6, leave out the word "Enclosure," the first Amendment, read a second time.

MR. WARTON said, he rose to Order. Would the Amendments be read by the Clerk and considered en bloc, or would they be taken separately?

MR. SPEAKER: Each Amendment will be considered by itself. Does the hon. and learned Member object to the Amendment?

MR. WARTON said, he did so. Looking to the reference and then to the Bill, he did not find in line 6, on page 3, the word "enclosure" appearing at all, and he was quite unable to see how they could consider the omission of a word from a line where it had no existence. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) had given an assurance, which, no doubt, could be relied on, that these Amendments were all right; but, right or wrong, he (Mr. Warton) took the course of objecting to proceeding to vote without having proper information as to what they were doing. It was absurd in the face of the country to do such things. How could the word be left out of the line when there was no such word in? He begged leave to object to the Amendment, and would take the sense of the House upon it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

The House proceeded to a Division.

MR. WARTON was appointed one of the Tellers for the Noes, but no Member appearing to be a second Teller, Mr. SPEAKER declared that the Ayes had it.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present, Subsequent Amendments agreed to.

Schedule.

MR. WARTON said, he desired one parting observation. He did not object to the addition of the Schedule, for however imperfect a Bill might be, it must have an end somewhere; but how Amendments could be made on a page 4 that had no existence he did not understand.

Schedule agreed to.

CORN RETURNS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Bill to amend the Law respecting the obtaining of Corn Returns, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. JOHN HOLMS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 193.]

SETTLEMENT AND REMOVAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. DODSON, Bill to amend the Law of Settlement and Removal, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DODSON and Mr. HIBBERT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 194.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 7th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Sixth Night]; Allotments * [90]—R.P.; Interments (Felo de se) * [98]—R.P.

Considered as amended—Tramways Provisional Order * [141]; Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [149].

Third Reading—Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [152]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [150], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS.)

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in the event of the Porte declining to take part in the Conference on Egyptian affairs, the Conference will still be held; and, in case it be not held, whether the English and French Governments will enforce compliance with the terms of their recent joint requisition to the Egyptian Ministry, or, failing the active co-operation of France, Her Majesty's Government will themselves take the necessary military measures to put down the revolutionary movement and restore the status quo in Egypt? The Question appeared in the Paper that day instead of yesterday, in consequence of a clerical error, and if more convenient to the hon. Baronet, he would postpone it till to-morrow.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that before his hon. Friend replied he wished to put a Question to him with reference to a despatch from Sir Edward Malet. The following words were used in the despatch:—

"The first idea which has occurred to us all is that the ex-Khedive, Prince Halim, and the Porte itself are behind the scenes. It is impossible to prove that they are not."

He wished to ask, Whether the Foreign Office were in possession of any information upon that subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I must answer the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) in the negative. I may point out that the extract referred to is from a despatch of September last, and does not apply to the present circumstances. With regard to the Question that stands upon the Paper, I fear I must refer my hon. Friend (Mr. M'Coan) to the reply I gave on Monday to the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite (Mr. Bourke). It would not be for the public interest that I should at the present time make any further statement, or discuss the matter referred to in the Question, relating as it does to a serious and delicate matter, one which it is not easy to discuss in answer to a Question.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: The hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said, in one of his answers yesterday, that the object of the Government was the restoration of order in Egypt. Perhaps the hon. Baronet will be able to state, Whether the Government have any information showing that order has been disturbed in Egypt by the continuance in office of Arabi Bey?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Question turns on the meaning you attach to the word "order." When the Papers come out I think my hon. Friend will see that order, in one sense, has been very considerably disturbed in Egypt.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER IN DEBATE—
MR. O'KELLY, M.P. FOR ROSCOMMON.

MR. HEALY: I wish, Mr. Speaker, to ask you a Question on a point of Order. I find, in the "Votes and Proceedings" of the House for yesterday, with reference to the remark made last night by my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon, the following entry:—

"Mr. O'Kelly, Member for Roscommon, having in the course of the Debate referred to a speech of the Right honourable the Member for Bradford as 'the Right honourable Member's infernal speech,' the Clerk was directed to take down the said words, and the same were taken down accordingly. Whereupon Mr. O'Kelly desired to withdraw the objectionable words, and apologised to the Committee for having used them in the heat of Debate."

I contest entirely, Sir, the accuracy of that entry. No Motion to any such effect was carried. The Motion was only made, and was not put or adopted; and I therefore consider that that record should not appear in the Votes, because, in point of fact, no directions were given to the Clerk or anybody else. On the Motion being made, and before it was carried, the hon. Member rose in his place, and apologised for what had taken place. The entry that the Clerk was directed to take down the said words is an entry which I dispute, and, moreover, I allege that the entry is inaccurate. It does not give exactly the words which my hon. Friend used. My Question, Sir, is this—Whether there are any means by which a Member of the House can contest an entry made by the Clerk, if he considers that it is a wrong entry; and, whether we have now any means of rectifying the statement which appears in the Votes?

MR. SPEAKER: With regard to the practice of taking down words, I have to point out to the House that it is not done by a Motion made and debated in the House; but it is done at the discretion of the Speaker or Chairman of Committees as the case may be. If the Speaker or Chairman considers that it appears to be the evident desire of the House that the words should be taken down, he gives directions accordingly, and no Motion is made.

MR. HEALY: Mr. Speaker, is there no means by which we can have an accurate record of what took place, and of the exact words the hon. Member used? The expression my hon. Friend used was, "the same infernal speech," and I wish to ask whether I would be in Order in moving that the record be amended by the insertion of the word "same?" It is of the highest consequence that we should have verbal accuracy in such a matter, as the entire point turns upon it. I think my hon. Friend will bear me out in what I have said that those were the words he used, and I would ask whether we can amend the record to the extent we have stated?

MR. SPEAKER: The entry was founded upon the statement of the Chairman of Committees at the time, and the entry is exactly in pursuance of what the Chairman stated to be the occurrence as it took place. It was read out at the time, and the hon. Member, if he thought proper to object, should have objected at the time.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I was present at the time—"Order, order!" The hon. Member resumed his seat.

MR. HEALY: Of course, Sir, you were not present at the time the words were used, and we are not with you, Sir, in stating that the entry was read out at that time. So far as my recollection, and that of hon. Members around me, goes, no such entry was read out, and we were unable to contest it at the time. It is not a matter greatly worth wrangling about, but it is desirable in the future to have accuracy. My question is, for future guidance, whether we can amend the record? It may be this is a small matter, but these are things that will come up in the future, and it is highly desirable that the records shall be accurate.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: Sir, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) is under a complete misapprehension in saying that the words were not read out at the time, because I read out the words and put the Question, "That those words be reported to the House." Therefore, the words were read out at the time, and if exception was desired to be taken to them, it should have been taken then.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR rose to a point of Order. He desired to be informed whether it was necessary for the Speaker or Chairman formally to take the sense of the House or the Committee on a Motion to take down words; or whether it was sufficient for the Speaker or Chairman to assume or take his impression of the sense of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: I have already stated to the House that the matter is at the discretion of the Speaker or Chairman, as the case may be.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

—o—o—o—

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th June.]

[SIXTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 4 (Intimidation).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 3, to leave out lines 14 and 15, and insert "by acts or threats of violence, or injury to person or property, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation."—
(Mr. Charles Russell.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. DILLON said, he had anxiously listened last night to the debate, in order to hear what the Government had to say in favour of the clause under notice, which he (Mr. Dillon) considered to be the worst in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) seemed to believe that there was no necessity to address his arguments to the Irish Benches, and therefore he had turned his back upon them, and addressed his own Supporters. That fact had certainly kindled in his (Mr. Dillon's) breast a slight hope that the right hon. Gentleman's own Supporters were somewhat shaky in regard to the clause. There was an omission from the right hon. Gentleman's speech which any impartial mind must have noticed. The right hon. Gentleman quoted one passage, and one passage only, in support of the charge he made against the Land League combination, and the dreadful system of intimidation which he accused the League of having inaugurated. The passage was one from a speech delivered by a reverend gentleman who had no official connection whatever with the National Land League in Ireland. It was from a speech delivered on the 27th September, five months after he (Mr. Dillon) had been arrested, eight or nine months after Mr. Davitt had been arrested, and after Mr. Brennan and all the Executive of the Land League in Ireland had been locked up in prison. It was certainly not for want of material in the way of speeches made by members of the Land League, for he regretted to say that a great deal of paper had been wasted in reporting those speeches, and in Dublin Castle there existed an enormous number of volumes containing full and ample reports of all the speeches they had ever made. Now, one of the most striking injustices committed by the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the course of his speech was to attribute to the Leaders of the Land League all the outrages that had been committed since they had been shut up in prison. It would only have been frank and fair and honest for the right hon. Gentleman to state—and it was a well-known fact in Ireland—that the leaders were in prison when these outrages were committed. Several striking instances had been given in which "Boycotting" had been abused. Mr. Davitt interfered and put a stop to the abuse on more than one occasion in the sternest possible way. He (Mr. Dillon) himself had more than once been appealed to on behalf of people who had been "Boycotted," and he had always relieved them from all difficulty on that head. He might mention one instance, which was well known to several Members of that House; it was one which occurred on the estate of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Evelyn Ashley) a short time previous to the arrest of Mr. Davitt. A school teacher was "Boycotted" upon that estate. An appeal was made to Mr. Davitt, and he had heard it stated, upon the authority of the hon. Member on whose property the occurrence took place, that Mr. Davitt instantly put a stop to the "Boycotting," and no trouble on that head had occurred since. He (Mr. Dillon) himself had been appealed to on several occasions, and as long as he was at liberty in Ireland he had always put a stop to "Boycotting" whenever it seemed to him that injustice was being done. But there was a statement which fell from the Chief Secretary for Ireland in, as it appeared to him (Mr. Dillon), an unguarded moment. The right hon. Gentleman, alluding to a bad case of "Boycotting" which occurred in September, 1881, said that "for the purpose of that 'Boycotting' a well-known ruffian was going round;" but the right hon. Gentleman stopped there, because he felt that he had made a mistake. The fact was that the case occurred five months after he (Mr. Dillon) had been locked up in Kilmainham Gaol, three or four months after Mr. Brennan was put in prison, and nine months after Mr. Davitt was arrested; and yet the right hon. Gentleman asserted that a well-known ruffian was at large in the county of Wicklow, and not only at large, but that he was allowed to go round and carry on this system of "Boycotting." Now, the course pursued at that time, according to the authority of the right hon. Gentleman, was to arrest the men who were openly, in public speeches, with full responsibility to the law for every act they committed, stating the advice as to "Boycotting" which they were prepared to give to the people, and, at the same time, to leave at liberty "well-known ruffians" for whom, the House was assured, the Coercion Act of last year alone was passed. These well-known ruffians were allowed to go round and carry out a system of "Boycotting," not publicly announced in the face of day, but practised in secret, and, therefore, subject to the greatest system of abuse; while the men who encouraged and advised nothing they did not put forward from a public platform were shut up in gaol. He wished to give a challenge to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity of answering it. He (Mr. Dillon) had made a great many speeches on public platforms in Ireland, and he knew that the right hon. Gentleman had a verbatim copy of every word he had uttered. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman, however, to quote a single passage from any speech he had delivered on an Irish platform which constituted an offence against the English law under the Conspiracy Act. If that were not so, why had he not been put upon his trial? They might say it was because no conviction could have been got against him. But would it not have been a strong argument for the abolition of trial by jury if he had been put upon his trial and the jury had acquitted him in the face of the Government evidence, and in the face of the law as laid down by the Irish Judges? He did not think the Irish Executive would have passed over so favourable an opportunity if it had occurred to them; and he challenged the Chief Secretary for Ireland to quote any of his speeches which could be proved to be an offence against the English law. It was a curious fact that under the Coercion Act, under which he was arrested on the 2nd May, 12 months ago, he was not arrested for intimidation. He had read, while in Kilmainham Gaol, the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary (Mr. W. E. Forster), in the House of Commons, that he had carefully studied every line of the speeches he (Mr. Dillon) had made in Ireland, from the period of the passing of the Coercion Act until the period of his arrest, and the right hon. Gentleman apologized for not having arrested him sooner. He (Mr. Dillon) did not envy the right hon. Gentleman the task he undertook, for it must have occupied a good deal of his time; but he put it to any reasonable man, whether, if the right hon. Gentleman had been able to arrest him on a charge of intimidation—and he had only to sign a warrant to that effect—he would not readily have done so if there had been any ground to justify such a course of action? But with all his (Mr. Forster's) power of private information, and with his (Mr. Dillon's) public speeches before him, reported verbatim for the gratification of the Irish Executive, the right hon. Gentleman did not sign a warrant for his arrest on the charge of intimidation, and he was matter how good their objects might be, where some men were not to be found—some of them sitting in that House—who spent their time in criticizing, finding fault, and throwing dirt against those who, under circumstances of tremendous difficulty, were struggling to save the masses of the people from utter destruction and ruin. These men, he said again—there were some of them in that House—deserved more condemnation than he could well put in Parliamentary language. Still, he was perfectly prepared to allow that the methods resorted to were rough. But they had no other methods to look to. They had tried reason and persuasion first in that House; but these appeals were in vain. They were face to face with a terrible difficulty; they were face to face, in the words of the Prime Minister himself, with what amounted to destruction and sentences of death to thousands and thousands of the Irish people. They had to select between the method of “Boycotting” and peaceful combination, which as reasonable men they adopted, and more dangerous methods for solving the difficulty, and he and others had not been ashamed or afraid to stand upon a platform, and speak out publicly what it was they advised the people to do. They had no choice between that system and the system which took its place when the Government arrested the Land League Leaders. If they had not had recourse to “Boycotting,” did the House of Commons suppose that the Irish people would have starved in patience and silence? If they had not had recourse to “Boycotting,” “Captain Moonlight” would have taken the field a year earlier. Judging from past Irish history, there was nothing to induce them to believe that anything else would have been the result, and he believed himself—nay, he was convinced—that if the Leaders of the Land League had been left at liberty “Captain Moonlight” would not have appeared upon the scene at all. The self-interest of the Leaders of the Land League would have induced them to strain their authority with the Irish people to keep “Captain Moonlight” and his retainers in the background. He admitted that their measures were rough, and that they might have made mistakes; but their difficulties were tremendous, and it was not always very easy to keep a cool judgment when thousands of their fellow-countrymen were being trampled on and starved to death. The Leaders of the League were put in prison, although they had committed no crime, and the results which followed from their imprisonment were used to blacken their movement and their fair names, and to give a seeming justification for their arrest. But, in spite of all, they had obtained some slight measure of advantage and success, and all the sophistry of English statesmen would not take from the minds of nine-tenths of the Irish people the conviction firmly rooted in them, that, but for the National Land League, there would have been no Irish Land Act, and that, but for the rough methods that were resorted to, and the strong combination they had formed, there would have been to-day none of the hope they now began to see of the transfer back to the people of Ireland of the land which was taken from their fathers.

Mr. Lyon Playfair

[Sixth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I desire to make as clear to the House as I can what is the decision of Her Majesty's Government in reference to the clause under notice. Now I say, and I say it in the most frank manner, that the object of this 4th clause is to put an end to the practice of “Boycotting;” and I propose to judge and criticize every Amendment from that point of view. I do not expect the assent or the support of any hon. Member of this House to this clause, or any part of it, who is not in favour of putting down “Boycotting;” but I do invite, and I confidently expect, the support in favour of the clause generally of every hon. Member who desires to put down that system of intimidation popularly known as “Boycotting.” The Government are willing to accept any and every Amendment in the clause which is consistent with putting down “Boycotting.” They can and will accept no Amendment in the clause which will make it incompatible with putting down “Boycotting;” and it is by that test I propose to try the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) and every other Amendment to the clause. Does “Boycotting” exist, and ought it to be put down? It is not necessary to prove that. It has been demonstrated in a calm, frank, and deliberate manner by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), who has just sat down. There cannot be a better authority on the subject of "Boycotting" than the hon. Member for Tipperary. He, it is true, draws a nice distinction between one kind of "Boycotting" and another. He speaks of "Boycotting" in one case as being—and I took down his words as he uttered them, because I thought it necessary to be very correct—he speaks of the system of "Boycotting" as advocated by the Leaders of the Land League; and I ask the House to consider by the light of his speech what that system is. He says it is true that the practice has been abused by other people who acted in a manner which was not authorized by the Leaders of the Land League. But this clause is not only meant to deal with the authorized agents of "Boycotting," as I understand the hon. Member, but it is also meant to deal with the unauthorized agents who carry on a system of "Boycotting" which the hon. Member does not approve. The hon. Member says that, when he was at large, he relieved a number of persons suffering from what he considered unjust and unauthorized "Boycotting," which shows that the hon. Member for Tipperary had complete plenary powers of absolution in the matter of "Boycotting." If a man were under the sentence of "Boycotting," the hon. Member and his Colleagues, if they thought fit, could give him plenary absolution, and relieve him of the penalty when he thought that injustice would be done. Those were the words of the hon. Member—"when injustice would be done." Now, I frankly state that the view of the Government is that a man is to be relieved from "Boycotting" and from the plenary authority of the hon. Member for Tipperary and his Colleagues; not when they think injustice will be done, but that he is to be relieved from it by the law of the land. That is the difference between our view and that of the hon. Member for Tipperary. He gave us a very interesting description of the system of "Boycotting" patronized by the Land League; and, although he was not very definite in the matter, I gathered from the tone of his speech that he approves of that system now. [Mr. HEALY: Hear, hear!] I am glad to hear that cheer from the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy); but I trust that even among hon. Members sitting on that Bench the hon. Member for Tipperary and the hon. Member for Wexford stand alone in that determination. [Mr. BIGGAR: No, no!] I will tell them my reason for saying that I wish to speak frankly. I certainly understood the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) to speak of "Boycotting" as a thing of the past. He spoke of it in an apologetic tone, which I regretted; but, at all events, there was this advantage in what he said—that he spoke of it as a thing which might have been justified by a condition of things which once existed, but which was no longer justifiable in the present condition of things. To use a French expression, I took "act" of that declaration to the House of Commons. I thought it a hopeful and important statement. I think it important to know whether that statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, or the statement of the hon. Member for Tipperary to-day, accurately represents the views of those whom the hon. Member for Tipperary calls the Leaders of the Land League. In the latter view, I will take the statement of the hon. Member for Tipperary—of what he understands by "Boycotting." I do not wish to go back to any of the speeches in the past to which he has referred, or to repeat phrases like "making a man a moral leper," and so forth. I wish to keep the discussion as free as possible from phrases of that kind—

Mr. Dillon

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that I used those words? If so, I must remind him that I never did so.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No; I do not wish to suggest even that that phrase was ever used by the hon. Member for Tipperary; but it is a phrase that was used. What I say is that I desire to keep this discussion free from anything in the nature of recrimination as far as possible, and to take things as they are at this moment. In the presence of the hon. Member for Tipperary, I give what seems to me, from his speech, to be a fair construction of his views upon the matter. In speaking of "Boycotting," the hon. Member seemed to recognize two systems—one which he regards as a moderate and justifiable system, according to the views of himself and the Leaders of the Land League, and another kind of "Boycotting" which he calls an abuse of the practice which irregular practitioners of that system have carried it out. Now, I will take the hon. Member's view of what he calls "moderate 'Boycotting,'" as patronized by the Leaders of the Land League. The hon. Member says the people have liberty to combine. Of course, they have liberty to combine; nobody denies that. ["Oh, oh!"] I do not deny it, at all events, and I hope hon. Members will allow me to go on. I am trying to argue the matter fairly. I admit the liberty of people to combine; but what I deny is the right of the people who combine to affect others who are not parties to the combination.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. DILLON: I have distinctly said, over and over again in public, that no "Boycotting" was to be permitted against any person, except those who entered into our combination.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Let us see whether that is really the case. I think the hon. Member cannot sustain that view of what he has stated. But allow me to proceed. The hon. Member says "Boycotting," according to his view, was to instruct persons—that is, the persons belonging to the Land League combination—to have no dealings with certain classes of people. I will come to who those people were presently. He says—these are his words—"Have no dealings with him; shut your doors against him; but do no injury to him." Now, it does not seem to me that you can carry out this system without doing a man an injury. Take the case of the village blacksmith mentioned the other day. Suppose you say to the blacksmith that every man in the village shall shut their doors against him, and have no dealings with him; does that do him no injury? It seems to me that the hon. Member for Tipperary was omitting an important qualification. What I understood him to mean was, that they were to do no injury by violence. That may be; but you may injure a man so as to destroy his very existence, without using actual violence against him. If you advise every man in the village to close his doors against another man, and have no dealings with him, he cannot subsist. Let us see what the hon. Member for Tipperary recommends as moderate "Boycotting." You are to have no dealings with, and you are to shut your door against, whom? Against three classes of people. First of all, the man who takes a farm which, in his opinion, an unjust eviction has been made; so that it may be used against a man who is a member of the Land League, or any other man. I understand the hon. Member for Tipperary to say that it can be used against any man? [MR. DILLON: Any man.] Then, is it not directed against a man who is not a member of the combination? What the hon. Member means is that "Boycotting" is to act against any man, whether in the combination or not, who takes a farm from which a tenant has been unjustly evicted. Therefore, I say that this is a combination intended to act against people outside the combination in the most distinct manner, and when the hon. Member says—"If you choose to take a farm from which a man has been unjustly evicted, you shall be 'Boycotted,'" is not that trenching upon the liberty of the subject; and may it not be used equally against a man outside the combination as against a man within it? The word "unjustly," which was omitted in the original declaration, was a very important omission. The adjective "unjust," in regard to evictions, was a very important adjective indeed, especially when it was coupled with the "no rent" manifesto. When the "no rent" manifesto was sent out, and everybody was told not to pay rent, how were you to distinguish between unjust and just evictions? If you order a man to pay no rent at all, what becomes of the distinction between unjust and just evictions? I give this, however, only by way of parenthesis. First of all, every man, whether he be in the combination or not, if he takes a farm from which a man whom the Land League in its discretion regards as having been unjustly evicted, is to be subjected to this social ostracism. That is not all. Every man who aids in any act of this kind is also to be subjected to the same proscription. That is the second head of the classes intended to be dealt with by the hon. Member for Tipperary; and what does it mean? It means that every officer of the law who does his duty is to be proscribed and "Boycotted;" every bailiff who serves a writ; every policeman who takes part in the execution of the law—nay, even the driver of the car which carries the bailiff, or policeman; every man, in fact, who, in the remotest degree, contributes to do that act which is the subject of what is called the "moderate 'Boycotting'" patronized by the Leaders of the Land League, is to be proscribed. That is the second case. Then the hon. Member says the third case is to include a man whom I understand to be in the combination, though I do not know that it is entirely necessary that he should be in the combination; but if he has once agreed to demand a certain reduction of rent, and then, under motives of prudence or any other motive, such as a sense of justice, or from any other reason whatever, he consents to moderate his terms, he is to be "Boycotted"—that is to say, that a man, whether in the Land League or out of it, who demands from his landlord a reduction of 50 per cent in his rent, and then, upon a conference with his landlord, or for other reasons, which may seem good to himself, he consents to take a reduction of 30 per cent, according to the hon. Member for Tipperary, he is to be "Boycotted."

Sir William Harcourt

MR. DILLON: I said that where a man had entered into an engagement with his fellow-tenants to demand a certain reduction of rent, and then had broken that engagement by making terms privately for himself, he was to be "Boycotted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That seems to me to be very much like what I said; but I will put it in the hon. Member's own words. A man has entered into an engagement with the tenants of a particular estate to go together and say—"We will demand of the landlord a reduction of 50 per cent." They go together, and one of them, from considerations of justice, or from considerations of prudence, it may be in regard to his own family, under pressure of the wants of his wife and family, thinks, on the whole, it would be better to make terms with the landlord, and to take a reduction of 30 per cent. That man is to be made a "moral leper," and no man is to deal with him, but is to shut his doors against him. Now, that is "Boycotting," not taken from loose phrases, not taken in the heat of a platform speech, or in the excitement of a stirring period when the hon. Member says it was necessary to use strong language; but taken from language used deliberately on the floor of the House of Commons, in the presence of the hon. Members I am now addressing, in the very carefully-considered speech made by the hon. Member for Tipperary, who comes down here to explain to the House what "Boycotting" means, what are its objects, and what are the methods by which it is to be carried out. After that explanation I ask the House if they mean to assist the Government in putting down this system; and, if they do, to accept this clause, the object of which is to put it down. I will ask the hon. Member for Tipperary if it is possible to conceive—what I do not regard as possible—that any reasonable man could allow such a system, even as moderate as that regulated and recognized system patronized by the Leaders of the Land League, to exist? Suppose you did, what are you to do with those ruffians of whom the hon. Member speaks, who carry on "Boycotting" without the exequatur of the Land League? At all events, even on his own admission, it is necessary to deal with them. There are those two classes, and, for my own part, I can make very little distinction between the one and the other. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) says that this is the creation of a new offence. Well, of course it is; if it were not, why should we have this Act, and why should we have this clause? We have introduced this Bill because, in our opinion, it is necessary to deal with the new state of things. That is a truism. We do not bring in an Act of Parliament to create offences which already exist. Well, is that an exceptional way of treating Ireland? ["Oh, oh!"] I hope that hon. Member will understand my remarks. Have we not dealt with England in exactly the same way? What took place in the year 1871? There had arisen in some districts in England a system of terrorism which, in some respects, resembled that which we have now to deal with in Ireland. There were a certain number of things done which the law did not punish, and which were practised, consequently, with impunity. What did Parliament do? It set to work to pass a Bill to meet the state of things which then existed, and the result was the Act of 1871. [MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own Bill?] No; I never passed a Bill upon the subject. Well, what did that Bill deal with? It was an Act to amend the criminal law relating to violence, threats, and molestations, and injury to person and property. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) wishes to confine this clause to acts of violence. [Mr. BIGGAR: Hear, hear!] No doubt the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) will cheer that statement, because he knows perfectly well that if the Bill were limited to acts of violence it would not touch "Boycotting." That is one of my objections to the Amendment; and the objection is a vital one. If the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk are accepted, you do not touch "Boycotting" at all. What is the very essence of "Boycotting?" The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) said—"Do a man no injury, but shut your door against him and have no dealings with him." Therefore, carry the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, and you give a letter of licence to "Boycotting." Well, that was not the way in which Parliament dealt with the evil in England. [Mr. HEALY: You repealed the Act.] Parliament at once proceeded to make new offences, and they passed a distinct clause with reference to threatening and intimidation. They then created a whole class of offences with reference to molestation and obstruction. [Mr. HEALY: I ask again, did you repeal the Act?] The hon. Member for Wexford is impatient. If the Act was not exactly repealed, it was re-cast and modified. I am not now discussing the special clauses of that Act; but I am showing the Committee how the Parliament of the United Kingdom dealt with the evil in England. My general argument is this—When you have got a new evil you must have new remedies, and you must create new offences. I say we are not dealing with Ireland in an exceptional way. We dealt with England on the same footing by the Act of 1871. I will come to the Act of 1875 presently. I will show you that it is the policy, and the necessary policy, of Parliament, where a grievance is great, admitted, and widespread, not to shrink from enacting remedies capable of coping with the grievance. In that sense we were reminded by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) last night that the condition of Ireland is such that no general law would apply to it without modification. That is the very reason why we claim that this clause should be tried, not upon the same principle as that which has been adopted in England, but upon a principle altered so as to deal with the distinct evils which exist at the present moment in Ireland. That is the claim we put forward for the trial of this clause. The Act of 1871, and some subsequent Acts, were modified by the Act of 1875. But I stand upon the Act of 1875, and I say that the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk is totally inconsistent with the Act of 1875. It is an absolute limitation of the Act of 1875. Now, what does the Act of 1875 say? It says that—

[Sixth Night.]

"Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing, or to do, any act that such person has a legal right to do, or abstain from doing, wrongfully or without legal authority uses violence or intimidation."

It is not "intimidates by violence," but "uses violence or intimidation," which shows that something was meant to be defined different from violence, and not included in violence at all. In my opinion, the Act of 1875 did quite enough, if it stopped at those words, without going on to specify any offences, but leaving the tribunal, from its own judgment, to form an opinion as to what constituted intimidation. Now, intimidation, as we have seen by experience, is a matter of so peculiar a character that it varies in every place and with every hour; and, in my opinion, all attempts to define intimidation will rather obscure than enlighten the subject. [Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Irish Members.] I do not know if hon. Members opposite agree with me; I should like very much to know their views. Would they like to have the question of intimidation left at large to the tribunal? [An hon. MEMBER: No; leave it to a jury.] I did not expect that they would. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) has made a demand to-day, which, I am afraid, is the only part of his speech I can give a cordial assent to. He says—"You will not tell us what the law is we have to obey." Well, the object of this clause is to tell you. The fact is that intimidation is so Protean in its shape that it is impossible to define it. It is because there has been an obscurity on the subject; because people could pretend they did not know these things were illegal, that it is necessary for Parliament to speak in distinct terms, and to tell them what is the law, and what are the things which they are not to do, and that is what this 4th clause says; and the object of that clause is to teach the people of Ireland what intimidation is, so that the people of Ireland may understand in future what is legal and what is illegal. The hon. Member says he wishes to keep within the law, and he wishes other people to keep within it also. I am glad to hear that declaration; and when this clause passes into law, he will be able to tell the people what they can do, and what they cannot do. The hon. Member says—"These things were not illegal before." That is quite true. I think, if you will allow me to say so, that people who speak by the card, and run so near illegalities, will not be surprised if many of those who act under their advice overstep the limit they themselves lay down, and those persons are not in any way astonished that there are so many of these unauthorized agents who better their instructions, and go beyond the narrow limits to which the hon. Member for Tipperary would wish to confine them. The line laid down by the hon. Member has been very indistinct; but, if this clause passes, there will be no danger of a misunderstanding in the future. Hon. Members for Ireland and the people will know what are the things which Parliament has determined shall not be practised. The Act of 1875 declared illegal the using of violence or intimidation against any person, his wife, or children, or injury to his property, not by violence, but by intimidation, and to induce him to do things which he would otherwise not have done. Then it proceeds to make, not in combination, but singly, various acts, which were not illegal before, illegal, and every person who resorts to them is punishable. And why? Because it was found these acts were done for bad purposes and with an evil effect. Several matters which were not an offence before the passing of the Act became criminal offences after it did pass. To follow a person and interfere with him in his employment was not an offence, either in the case of a number of people or of an individual; but after this Act passed it became an offence. Why do I call attention to these things? To show that the Parliament of England, when it found a wide-spread grievance and wrong done to the liberty of an individual in this manner, deliberately applied itself to provide a remedy. Now, the Act applies to Ireland as well as to England. Why, then, do we want a new enactment in respect to Ireland? I will answer that question very frankly. Because the system of "Boycotting" is a different system to that which was adopted in the outrages connected with the Trades Unions; and, therefore, the system, being different, the remedy must be different. And then my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk comes here, and proposes an Amendment which will absolutely cut down and limit the regulations of the Act of 1875; because he proposes to introduce in a Bill, which has regard to the condition of Ireland, a definition of intimidation, which, if applied to Trade Union purposes in the Act of 1875, would have been totally useless. How does this clause generally differ from the clause in the Act of 1875? It differs in two material particulars, and, I think, in only two material particulars. First of all, it includes incitement to intimidation, as well as intimidation itself. I think everyone will admit that people who incite to intimidation ought to be punished. As to intimidation itself, I think there will be very little difference on that point. Then it introduces another thing which was not in the Act of 1875. It includes past acts as well as intimidation with reference to future acts. Why is that necessary? It is necessary from the very essence of "Boycotting" itself, because a man is "Boycotted," not in reference to what he is going to do, but in consequence of what he has done. Therefore, the clause must necessarily be different from the clause in the Act of 1875. It comes entirely under a new principle, because it applies only to the present exceptional condition of Ireland. I take my stand on that. I say we are dealing with the Irish evil exactly as we dealt in point of principle with the English evil. We discovered exactly the methods in which oppression is used; we discovered what methods of molestation were made the means of oppression in the case of Trades Unions; and in this case we have inquired what the methods of oppression are which are used in Ireland for "Boycotting," and we propose what we consider to be a remedy. If the Committee is of opinion that our remedy is not a perfect one for the evil, and will suggest modifications in that remedy, we will accept them, after fair discussion, if they will really grapple with the evil; but we cannot, and do not, accept modifications which have for their object to leave the evil untouched. I do not pretend that it is not a difficult subject to deal with. It is a difficult subject, as the Trades Unions formed a difficult subject. It has taken many years to shape our legislation; therefore, we have no attachment at all to any particular method we may have adopted for dealing with this evil. But you must keep the evil in view, and see that your clause grapples with it; and you must entertain and accept no Amendment which, in point of fact, gives an immunity to that evil. My objection—and I must apologize to the Committee for having detained them so long—my objection to the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk is that it excludes "Boycotting" altogether from the Bill. It provides only for acts or threats of violence or injury, in which intimidation is used. Now, it is the very essence of "Boycotting" that it does not use violence in intimidation. The object of the Government in this clause is to put down intimidation of every description, whether by threats of violence or injury to property; but not exclusively in that way, although, I am bound to say, mainly in that way. If that were the only object, the Act of 1875 might prove sufficient; but it is because there is a system of oppression, equally as potent as any injury by violence to person or property, that we have introduced this Bill. The object of the clause is to grapple with that evil; and, as I said before, the Government will accept any Amendment which grapples with the evil, but none that leaves it untouched.

MR. DILLON wished to say one word by way of explanation. He desired to withdraw the statement that "Boycotting" was not intended to deal with any person who was not inside the Land League combination. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had properly corrected him upon that point. At the same time, he contended that that was the policy of the Trades Unions of England, the members of which refused to work with anyone outside the Union.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he was sure the House had listened with satisfaction to the able and temperate statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. No one could object to the spirit of what he said, and the difference between them appeared now to be reduced to one of phraseology. They were agreed, or at least nearly agreed, in principle. No one could deny—no one attempted to deny—that great oppression, injustice, and cruelty had been inflicted on many unoffending and deserving persons by the reckless exercise of the practice of "Boycotting." If the clause under consideration only prevented such practices, and punished those who resorted to them, there would be no objection to it and little criticism about it. But it did more than that. Its wording was very vague and extremely elastic. It might be made an instrument of great oppression, and the Committee ought to take care that, while putting down one form of injustice, they did not create another equally as offensive and far more powerful. If the wording of the clause could be altered in such a way as simply to reach acts that had been committed as a direct consequence of speeches made, he would not object to it; but he certainly did object, and that most strenuously, to any attempt to punish a man for the expression of his disapproval with the course of action of another man. There was one observation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he dissented from. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had said that this was a new practice. He (Mr. Cowen) thought such a statement was very far from the fact. "Boycotting," or the spirit that prompted what was called "Boycotting," was as old as creation. It existed in all times, in all countries, and among all manner of men. And it would continue to exist as long as the human race continued to be moved by the common passions of mankind. It would not cease until we had got the Millennium. New practice, indeed! Did not the Jews refuse to have intercourse with the Samaritans? Did not the Greeks "Boycott" the barbarians? Did not the Romans set up exclusive dealing? There was no man familiar with the history of agrarian struggles in other times and other lands who did not know that the identical class of offences that were committed in Ireland, and which this Bill was devised to reach, had been committed in other countries during like conflicts. The Norman peasants established an association closely resembling that of the Land League. They decreed that they would not deal with or have any intercourse with those who refused to join their combination—a combination which sought the abolition of rents, taxes, tolls, as well as liberty to fish, hunt, and labour in wood, meadow, and water. The peasant who refused to associate himself with them in their effort had a mark set upon his lintel, or a post driven before his door, to indicate that he was a man to be shunned. Did not the English Legislature at one time “Boycott” Irish cattle? Did they not at another time “Boycott” Irish woollens? Dean Swift advised his countrymen to retaliate by burning everything that came from England except coals. And even at that moment, and in other walks of life, were they not constantly witnessing instances of “Boycotting?” What was the Liberal Caucus but a species of “Boycotting?” If anybody wished to experience political “Boycotting,” let him think for himself—let him look at public questions with his own eyes, and not through the spectacles of Party Leaders. And if, when he had done that, he had the misfortune to differ from these said Leaders and the temerity to express his difference, he would very soon learn—if he had had any doubt before—that “Boycotting” existed in Parliament and amongst politicians, as well as in Ireland and amongst the peasantry. The statement of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, therefore, that this was a new practice, was contrary to all experience, and conflicted with history. While he (Mr. Cowen) condemned, as severely as anyone could do, the practice of injuring any man for difference of opinion—either political or social—he was averse to making the law so stringent as to intimidate or prevent the legitimate expression of the said difference. And the Bill proposed to do that. A man was to be punished, if what he said injured another man. The strength of the clause centred round the word “injury.” What was injury, and how were they to define it? He knew of a case where a “blackleg” in the North of England brought an accusation against the members of the Trades Union, that he had been injured. His charge was that, in consequence of the fear which the Trades Union agitation had created in his mind, he was unable to sleep, and, in consequence of being unable to sleep, he could not do his day’s work, and, therefore, he brought forward an allegation of material injury at the instance of the Trades Union agitation. [Laughter.] Of course, that was a very extreme case; but, as the Bill stood now, it would be equally liable to that strict interpretation. All he had to say with respect to the clause under consideration was this—that if the Government dealt with the present organization in Ireland in the same spirit and on the same lines as they dealt with the Trades Union organization in England, there would be no reason to complain; and, so far as he was concerned, he would not have been induced to give any opposition to the Bill, or to support any Amendment in it. But there was necessarily a difference between a landlord and an artizan, and it was desirable to take into consideration different rules and regulations, and to draft the Bill in different words. But a Bill of this kind, dealing with Ireland, should have been brought in in the same spirit and in the same way as they had already dealt with the Trades Union organization in England. If that had been done, he believed the opposition to the most important sections of the Bill would have very materially evaporated. It was because the Bill did not deal with the matter in that sense, but much more harshly, that this opposition had been raised. The clause itself was a much more stringent one than that which applied to intimidation and picketting; and, not only was that the case, but the tribunal before which the offenders would be brought was altogether different from any tribunal which existed in England. If a workman in England broke the Trades Union rules, and he was intimidated by a fellow-labourer or a fellow-workman, the offender was taken before a bench of justices, where there was a reasonable chance of the case being heard and judged on its merits. But if a man offended against this Bill, he would, in many instances, go before a bench of magistrates who would be prejudiced against him. It was, therefore, necessary, in any Act dealing with such a form of social ostracism, to guard its provisions so as to prevent them from being used as means of oppression. He was not wedded to the words of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell). There were other Amendments on the Paper which were intended to accomplish the same object, several of which were better than the present proposal made by the hon. and learned Member. But what he (Mr. Cowen) wished for was to have the thing clearly defined. The offence, however, was one which they were all anxious to destroy, because the greatest advocates of despotism were the men who attempted to override the law; and when the law was overridden, tyranny stepped in. All of them were anxious to destroy this practice; but, at the same time, they wished to prevent another offence of equal magnitude from springing up.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope that I shall be allowed to remind the hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Cowen) that there are two rules absolutely necessary for real progress in discussing the clauses of a Bill in Committee. The first is that we should not insist upon discussing all the clauses upon each clause. If the hon. Member introduces here the objections which he entertains to the tribunal before which the offence in question is to be tried, it cannot conduce to the progress of the discussion. That is a portion of the Bill which ought to be considered in dealing with the clause relating to the tribunal. In the same way, the speech which the hon. Gentleman has just delivered is a speech directed against the entire clause, and not a speech strictly relevant to the Amendment before us. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in the able and, I think I may say, the conclusive speech he has delivered in defence of this clause, never bound himself to adhere to every word of the clause as it stands, but he left it fairly open to argument; and while, in the clearest manner, defending the purpose and meaning of the clause, he showed that the Amendment now before the Committee was inconvenient for that purpose and meaning of the clause. Does the hon. Member for Newcastle think that the Amendment is necessary for the purpose of the clause? Is it consistent upon his own showing? The hon. Member says that the spirit and feeling which finds development in "Boycotting" are not limited to Ireland or the Land League. In that I entirely concur. The evil spirit which there is in "Boycotting" dwells more or less in the breasts of most men; that is to say, the disposition they have—I hope some not at all, but many little, and most men a good deal—in every country to use their own liberty, and the legal rights and powers with which they are invested, in a manner to limit unjustly the liberty and powers of their fellow-men. The question is, what is the amount of the evil? In Ireland it is a great and serious evil, limiting most unduly the liberty of action of men, attaining the object at which it is directed, and seriously endangering the peace and order of the country. It is not because "Boycotting," or the spirit of "Boycotting," is peculiar to one age or one country that this clause is introduced, and in substance must be insisted on by the Government, but because this system has become in Ireland a monstrous public evil, threatening liberty, and interfering with law and order. If it exists to this extent there, it is vain to point out that the spirit of intolerance, and the disposition to interfere unjustly with the liberty of action of one's neighbours, is to be found elsewhere, as in Ireland. The hon. Member did not attempt to meet the argument by which my right hon. and learned Friend showed so demonstratively—that, inasmuch as violence alone would be touched under the name of intimidation, if the Amendment was adopted "Boycotting," which, we think, unfortunately leads to violence, and has violence as its certain consequence, but which, at the same time, in itself does not include or depend upon violence, would not be touched. I would press upon the Committee that there was, in my opinion, an admission made in the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend which was more generous than could justly be claimed by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). My right hon. and learned Friend admitted, as a possible construction of the speech of the hon. Member for Tipperary, that in the third of his classes of cases, perhaps he meant only to say that Members of the Land League who had entered into the combination were to be subject to the action of the principle he had in view. The case he put was the case of an engagement among tenants to demand a certain reduction of rent from their landlord; and, if some one of those tenants altered his mind, he would become liable to be "Boycotted." That is what the hon. Member for Tipperary defends. What is meant by "an engagement?" I take it that what is meant is simply this—that the tenants, actuated by a common feeling, have, in a loose and general way, agreed to a certain co-operation. They have said—"Let us make common cause and ask for a common reduction." I say it is a monstrous abuse of terms to treat that as an engagement absolutely binding on every one of these men to adhere precisely and throughout to what was originally intended. It is undoubtedly a co-operation; but to make it an engagement, and give it the character of a formal instrument, with regard to which no one could alter his mind without getting the consent of the rest—that even the vast majority of them cannot alter their minds without the consent of the rest—is an abuse of terms.

Mr. Joseph Cowen

MR. DILLON: The Prime Minister is mistaken. It is a well-known practice in Ireland, when these engagements are made, that they cannot be departed from without the consent of the majority.

MR. GLADSTONE: We have now at last heard the unwritten law, about which so much has been said. Here is an oral tradition set up by the hon. Member, which is to be brought into action and carried to the point, not only of interference with liberty, but of ruin to goods and property, and which it is highly probable that he who objects to it has never heard. My right hon. and learned Friend said it was possible the hon. Member for Tipperary meant that no one was to be "Boycotted" under his third head, unless he was a member of the Land League. Suppose there are 100 tenants who have agreed to demand a certain reduction, and that 50 are members of the Land League and 50 are not. I understand that, according to the doctrine of the hon. Member, the 50 who are members of the Land League would be liable to be "Boycotted" if they altered their minds as to the terms they would accept. What I want to know is, if the 50 who were not members of the Land League altered their minds as to the terms they would accept, they would be liable to be "Boycotted" or not?

MR. DILLON: The case has never in my experience arisen. No man entered into these combinations who was not a member of the Land League.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not ask the hon. Gentleman if he was aware of any case. What I asked him for was an interpretation of his law. He has laid down the law, and I think it is fair to ask him to interpret the law. He asks my right hon. and learned Friend to let him know the meaning of the law; but its interpretation will not rest upon the authority of my right hon. and learned Friend, but upon the authority of the House. In this instance, on the contrary, it rests solely on the authority of the hon. Member; and I ask him the meaning of the law. If 100 tenants concurred in making a certain reduction, 50 being members of the Land League and 50 not being members, and the 50 who are not members of the Land League determine that it is their interest to ask lower terms, I ask, would they be liable to be "Boycotted" under the hon. Member's law or not? It is not easy to get an answer to that question.

MR. DILLON: I am bound to say this is a knotty question which never arose in my experience; and, therefore, I am not prepared to answer it.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member is greatly pleased by his own ingenuity in evading a point which is as plain as the sun at noon-day, but which it is not convenient to answer. It is perfectly plain that all persons entering into this supposed agreement—which is a concurrence ad hoc for a common object with respect to which the people must retain the right to change their mind according to fresh evidence brought before them—would, though not members of the Land League, be liable to be "Boycotted" under the law of the hon. Gentleman. Then, with regard to evictions, it was said that any persons assisting in an unjust eviction is to be liable to be "Boycotted." A complaint was introduced of myself in regard to this matter. I referred to the hon. Member's speech, and he coolly finds fault with me for not having interpolated the word "unjust" before "evictions." Is there, in the view of the hon. Member, such a thing as a just eviction? What eviction is just? If a tenant refuses to pay his rent, and is then evicted, is that, in the view of the hon. Gentleman, an unjust eviction? Of course it is. In point of fact, it is not the use of the phrase with the word "unjust" which misrepresents the meaning of the hon. Gentleman. It is the interpretation of the word "unjust," which is little more than a mere fetich, and which is only used in order in some way to disguise and render tolerable in the face of the nation the doctrine of the hon. Gentleman. The man is to be "Boycotted" who has taken part in an unjust eviction, we will say. Let us see how far that reaches. Of course the Constabulary Force, who are the instruments of eviction, are to be "Boycotted." But the Constabulary have to find their way to the place, and they must find their way on a car, and that car must be hired out to them, probably by some innkeeper. Well, the innkeeper in that way substantially, though indirectly, became a party to the evictions; and I apprehend that I do not misrepresent the hon. Member when I say that, according to the law which he has laid down, the innkeeper who supplies the car is to be "Boycotted," because he supplied the car to the police which carried the police to the place where the eviction was to be effected. But it may go farther yet, because the innkeeper himself must have wants. He must have a butcher and a baker, and the butcher and baker must not supply the innkeeper who supplies the car which carries the police to the place where the eviction is to be made. And so, in point of fact, this is a case of the house that Jack built in the passing from point to point, and from person to person, through the whole population under the influence of this doctrine. However, the main purpose for which I rose was to refer to a declaration which was given, no doubt, with perfect sincerity, by my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle. He closed his speech by stating—"If you will consent to deal with the subject of intimidation and "Boycotting" in Ireland in the same spirit in which you dealt with the subject in England in the case of Trades' Unions, you will find no objection made on principle to your proceeding." As to interpretation of principles and general declarations, neither can be bound, nor can we; but as to the principle which he lays down, in the presence of my right hon. Friend who has had so much to do with the framing and conduct of this Bill (Mr. W. E. Forster), and of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I do not hesitate to say that that is precisely the object which we aim at. We desire to deal in exactly the same spirit with the question of "Boycotting" in Ireland as Parliament has dealt with the question of Trades' Unions in England, the difference being, as has been generally recognized by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that when you proceed to deal with any form of interference with the just liberty of action of Her Majesty's subjects, you must take into view the particular circumstances of the case, and you must adapt your particular provisions to those circumstances. It is precisely in that spirit that my right hon. and learned Friend has declared that we desire to proceed, and by that rule we intend and desire to be bound throughout the whole of the proceedings upon this clause.

[Sixth Night.]

Mr. HEALY asked, why, if, as the Prime Minister had said, the Government intended to act in the spirit of the Trades' Union Act, six months' imprisonment was inserted in this Irish Bill, without the option of a fine, while only three months could be imposed under the English Act, with the option of a fine? The Prime Minister found fault with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), because he had not instantly sprung to his feet to answer the question he put. Why did not the Prime Minister himself now get up and say whether, that inconsistency having been pointed out, he would remedy it?

Mr. GLADSTONE said, that question was a distinct and separate matter, and would come under consideration by-and-bye, when there would be an opportunity of speaking upon it. It was not, at the present moment, a point at issue.

Mr. HEALY was glad to know there would be an opportunity by-and-bye of dealing with the point; but what did that denote—that the Government, when they framed this Bill, had a very different notion from their present notion? How did the English Act begin? It began with a provision which was not to be found in the Irish Bill, and he himself had put down an Amendment which he had copied from that Act, but changing the words “employers and workmen” to “landlords and tenants.” The English Act said that—

Mr. Gladstone

“An agreement, or combination of two or more persons to do, or procure to be done, any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute between employers, and shall not be indictable as a conspiracy, if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would find in those words no application to an individual act, apart from combination.

MR. HEALY said, they were now dealing with the spirit of the Bill, and he having met the declaration of the Prime Minister, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and pointed out the difference in spirit which existed, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman agree to accept the words of his Amendment? The point in question plainly showed the spirit in which the Government proposed to legislate, and of this he would give another instance from the English Act. In Clause 7 of that Act would be found these words—

“Attending at or near the house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section.”

Was there anything in the Irish Bill equivalent to that? He had put down an Amendment in the sense of that Proviso to this effect—

“Provided, that no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either, and no declaration of intention not to so deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation.”

Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept that Amendment? He would not, although the Prime Minister had declared that exclusive dealing was no crime. Therefore, he (Mr. Healy) thought he had disposed of the pretence of the Government that they wished to deal, or would deal with the Irish Bill or people in the same way as they had dealt with the English Act. These were the specious promises which the Government made, and which could be shown to be futile and disingenuous. He would put a case to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who said he wished to put down intimidation. If a man wished to buy bread from a baker, or sugar from a grocer, and the baker or grocer refused to serve him, would that be intimidation under the Bill? Why did not the Government get up and answer? A man might go into a shop and say, “I demand to be supplied with groceries;” and if the grocer refused to serve him, would the Government make that an act of intimidation? Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not answer?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, if it would shorten the debate, he would answer the question. It depended on the surrounding circumstances whether the refusal amounted to intimidation or not.

MR. HEALY: Who is to be the judge of it?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The tribunal appointed by Parliament. I may also add, to make matters clear, that we are disposed to give an appeal in such cases, as in all cases of summary jurisdiction, to Quarter Sessions.

MR. HEALY said, in that case, the right hon. and learned Gentleman's view differed from that of the Prime Minister. Last year the Prime Minister laid down the principle that exclusive dealing could not be dealt with as a crime; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman now said that if one man refused to supply another with goods, that refusal might, under certain circumstances, be a crime. He wondered whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would apply that principle to England and Scotland? If once this system was commenced there would be no end to it. Suppose the tradesman were willing to sell to a particular customer, but only at a prohibitive price. What if he charged £1 for a loaf of bread? Would that conduct be criminal? Would that be intimidation? The man might be willing to supply the other, but he could put his own price upon the goods. It came to this—if the offence depended on certain surrounding circumstances, that the Government would have to describe those circumstances, and, in so doing, to add to the Bill a Schedule of fair prices in order to prevent the measure from becoming futile. They would have to do that, because the idea of driving a coach and four through an Act of Parliament was not confined to the country in which it originated. "Boycotting" would be just as practicable, and the Government would be passing a futile Bill. What astonished him was that the Government seemed to think they could put down feelings of burning injustice in the minds of the Irish people. The Secretary of State for the Home Department said they must take their choice between "Captain Moonlight" or "Boycotting." That was precisely his own view; and the Government would find that where farms had been unjustly taken from people, the people would not tolerate a system which brought ruin upon them. The Government were very strong on the question of ruin, and insisted that no man should be ruined by "Boycotting"; the people of Ireland insisted that no man should be ruined by the landlords' system, and if a man was turned out of his farm that would be "Boycotting." He (Mr. Healy) was not one of those who apologized for "Boycotting," for he would not say that in some cases "Boycotting" had not been grossly abused. However, it was not only a necessary practice, but, in cases where it was aimed at injustice, it was a practice that had been often employed with very good results, and a practice to which alone the Irish people could resort. The people of Ireland would try and strike back for injustice, and the Government must keep that in mind. The Irish people would not tolerate injustice so long as they could be avenged. The Government thought they would put down crime by that Bill, but they would do nothing of the kind. The practice of taking the lands over the heads of the people, by fixing a higher value than the market value, and so driving the people to degradation, to workhouses, and to emigration, was a practice which the people of Ireland were determined, as a whole, to resist, and all the Acts of Parliament were contemptible and despicable in the face of that determination, because the views of an united people could not be put down.

Mr. Healy

The Government might deal with this matter in one or two ways. They might make eviction impossible, and that would at once put down "Boycotting." But this Bill was simply intended to prop up the rotten edifice of the land system, and the prop and the edifice would come down together. If men took farms from which others had been unjustly evicted they would take them at their peril. The Irish people would not tolerate that, and the Government might take it as a fact that all the English Bills, and all the English Governments that might exist, would never succeed in putting down the view of the people, that the present iniquitous practice of land-grabbing was an evil, and must be put a stop to. The Secretary of State for the Home Department said that very great evils had to be coped with in Ireland, and special remedies were necessary. Was not the whole system of Irish crime comparable with what took place in England during the Trades' Union outrages? The Prime Minister praised Trades' Unions now; but the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said that Parliament, by the Act of 1871, put this stigma on Trades' Unionism. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not mentioned, that no sooner was that Act passed than the Trades' Unions agitated against it, and never ceased until it was repealed; so that there was now not a trace of those parts of the Act to which they objected. The people of Ireland might consent to this Bill, if they were assured that they would have a hearing in the House of Commons, and in the newspapers, as the Trades' Union had; but if an Irish Member made a speech in that House, or in Ireland, it was put into a few lines, while every charge made against the Irish by Englishmen was printed in full in the English papers. Therefore, the Irish people had not the same opportunity that the Trades' Unions had of influencing the views of the country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he was willing to deal with Ireland as with England; but what occurred in England? On the previous night the right hon. and learned Gentleman had dwelt, almost with tearfulness, upon the "Boycotting" offences in Ireland. Here were some of the outrages committed by the Trades' Unions, taken from the Blue Book—

"Saw Grinders' Union.—Parker's horse hamstrung in a field by three men, hired by Secretary of Union. Powder exploded at Parker's door, and in the house of Bishop. Parker shot at at his own door, and arm disabled, by men hired by Union. Lindley shot and wounded by an air-gun. Can of powder exploded in Poole's house, because an obnoxious person was lodging with him. Lindley shot at with an air-gun whilst sitting in a crowded taproom; died from effects of wound."

These outrages did not occur in the days of the Saxons; they occurred only 12 or 13 years ago.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: That was the very reason of the passing of the Act of 1871.

MR. HEALY asked, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman could bring forward anything in the whole history of "Boycotting" in Ireland comparable with what took place in this English time? He would go on with his case.

"Assassins hired by Union: they had tracked him for five or six weeks. Can of powder exploded down Baxter's chimney. Halliwell blown up by explosion of powder. Wilson's house blown up by quart of powder placed in cellar; whilst he, his wife, and children were in their beds. Unsuccessful attempt to blow down Firth's chimney. Attempt to blow down Wheatman and Smith's chimney with 24lbs. in can. Can of powder exploded in Holdsworth's cellar. Attempt to blow up Reaney's wheel. Powder exploded in Fearnough's cellar: a reward of £1,100 failed to elicit any information.

"File Grinders' Union.—Gillott's house blown up by powder thrown into cellar, whilst he, his wife, two children, and two apprentices were in bed. Torr's warehouse wrecked.

"Fork Grinders' Union.—Mason assaulted by 30 Union men, two only of whom were secured and fined. Three weeks afterwards powder was placed to blow up him and two companions.

"Brickmakers' Union.—17,000 of Robinson's bricks trampled upon and destroyed by night. His cow stabbed, and had to be killed. Attempt made to blow up house in which he, his wife, son, and four daughters were sleeping. Unsuccessful attempt to burn his haystack. One of his horses stabbed dead. About 45,000 of Bridge's bricks destroyed, with barrows and machinery.

"Scissors Grinders' Union.—Syke's machinery injured.

"Fender Grinders' Union.—Sibray, White, and Hulse assaulted by Union men. White left for dead. Attempt made to blow up Wastnidge's house. His wife shockingly burned. A poor woman lodger died from burns. No one punished."

It was needless to go on further with these quotations, but they showed outrages far more frightful than anything that had occurred in Ireland; and yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman brought in a Bill which would give six months' imprisonment, without the option of a fine or a jury; while in England only three months could be imposed, and the option of a fine was given. In face of this, it was said that the spirit of the Government was the same in both cases. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had made a declaration that he would deal with Ireland in a similar spirit as with England; and, that being so, he (Mr. Healy) trusted the Government would now accept some such Amendment as had been proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he deeply regretted that, when a Minister of the Crown stated what he intended to do, he should use such a vague and almost slang expression as "Boycotting." "Boycotting" conveyed no distinct impression, to his (Mr. Labouchere's) mind; and it might mean a great deal, or a very little. The first expression of opinion with regard to "Boycotting" was uttered by the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, who said that "Boycotting" was an offence, but was no crime. That opinion had also been expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who drew a definition between intimidation by threats and violence and intimidation by words, by means of exclusive dealing; and said that exclusive dealing was not a crime. The Secretary of State for the Home Department now said that "Boycotting" included exclusive dealing and something more; that it included putting a man "in Coventry," and that his object in that Bill was to put down "Boycotting" regarded in that wide sense. Whenever any hon. Member had sought to move an Amendment to the Bill the hon. and learned Attorney General for England had replied that a new principle of the Bill was being introduced. He (Mr. Labouchere) understood—and, as he believed himself, other hon. Members understood—the object of that Bill was to create a new tribunal to administer law in Ireland; and that the claim for that tribunal was that the law at present existing in Ireland could not be carried into effect. Now, however, the Secretary of State for the Home Department went further, and wished to create a new offence.

[Sixth Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that, no doubt, the first three clauses dealt with the new tribunal, and the other clauses referred to summary jurisdiction. Being out at night and articles in newspapers were, no doubt, new offences.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, it appeared that the Government were not only seeking to create new offences, but were doing more—they were seeking to make that an offence against the law in Ireland which was not an offence against the law in England. That appeared to him to be a monstrous proposal. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Being out at night.] That was a mere detail, because it was not the fact of being out at night that was an offence, but because it was the means of an offence. He supposed the Secretary of State for the Home Department did not consider it morally wrong for a man to be out at night. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Legally wrong.] Legally wrong, according to that Act. But the Government proposed that exclusive dealing should be legally wrong in Ireland, though morally right in England. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman was going to fight out that Bill upon these lines, the best thing the Irish Members could do would be to fight it out to the last. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that he would simply put into this Intimidation Clause what existed in the Act of 1875 with regard to intimidation as applied to Trades Unions, then he (Mr. Labouchere) thought the Bill might proceed quietly, and hon. Gentlemen opposite would make no objection to it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It is not necessary to do that, because the Act of 1875 applies equally to Ireland.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that was so; but cases were tried with a jury, and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that everything in the Act of 1875 should apply to cases in Ireland, then the Bill might be accepted. But what hon. Gentlemen opposite from Ireland objected to was this—making a crime in Ireland what was no crime in England. He (Mr. Labouchere) considered that the "Boycotting" that was pursued on the lines laid down by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) was, no doubt, disagreeable to those affected; but it was necessary in Ireland, and if the Irish people had not adopted it, they would never have obtained that small measure of justice which they had, so far, gained. The Government ought to explain what a man might do in Ireland, and what he might not do. Was it really to be said that if persons met together and said they declined to have any dealings or conversation with someone who acted in a particular way, they were to be taken before a stipendiary magistrate, and if the magistrate considered that the man avoided had been injured in his business or intimidated, those men should be put in prison for six months? If that really was the object of the Bill, then the Irish Members were right in fighting it out to the last. Such a law did not exist in England, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department would not attempt to apply it to England. Surely the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew that the system of sending a man to Coventry existed in England. Was he not aware that if any man was employed in a workshop who was not a member of the union those connected with the union would tell the employer that unless he dismissed this man they would leave his shop? Was not that intimidation? He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would do well to withdraw this clause at the present moment. He had said he was willing to accept Amendments, and it would be well for him now to discuss the clause with hon. Members opposite from Ireland, and with the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), and see whether it was not possible to lay down some clear terms with regard to intimidation. He might make it an offence to intimidate by acts of violence or by threats of violence; but not to make that a legal offence in Ireland which was not a legal offence in England.

MR. MARUM desired to call the attention of the Committee to the question exactly at present before them, and that was the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). That Amendment proposed that acts or threats of violence, or injury to person or property, or incitement thereto, should be intimidation. The hon. and learned Member wished that some criminal element should be inserted in the Statute. The framing of the Act was very peculiar in that respect. It stated that—

“The expression ‘intimidation’ included any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to, or loss of, his property, business, or means of living.”

There seemed to be a spirit of double meaning or double entendre in the expression “fear of loss of business, or means of living.” No doubt, a man might be in fear, in popular parlance, if he went on to the Turf or on to the Stock Exchange, and in fear of a loss of money, but that was not bodily fear; and it appeared to him (Mr. Marum) that there was a double meaning in this phraseology. Whatever the meaning might be, it was certain that the effect of the clause would be to create a crime where there was only civil loss or injury, without any criminal element proceeding from the acts or threats, as the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk wished to put it. If that sort of crime was allowed to be created, without any criminal element, what would be the effect? What sanctioned or regulated all our actions so much as the law of the land? The censorship of sound public opinion; and here, by this Bill, it was to be provided that ostracism, or the exercise of public opinion, should be penal. Supposing a man was in business, what was the strength of his position? It was the goodwill—the good opinion and respect of his neighbours. But if his neighbours agreed to exercise their opinion over him, this Bill would subject them to imprisonment. If individuals caused civil injuries without any criminal intent, and not as proceeding from threats or acts of violence, the party using that legitimate censorship—the sanction of public opinion, which might in its exercise produce loss of business—would be liable to punishment for crime. What mainly sustained the fabric of society was clearly the censorship of public opinion, and if not only that sanction of public opinion was actually taken away, but a countervailing sanction of principle—the sanction of the law was the penalty proposed in this Bill—was introduced, then the effect of public opinion would be neutralized, and they would be pulling down the edifice with one hand and trying to put it up with the other. The inherent defect of this clause was that the Government proposed to make any act which caused civil loss a crime. The objection of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk was to the creation or making of an offence, the element of which would cause loss or injury to the trade or business of an individual. If Ireland really required for its resuscitation such a sweeping and drastic measure as that now proposed, it would destroy the value of public opinion. If a clergyman felt it his duty to censure any particular individual for immoral conduct, it might be said, under the terms of the Bill, that the individual censured was so injured in his trade or business that the clergyman would come under the purview of the Act. It might be necessary that the words “wrongfully and without legal authority” would protect him; but the word “wrongfully” here seemed to be open to various interpretations. Was the word to be interpreted politically or morally? He should support the Amendment, believing that there ought to be some criminal element introduced to create a crime.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, in his opinion, there was some misunderstanding as to the nature of the Amendment. The Government proposed a clause somewhat different to the English Act, and the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) wished to provide that no prosecution should take place, except in the case of threats or acts of violence. He (Mr. T. C. Thompson) did not object to the substance of the enactment proposed by the Government; but he held that the Government were importing something into the matter which was not quite English, and that instead of adhering to the original plan, they ought to import the words “by acts or threats of violence, or injury to personal property.” It should be necessary that some act should be done. What was wanted was to punish something actually done—something like a positive act. He would not exclude “words” altogether, because threats were conveyed by means of words, and he did not exclude threatening letters. Threats spoken in the presence of a man and threatening letters sent were of the nature of acts. But there must be something definite that could be brought home to the man accused. The proposition of the Government violated some of the great principles of our law, because Acts of Parliament and decisions of Judges laid it down that a man should not be punished for mere words spoken. It would be found from research into the past that words spoken were never used as a means of convicting persons of treason. The whole policy and spirit of our principles of law was that we should not convict or punish a man for mere words. There must be something really written or done. The distinction was clear. An act could be clearly proved, whilst it was almost impossible to depend upon the accuracy of any report of "words spoken." They did not want to punish people for words; but, if the proposition of the Government was carried out, it would enable them to prosecute people for words repeated from one person to another; for suspicions in the mind of a policeman, which would make the liberty and position of the people less safe than it now was. He was glad to hear from the Government that they intended to propose that persons in such cases should have the privilege of appeal; that would be a great advantage. "Boycotting" seemed to be an offence peculiar to Ireland at present; but it must not be forgotten that "Boycotting" had always been regarded by the English Constitution as possible, because there were two or three cases in which "Boycotting" in England was specially prohibited. For instance, a carrier was, under all circumstances, bound to carry goods for all people; a publican was bound to receive every person into his hostelry and supply him with refreshment; a clergyman of the Church of England was bound to keep open his church to all comers; and it must, therefore, be supposed that the constitution of the English law contemplated "Boycotting." It contemplated that a carrier might refuse to carry for persons to whom he objected, that a publican might refuse to serve those he disliked, and that a clergyman might close the doors of his church against those whom he deemed hostile to his views. But the law says they shall not do such things. Therefore, looking at it in that way, they must conceive it possible that that great Empire had always looked to the possibility that men might combine together for trading purposes. He was one of those who looked forward to a future state of happiness for Ireland. He did not think it was likely that men would go on fighting for ever about agricultural matters. He thought that the time was coming very soon when the peasantry in Ireland would be content with their condition; that there would arise in Ireland great prosperity founded upon a great trade. The history of Ireland proved that England had been the ruin of Ireland by putting down trades to satisfy the greed of the predecessors of men whom he saw around him in that House. These men were continually engaged in contests with their workmen; and, in future, it would not be combinations of tenants against landlords that would arise, but combinations of employers against workmen, and then workmen might find themselves unfairly restricted by such an enactment as this. He hoped the Committee would remember that they were legislating not only for the present, but for the future; and anything done now would be quoted as a precedent in future, "in questions of merely trade disputes," when it would be said that such was the policy of the Empire in old times. He hoped the Committee would bear that in mind, and reject the clause as it stood.

[Sixth Night.]

Mr. T. C. Thompson

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had said that that clause was aimed at the practice of "Boycotting;" but it seemed to him that the clause would go very much further than "Boycotting." It took in the vague offence of intimidation, and where that would begin or end nobody could tell. It reminded him somewhat of the definition given by an enthusiastic American, who said the United States were bounded on the North by the Aurora Borealis, and on the West by the setting sun. This Act was not bounded even by the setting sun, with the moon and the stars added thereto, and he could not tell where the crime of "Boycotting" would begin or end, or what words might not be held by somebody to be calculated to terrify some man, or to affect his business. It would be very dangerous, under the Bill, to criticize a grocer, or a baker, who might take any part in public affairs. Grocers, bakers, publicans, and others were sometimes candidates for Town Commissionerships and for Poor Law Guardianships; but if any one of those was strongly opposed as untrustworthy or unfit for the post, and public opinion was excited against him, he might contend that his business had been injured by such opposition, and the people who had opposed him would be liable to prosecution. What would constitute intimidation had never yet been defined. Would nods, or winks, or black looks constitute "Boycotting"? It was said that a great deal might be conveyed by a nod, and it might happen that a man might say that his business had been injured through a word circulated, or a nod or wink passed—and prosecutions could be founded on such trivial things as those. Irish policemen had declared that they were offended by hearing a boy whistling "Harvey Duff," and one policeman had sworn that the whistling of "Harvey Duff" constituted abusive language. Abusive language would constitute intimidation, and he wanted to know where people were to be under this Act? They would simply be at the mercy of the Irish magistrates. It was all very well to speak of the spirit in which this Bill would be passed; but it was not by the spirit, but by the letter of the Act that the people of Ireland would be judged; they would be in the hands of magistrates and police, and it would not do to affect a reasonable and Constitutional spirit whilst this Bill was passing through the House. If the Government so greatly disliked intimidation and oppression, why did not they attempt to deal with the intimidation and oppression practised by landlords and agents? It was notorious that tenants had been intimidated into not doing things they had a legal right to do, and into doing things they had a legal right to abstain from doing. Severe and cruel intimidation had been applied to tenants in regard to their votes at elections at one time; and although the Ballot Act had put an end to that intimidation, it had not been made a crime for Irish landlords to intimidate tenants by the most cruel form of intimidation—namely, eviction, which was equivalent to starvation and death. Landlords intimidated tenants to send their children to proselytizing schools; would that be made an offence? A great deal had been said in condemnation of "Boycotting," and there had been some pathetic and moving descriptions of the sad results of "Boycotting." He (Mr. Sullivan) often wondered, when listening to arguments of that sort, why the tender feelings of the Secretary of State for the Home Department did not go all round the compass—why he was tender on one side on the subject, and had no compunction on the other. Why was it that the turning of people out of their houses did not excite the tender feelings of the right hon. and learned Gentleman? They had heard, as he had said, sad and moving descriptions of the condition of the alleged victims of "Boycotting;" they had heard sad accounts of the harm and injury resulting from "Boycotting;" but he (Mr. Sullivan) had never heard that any person had died in Ireland through "Boycotting." The practice of "Boycotting" was intended for the prevention of a very great evil. One of the curses of Ireland was the class of persons known as the "land-grabbers." The Irish landlords had some defence for their exaction of rack-rents, because of the existence of the Irish land-grabber. These men pounced upon evicted farms, no matter how the eviction had taken place. Very often a land-grabber went to a landlord before any eviction had taken place, and incited the landlord to evict his neighbour, because he coveted his little plot. These men were the curse of the country, and it was little wonder that the people tried to think of or devise some means of checking their ravages. What system did they advise? What system did the Land League recommend? It said, "Treat these men as obnoxious—treat these men as unworthy of social communication. Do not shoot them—do not fire into their houses—do not kill or maim their cattle—simply shun them. Shun them at the fair—shun them in the market—have nothing to do with them—show that you dislike them and their conduct." He thought that very good advice. He gave that advice himself, and he was not ashamed or afraid to confess it. He thought it was the fairest and best means that could be devised of dealing with a class of public enemies whom the law would not touch, and who were a peril to the peace and well-being of Ireland. He hoped the Irish people would adhere to that system. He hoped they would abstain from violence of any kind. They were never advised by the Land League to have recourse to violence. They were warned and cautioned against it; but to regard that class of persons as obnoxious, and as enemies of the public welfare, without having any recourse to violence or criminality. He hoped that feeling and sentiment would survive amongst the Irish people. He believed it was too late to come out and endeavour to make the land-grabber a popular man. It was too late to come and ask the Irish people to bow and smile to him, and, as some people might expect of them, take off their hats to him. It was too late to expect them to submit to slavery or tyranny from any class. He had been speaking of intimidation practised by landlords, agents, and others, and let him mention one instance of such intimidation. He was informed by a clergyman, in the county he represented, that not long ago a landlord in that part of the county passed on the road a young man who did not salute him by taking off his hat. On the following day the landlord sent for the farmer, and told him to send the young fellow out of the country, or he, the farmer, should go out of his farm. The young man was sent to America, because the farmer did not wish to lose his land. That young man would grow up; but what must be his opinion of English law? Was not that intimidation? There was no law to touch it. If this clause would meet intimidation all round, he would have no objection to it; but he knew it would be worked against the people, and it would not touch the real terrorism and violence in Ireland—the terrorism of the landlord and of the police. He should do his best to oppose this clause at every stage.

[Sixth Night.]

DR. COMMINS said, he disapproved as much as any hon. Member of the House of some acts that had been done under the name and guise of "Boycotting;" but, at the same time, he must dissent quite as widely from the provisions of this section, which had been introduced, as the Secretary of State for the Home Department told them, for the purpose of putting down "Boycotting." The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) provided a remedy for one of the greatest flaws in this section. Admitted that it was perfectly right to put down anything that inflicted a grievous wrong upon any subject of the Crown, still they were entitled to know what were these acts which were to be put down. It would not do to say we mean to put down "Boycotting." "Boycotting"

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

was a force unknown to the law. It was a phrase upon the interpretation of which no two persons would agree. Some would consider "Boycotting" nothing more than the right of passive resistance, as the last resort of the oppressed in that country—a resort that the Irish tenant was quite as much entitled to as any other oppressed individual in any part of the world. Others might consider that "Boycotting" amounted to something like intimidation—something like putting a person in bodily fear, which, though not always an offence within the law of England, had, recently, in certain cases, been allowed to be an offence. The first difficulty that occurred to him was, what was it that this section proposed to do? One thing they knew it proposed to do, and that was to interfere with every act of life of one section of the Irish people. Nobody imagined—no hon. Member in that House imagined—that this section, or any part of it, was intended to meet the emergency, or what was known as the "Crowbar Brigade." It was an undeniable fact that it was only intended, that it was intended to be aimed and used against those who constituted the recently-deceased Land League, or against those who sympathized with the tenants in their attempt to get rid of the odious system of landlordism, which had been the ruin of the country. The clause was intended to prevent them from doing acts which they had a perfect right to do. Any single act of a man's life, however insignificant, might be brought within this section, unless there was some restriction made, such as was proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. Not a word a man could speak, not even a wink on his part, not a single manifestation of his will, but could be interpreted by somebody into an act of intimidation. This section provided that not only was a person liable to the provisions of the Act who intimidated, but that the person who incited another to intimidate was equally liable. Incitement might be given by a wink; it might be given by a signal; it might be given by standing at ease; and doing anything at all might be alleged to be in pursuance of some arrangement; and, consequently, he maintained that, under this section, there was not one single act of a human being's life in

Ireland, which could be described or put into words, which the fragmentary deposition of a policeman, or of an interested informer, might not construe into a transgression of this section, as it at present stood. It had been said that it was introducing no new principle. That was the argument that was deduced by several hon. Members who spoke last night; but the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant candidly admitted that it was introducing a new principle, although he had not condescended to tell the Committee what the new principle was. He told them it was intended to put down "Boycotting"—intended to put down crimes which consisted of refusing to supply people with goods; by refusing to work for them. That was introducing a new principle; and it was not only introducing a new principle, but it was violating the admitted principle of the law as it at present stood. The authority of the Prime Minister had been appealed to in support of the proposition that "exclusive dealing" was not illegal, and the Prime Minister himself repudiated the insinuation that he considered exclusive dealing legal. He (Dr. Commins) appealed to a higher authority than the Prime Minister, and that was the authority of the law, as contained in the Statute Book. They knew that the principle of exclusive dealing was the right assumed by persons to confederate and combine, and agree one with the other to avoid dealing with certain persons, to avoid entering into their employ, and to induce others to keep out of their employ. That was the meaning of exclusive dealing, and all that had not only been legalized, but at this moment there was a Statute to that effect, which the Prime Minister, with all his power and his majority at his back, dare not lay a finger upon. The Trades' Union Act of 1871 expressly legalized every one of these acts. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, alluding to this subject, last night, said it was a peculiarity of the law of England that acts which individuals would be perfectly justified in doing would not be justifiable if persons conspired and combined together to do them. That might be true to a certain extent. The Trades' Unions Act of 1871, which, unfortunately, did not apply to Ireland, said, in Section 2—

"The purposes of any trades' union shall, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render any member of such trades' union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise."

That expressly legalized exclusive dealing. That section permitted members of Trades' Unions to make agreements not to deal with persons outside the Union; but to deal only with such persons as they might consider desirable to deal with in the interests of their trade. Hon. Members knew what "blacking" a shop was. Trades' Unions were really registered Unions; for they might get the sanction of the law for their rules. They might actually get legal facilities for the carrying out of those very rules, although they were manifestly in favour of a restricted trade. Let him give the Committee an instance of what was constantly occurring in manufacturing districts. The manufacturer, who was not a member of the Union, broke one of the rules, and the consequence was that his shop was blacked. What was done in that case? The very Act which had been cited so very often made it legal for Trades' Unions to place persons outside of that shop and watch who went in and who came out of it, to get information. If a member of any Trades' Union of England was found going into such a blacked shop, he was "Boycotted." He was expelled from their Union; he lost all the benefits of the Union; he lost the money he had put into it; and if he happened to lose the work in the particular shop in which he had offended against the rules, he might find it almost impossible to get any other employment in England. That was what the law of England said it was legal and just and proper to do. Section 3 of the Act of 1871 said—

"The purposes of any trades' union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust."

And the 4th section provided that—

"Though actions might not be brought upon agreements between members of trades' unions, as to the conditions on which members would carry on business, who they would sell to or refuse to sell to, or whom they should employ, to pay fines imposed on members by Courts of Justice, strike pay, &c., or for the collection of funds for these purposes, or agreement between one another for these purposes, even by bond, that nothing in the Act shall make any such agreement unlawful."

[Sixth Night.]

Here was a deliberate sanction given to the acts that were proposed to be rendered so criminal in Ireland. It was because of such acts people would be rendered liable to prosecution. Under this section they were asking for some safeguard against abuse of the clause. A person might be apprehended at the whim of some man who considered that his business or his prospects in life were in some way interfered with by a mere act, or nod, or word, which he might interpret in his own way, and, in consequence, consider himself justified in instituting a most oppressive prosecution. One of the greatest evils that could exist in any country was an indefinite definition of the Criminal Law. No country could have liberty—no country could have real protection, or political or personal liberty, if the Criminal Law did not clearly and distinctly define what it was that were crimes, and what it was for which they might not be subjected to penalty, or pains, or punishment, or forfeiture. In this case there was no definition whatever. Even if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk were accepted the clause would still be indefinite. The clause would be such as to leave it at the discretion of the person who made the accusation, and at the discretion of the magistrate who heard the accusation, to say what would be an offence under the Act, and what would not. Even if the people in Ireland had confidence in the administration of the law—and unfortunately they had not, and the confidence in the administration of the law became less and less the lower they descended—this section would work very unfairly and unsatisfactorily. Amongst all right-thinking and unprejudiced people there was a feeling that the higher functionaries of the law in Ireland were deserving of the highest confidence. There was most absolute, entire, and complete confidence in the impartiality and justice of the Lord Chancellor, for instance, and there were other Members of the Irish Bench deserving of a similar tribute for their honesty and integrity. But there were some in whom the people had no confidence whatever, and that want of confidence increased as they descended in the social scale. Amongst some of those on the lowest step of the ladder there was not only no confidence in the administrators of the law, but absolutely an unqualified distrust. They had heard the names of certain individuals mentioned too frequently in the debates in that House, and he would not be so invidious as to mention those names again; but it was a patent and undeniable fact that one of the crying evils of Ireland had always been the want of confidence of the people in those who had to administer the law, particularly those in subordinate positions. A want of confidence would vitiate provisions, such as those contained in this clause, which gave no definition of crime, but which left it entirely subject to the construction of the person, however prejudiced and however unskilled in construing Acts of Parliament. Many of the Irish magistrates were totally unfitted.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is alluding to a subsequent part of the Act, which provides that the magistrates are to administer the law; his remarks, therefore, have no bearing upon the present Amendment.

DR. COMMINS apologized, and said, he was perfectly willing to restrain his observations in the direction indicated by the Chairman. One of his chief objections to this section was the indefinite nature of it. It was almost impossible for any man to say what would fall under the clause and what would not, and he thought it was quite legitimate on his part to point out that that indefiniteness was made all the worse by the character of the persons who would have to administer the Act. However, he would retain anything he had to say on this matter until the clause providing for the appointment of magistrates to administer the law came under discussion. He maintained that it was essentially necessary to introduce some element to guide the construction of the law by these unskilled, and in many cases unprofessional magistrates—some element that could be appealed to, and some element that had already existed in the law. That element the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk proposed to introduce by the Amendment they were now discussing. For these reasons he supported the Amendment most heartily. He supported it because it would tend to limit the mischief that this section must undoubtedly achieve; he supported it because it would tend to preserve to the people of Ireland the last remnant of Constitutional liberty—the privilege of merely condemning men whom they felt to be the ruin of the country; men who had degraded and impoverished their country—he supported it because it would allow the people to have recourse to a passive resistance to their oppressors by leaving them “severely alone.”

MR. BRYCE said, he thought that any one who attempted to discuss this clause must begin by admitting that some such clause was absolutely necessary. Hon. Members sitting on the Liberal side of the House could have no doubt at all that an ample case had been made out for a clause of this kind. The only doubt that could exist in their minds was how far that clause should go. They hardly needed the very powerful statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland to cause them to believe that the practice of intimidation and of “Boycotting” had been carried on to a point in Ireland which had been one of the chief difficulties in the government of that country; and he thought that everyone on the Ministerial side of the House would agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that this clause should be passed in a shape which would enable it to deal with “Boycotting” as it was practised at present in Ireland. But having said that, he thought they must make some deductions, they must enter upon some further considerations, before they could accept the clause as it stood. There seemed to be three principles which ought to govern their conduct in determining the wording of the clause. In the first place, it ought not to go beyond what was necessary for dealing with the evil; secondly, it ought not to include anything which in the ordinary sense was not a criminal offence; and, thirdly, it ought, if possible, to keep within the same lines as the English law. He thought that they might take these principles to guide them in their consideration of this matter. Let them consider how far the clause went. They were much indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, not only for the very moderate and temperate speech he had delivered, but for the way in which he had narrowed down the point at issue. The point was a difficult, yet a comparatively small one. The point at issue seemed to lie entirely—he hoped the Chairman would not think him out of order in referring to this subsequent part of the clause, because, to him, it seemed essential to do so if they were to deal with the matter fairly and honestly—the point at issue seemed to lie in the last line of the clause—namely, in the words “or in fear of any injury to, or loss of his property, business, or means of living;” and the question which the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) raised was, substantially, whether these lines should remain in the clause. They were pretty well agreed that the practice of “Boycotting” or intimidation should be checked and stopped, so far as it went in the direction of personal injury to the person intimidated, or to any member of his family, or person in his employment; but the question was whether the definition should go on to include cases of exclusive dealing. They ought carefully to define whether they meant “Boycotting” unaccompanied by personal violence, or “Boycotting” which consisted of exclusive dealing to be dealt with by the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as he (Mr. Bryce) understood, did not mean to say that he considered every case of “Boycotting” was necessarily wrong, or rather that every case of exclusive dealing ought necessarily to be taken as punishable under this Act. He thought they might take it that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was of opinion that if a man refused to supply groceries to another man, his refusal would not necessarily amount to intimidation. He submitted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the words in the Bill, as they stood, would cover every case of exclusive dealing.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the last section of the clause was in explanation of the words as to intimidation at the commencement, and that the whole was governed by the Clauses “a” and “b,” which denoted the purposes of intimidation.

MR. BRYCE was much obliged to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the explanation. He confessed he had rather assumed, perhaps wrongly, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman intended to say it would depend upon the circumstances of the case whether exclusive dealing should or should not without having any recourse to violence or criminality. He hoped that feeling and sentiment would survive amongst the Irish people. He believed it was too late to come out and endeavour to make the land-grabber a popular man. It was too late to come and ask the Irish people to bow and smile to him, and, as some people might expect of them, take off their hats to him. It was too late to expect them to submit to slavery or tyranny from any class. He had been speaking of intimidation practised by landlords, agents, and others, and let him mention one instance of such intimidation. He was informed by a clergyman, in the county he represented, that not long ago a landlord in that part of the county passed on the road a young man who did not salute him by taking off his hat. On the following day the landlord sent for the farmer, and told him to send the young fellow out of the country, or he, the farmer, should go out of his farm. The young man was sent to America, because the farmer did not wish to lose his land. That young man would grow up; but what must be his opinion of English law? Was not that intimidation? There was no law to touch it. If this clause would meet intimidation all round, he would have no objection to it; but he knew it would be worked against the people, and it would not touch the real terrorism and violence in Ireland—the terrorism of the landlord and of the police. He should do his best to oppose this clause at every stage.

DR. COMMINS said, he disapproved as much as any hon. Member of the House of some acts that had been done under the name and guise of "Boycotting;" but, at the same time, he must dissent quite as widely from the provisions of this section, which had been introduced, as the Secretary of State for the Home Department told them, for the purpose of putting down "Boycotting." The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) provided a remedy for one of the greatest flaws in this section. Admitted that it was perfectly right to put down anything that inflicted a grievous wrong upon any subject of the Crown, still they were entitled to know what were these acts which were to be put down. It would not do to say we mean to put down "Boycotting." "Boycotting"

Mr. T. D. Sullivan

was a force unknown to the law. It was a phrase upon the interpretation of which no two persons would agree. Some would consider "Boycotting" nothing more than the right of passive resistance, as the last resort of the oppressed in that country—a resort that the Irish tenant was quite as much entitled to as any other oppressed individual in any part of the world. Others might consider that "Boycotting" amounted to something like intimidation—something like putting a person in bodily fear, which, though not always an offence within the law of England, had, recently, in certain cases, been allowed to be an offence. The first difficulty that occurred to him was, what was it that this section proposed to do, and that was to interfere with every act of life of one section of the Irish people. Nobody imagined—no hon. Member in that House imagined—that this section, or any part of it, was intended to meet the emergency, or what was known as the "Crowbar Brigade." It was an undeniable fact that it was only intended, that it was intended to be aimed and used against those who constituted the recently-deceased Land League, or against those who sympathized with the tenants in their attempt to get rid of the odious system of landlordism, which had been the ruin of the country. The clause was intended to prevent them from doing acts which they had a perfect right to do. Any single act of a man's life, however insignificant, might be brought within this section, unless there was some restriction made, such as was proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. Not a word a man could speak, not even a wink on his part, not a single manifestation of his will, but could be interpreted by somebody into an act of intimidation. This section provided that not only was a person liable to the provisions of the Act who intimidated, but that the person who incited another to intimidate was equally liable. Incitement might be given by a wink; it might be given by a signal; it might be given by standing at ease; and doing anything at all might be alleged to be in pursuance of some arrangement; and, consequently, he maintained that, under this section, there was not one single act of a human being's life in

Ireland, which could be described or put into words, which the fragmentary deposition of a policeman, or of an interested informer, might not construe into a transgression of this section, as it at present stood. It had been said that it was introducing no new principle. That was the argument that was deduced by several hon. Members who spoke last night; but the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant candidly admitted that it was introducing a new principle, although he had not condescended to tell the Committee what the new principle was. He told them it was intended to put down "Boycotting"—intended to put down crimes which consisted of refusing to supply people with goods; by refusing to work for them. That was introducing a new principle; and it was not only introducing a new principle, but it was violating the admitted principle of the law as it at present stood. The authority of the Prime Minister had been appealed to in support of the proposition that "exclusive dealing" was not illegal, and the Prime Minister himself repudiated the insinuation that he considered exclusive dealing legal. He (Dr. Commins) appealed to a higher authority than the Prime Minister, and that was the authority of the law, as contained in the Statute Book. They knew that the principle of exclusive dealing was the right assumed by persons to confederate and combine, and agree one with the other to avoid dealing with certain persons, to avoid entering into their employ, and to induce others to keep out of their employ. That was the meaning of exclusive dealing, and all that had not only been legalized, but at this moment there was a Statute to that effect, which the Prime Minister, with all his power and his majority at his back, dare not lay a finger upon. The Trades' Union Act of 1871 expressly legalized every one of these acts. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, alluding to this subject, last night, said it was a peculiarity of the law of England that acts which individuals would be perfectly justified in doing would not be justifiable if persons conspired and combined together to do them. That might be true to a certain extent. The Trades' Unions Act of 1871, which, unfortunately, did not apply to Ireland, said, in Section 2—

"The purposes of any trades' union shall, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render any member of such trades' union liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise."

That expressly legalized exclusive dealing. That section permitted members of Trades' Unions to make agreements not to deal with persons outside the Union; but to deal only with such persons as they might consider desirable to deal with in the interests of their trade. Hon. Members knew what "blacking" a shop was. Trades' Unions were really registered Unions; for they might get the sanction of the law for their rules. They might actually get legal facilities for the carrying out of those very rules, although they were manifestly in favour of a restricted trade. Let him give the Committee an instance of what was constantly occurring in manufacturing districts. The manufacturer, who was not a member of the Union, broke one of the rules, and the consequence was that his shop was blacked. What was done in that case? The very Act which had been cited so very often made it legal for Trades' Unions to place persons outside of that shop and watch who went in and who came out of it, to get information. If a member of any Trades' Union of England was found going into such a blacked shop, he was "Boycotted." He was expelled from their Union; he lost all the benefits of the Union; he lost the money he had put into it; and if he happened to lose the work in the particular shop in which he had offended against the rules, he might find it almost impossible to get any other employment in England. That was what the law of England said it was legal and just and proper to do. Section 3 of the Act of 1871 said—

"The purposes of any trades' union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust."

And the 4th section provided that—

"Though actions might not be brought upon agreements between members of trades' unions, as to the conditions on which members would carry on business, who they would sell to or refuse to sell to, or whom they should employ, to pay fines imposed on members by Courts of Justice, strike pay, &c., or for the collection of funds for these purposes, or agreement between one another for these purposes, even by bond, that nothing in the Act shall make any such agreement unlawful."

[Sixth Night.]

Here was a deliberate sanction given to the acts that were proposed to be rendered so criminal in Ireland. It was because of such acts people would be rendered liable to prosecution. Under this section they were asking for some safeguard against abuse of the clause. A person might be apprehended at the whim of some man who considered that his business or his prospects in life were in some way interfered with by a mere act, or nod, or word, which he might interpret in his own way, and, in consequence, consider himself justified in instituting a most oppressive prosecution. One of the greatest evils that could exist in any country was an indefinite definition of the Criminal Law. No country could have liberty—no country could have real protection, or political or personal liberty, if the Criminal Law did not clearly and distinctly define what it was that were crimes, and what it was for which they might not be subjected to penalty, or pains, or punishment, or forfeiture. In this case there was no definition whatever. Even if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk were accepted the clause would still be indefinite. The clause would be such as to leave it at the discretion of the person who made the accusation, and at the discretion of the magistrate who heard the accusation, to say what would be an offence under the Act, and what would not. Even if the people in Ireland had confidence in the administration of the law—and unfortunately they had not, and the confidence in the administration of the law became less and less the lower they descended—this section would work very unfairly and unsatisfactorily. Amongst all right-thinking and unprejudiced people there was a feeling that the higher functionaries of the law in Ireland were deserving of the highest confidence. There was most absolute, entire, and complete confidence in the impartiality and justice of the Lord Chancellor, for instance, and there were other Members of the Irish Bench deserving of a similar tribute for their honesty and integrity. But there were some in whom the people had no confidence whatever, and that want of confidence increased as they descended in the social scale. Amongst some of those on the lowest step of the ladder there was not only no confidence in the administrators of the law, but absolutely an unqualified distrust. They had heard the names of certain individuals mentioned too frequently in the debates in that House, and he would not be so invidious as to mention those names again; but it was a patent and undeniable fact that one of the crying evils of Ireland had always been the want of confidence of the people in those who had to administer the law, particularly those in subordinate positions. A want of confidence would vitiate provisions, such as those contained in this clause, which gave no definition of crime, but which left it entirely subject to the construction of the person, however prejudiced and however unskilled in construing Acts of Parliament. Many of the Irish magistrates were totally unfitted.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is alluding to a subsequent part of the Act, which provides that the magistrates are to administer the law; his remarks, therefore, have no bearing upon the present Amendment.

DR. COMMINS apologized, and said, he was perfectly willing to restrain his observations in the direction indicated by the Chairman. One of his chief objections to this section was the indefinite nature of it. It was almost impossible for any man to say what would fall under the clause and what would not, and he thought it was quite legitimate on his part to point out that that indefiniteness was made all the worse by the character of the persons who would have to administer the Act. However, he would retain anything he had to say on this matter until the clause providing for the appointment of magistrates to administer the law came under discussion. He maintained that it was essentially necessary to introduce some element to guide the construction of the law by these unskilled, and in many cases unprofessional magistrates—some element that could be appealed to, and some element that had already existed in the law. That element the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk proposed to introduce by the Amendment they were now discussing. For these reasons he supported the Amendment most heartily. He supported it because it would tend to limit the mischief that this section must undoubtedly achieve; he supported it because it would tend to preserve to the people of Ireland the last remnant of Constitutional liberty—the privilege of merely condemning men whom they felt to be the ruin of the country; men who had degraded and impoverished their country—he supported it because it would allow the people to have recourse to a passive resistance to their oppressors by leaving them “severely alone.”

MR. BRYCE said, he thought that any one who attempted to discuss this clause must begin by admitting that some such clause was absolutely necessary. Hon. Members sitting on the Liberal side of the House could have no doubt at all that an ample case had been made out for a clause of this kind. The only doubt that could exist in their minds was how far that clause should go. They hardly needed the very powerful statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland to cause them to believe that the practice of intimidation and of “Boycotting” had been carried on to a point in Ireland which had been one of the chief difficulties in the government of that country; and he thought that everyone on the Ministerial side of the House would agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that this clause should be passed in a shape which would enable it to deal with “Boycotting” as it was practised at present in Ireland. But having said that, he thought they must make some deductions, they must enter upon some further considerations, before they could accept the clause as it stood. There seemed to be three principles which ought to govern their conduct in determining the wording of the clause. In the first place, it ought not to go beyond what was necessary for dealing with the evil; secondly, it ought not to include anything which in the ordinary sense was not a criminal offence; and, thirdly, it ought, if possible, to keep within the same lines as the English law. He thought that they might take these principles to guide them in their consideration of this matter. Let them consider how far the clause went. They were much indebted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, not only for the very moderate and temperate speech he had delivered, but for the way in which he had narrowed down the point at issue. The point was a difficult, yet a comparatively small one. The point at issue seemed to lie entirely—he hoped the Chairman would not think him out of order in referring to this subsequent part of the clause, because, to him, it seemed essential to do so if they were to deal with the matter fairly and honestly—the point at issue seemed to lie in the last line of the clause—namely, in the words “or in fear of any injury to, or loss of his property, business, or means of living;” and the question which the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) raised was, substantially, whether these lines should remain in the clause. They were pretty well agreed that the practice of “Boycotting” or intimidation should be checked and stopped, so far as it went in the direction of personal injury to the person intimidated, or to any member of his family, or person in his employment; but the question was whether the definition should go on to include cases of exclusive dealing. They ought carefully to define whether they meant “Boycotting” unaccompanied by personal violence, or “Boycotting” which consisted of exclusive dealing to be dealt with by the clause. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, as far as he (Mr. Bryce) understood, did not mean to say that he considered every case of “Boycotting” was necessarily wrong, or rather that every case of exclusive dealing ought necessarily to be taken as punishable under this Act. He thought they might take it that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was of opinion that if a man refused to supply groceries to another man, his refusal would not necessarily amount to intimidation. He submitted to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the words in the Bill, as they stood, would cover every case of exclusive dealing.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that the last section of the clause was in explanation of the words as to intimidation at the commencement, and that the whole was governed by the Clauses “a” and “b,” which denoted the purposes of intimidation.

MR. BRYCE was much obliged to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the explanation. He confessed he had rather assumed, perhaps wrongly, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman intended to say it would depend upon the circumstances of the case whether exclusive dealing should or should not be considered an offence. It appeared to him (Mr. Bryce), that even in cases where words spoken or acts done were directed to the objects set forth in the Sub-sections "a" and "b," nevertheless, if those acts or words amounted merely to expressions of an intention not to deal, such expressions were not necessarily always, though they might be sometimes, wrongful, and therefore punishable acts. One was justified, he thought, in considering matters of this kind, to put extreme cases. In dealing with penal Statutes, they had the right to require that they should not be extended to acts which would not, in the ordinary understanding of men, be acts which ought to be punished. If they included in that definition things which the ordinary sense of man rejected as not amounting to acts of intimidation, instead of clarifying the law, they would obscure it. The object of a definition ought to be to make the law more clear; but this attempt at definition would make it more difficult. Now, suppose that at the time of a Parliamentary or other election, the wife of a clergyman went to a dairyman and told him that if he canvassed for the Liberal candidate she would take no more butter from him, and that she believed there were many good Churchmen who would do the same, such a case would come within this definition, for these would be words spoken which would be intended to put a man in fear of loss of business or means of living. They knew that "Boycotting" in this sense was very largely used both in England and Ireland; and even the Ballot Act had not wholly prevented it. They knew that persons were prevented from taking an active part in elections owing to such representations, and yet no one supposed that an act of that kind should be punishable by six months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour, on summary conviction. Suppose that in a country town there was going to be a general holiday, and all the shopkeepers except one were willing to give their employés a holiday. If a man or men went to the one shopkeeper who declined to close his shop, and said, "If you do not close we will deal with you no longer," such words would come within the meaning of this definition, because they would put the man in fear of loss of business, and the words would have been spoken with the view of influencing his action. Yet no one could suppose that the man or men who had approached him in that spirit should be committed to gaol for six months. They knew perfectly well that at the Bar, if a counsel habitually took lower fees than his brethren, or otherwise infringed various professional rules, they refused to hold any briefs along with him. That remedy against others who disobeyed the unwritten law of the Bar was thoroughly established by usage, and yet it would clearly come within the terms of this definition. He did not suggest these difficulties for the sake of making the solution of the question any more difficult. His object was rather to narrow the point, and endeavour to get hon. Gentlemen to address their minds to the solution in the proper manner. He could not say they could go so far as to support the Amendment, because it appeared to him that the Amendment would go the length of allowing all kinds of exclusive dealing to be practised with impunity. He was bound to say that the case made out by the Government was that they must deal with exclusive dealing in its more aggravated forms; and he thought that anyone who had experience of Irish affairs would admit that they would not be fairly grappling with the evil if they did not endeavour to prevent "Boycotting" in its extreme and unjustifiable form. He found a great difficulty in saying exactly what the solution of the case should be. He did not pretend to be more competent to solve the problem than any other hon. Member; but he would venture to throw out one or two suggestions to the Government, which, he thought, would ease the difficulty they felt in regard to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. It would be well if the Government would give some indication of the view they intended to take, or of the proposition they intended to make, in this matter. He would suggest, as one alternative, that the Government should omit the definition which began with line 25—namely,

"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Mr. Bryce

This suggestion was, no doubt, open to the objection that this Act would have to be administered by Resident Magistrates, who were not all professional men. Of course, that objection was diminished by the undertaking of the Government to give an appeal; but, still, it was too much to expect the Resident Magistrates of Ireland to interpret what intimidation was and what it was not, and he was reminded that the appeal allowed was only one to the Court of Quarter Sessions, which, after all, was not a Court of high legal authority. His second suggestion was that the Government might rely sufficiently upon the word "conspiracy;" in other words, that they should not think it necessary to deal with acts or words imparting an intention to have exclusive dealing with isolated individuals. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had said that the practice of "Boycotting" was largely associated with terrorism. That was true; but it had another bearing on the case, and that was that in the majority of cases you could punish a man for an act of terrorism, which act would clearly be within the purview of the clause, apart from those words he (Mr. Bryce) proposed to strike out. He suggested that the Government would do well to rely upon the word "conspiracy" instead of upon the words "acts or words," so that they should make it an offence for a man to conspire with any other person or persons to intimidate any person by putting him in fear of the loss of his property, business, or means of living. He thought that in that way they would not make exclusive dealing a criminal act, but that they would make a combination or a conspiracy to injure a man, by exclusive dealing, a criminal act, and would bring it within the Summary Jurisdiction Clause of the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he might observe that that was part of the principle of the Act of 1875.

MR. BRYCE said, it was perfectly true; but, at the same time, the Committee would recollect that in the Act of 1875 the particular point they were now considering did not arise, because there was no provision in that Act referring to exclusive dealing. The limitation to the conspiracy or combination which he (Mr. Bryce) ventured to suggest, would only apply to cases arising under the last words of the clause. His object in making this suggestion was to strike at the combination or conspiracy to deal exclusively in order to injure a man in his property, his business, or means of living. The third solution he would propose was to omit altogether the last words, "or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living." And the last suggestion he would make was that the definition in lines 25 to 29 might be, to some extent, qualified by adding the words which the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had put down in an Amendment. He was not sure whether the Government were prepared to accept any part of that Amendment; but he thought it was one which formed an excellent basis for inserting a qualification such as would somewhat relax the stringency of the clause. The Amendment of the hon. Member (Mr. Healy) was to insert, after the word "living," in line 29—

"Provided, That no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either; and no declaration of the intention not to so deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing, shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

Those words were, no doubt, very extensive, and he was not prepared to say that they were not too extensive. He was inclined to think, however, that the words suggested by the hon. Member for Wexford might, with certain modifications, prove a solution of the difficulty that now confronted them. It must be remembered that the law was to be administered by persons who were not always skilled lawyers, so that caution was particularly needed; and, therefore, he thought that if the Government would endeavour to mitigate the too great width and severity of the last words of the clause in some way or other, they would find a very general disposition on the Liberal side of the House to support them in the clause as a whole.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not intend to go over any part of the ground which the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Home Department had dealt with in their very able speeches. He only wished to make a very few observations on what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). The hon. and learned Gentleman had, no doubt, treated the matter with a great deal of acumen and ingenuity; but if the Committee adopted his views, they would really whittle away and emasculate the clause of its most necessary and vital provisions. The hon. and learned Member frankly admitted that his object was to get rid of the words at the end of the clause; words which, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, were the very essence of the clause, and without which the clause would be of no avail.

MR. BRYCE asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to allow him to explain. He thought that, at the commencement of his remarks, he disclaimed any intention of emasculating that clause. He did not think that the only solution was to get rid of the words "or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living;" but he certainly desired, if they were retained, to qualify them so as to prevent them working unjustly.

MR. PLUNKET understood that one of the proposals of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and the one which he put first, was to really get rid of the words altogether by their omission. He wished to contrast the view which was put forward by the hon. and learned Member, which he ventured to say was the view of a doctrinarian, with the view put forward by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with the consent of the Government—the Government which was responsible for the peace of Ireland—the view of the right hon. Gentleman was, that this part of the clause was absolutely essential. He (Mr. Plunket) would not dwell upon the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member, that certain acts done at an election time, that certain acts done on the occasion of a village entertainment, or something of that kind, might possibly be brought as offences within the purview of this Act. There was not an Act of Parliament that had ever been passed about which they might not suggest some improper application of its provisions; but he really thought that those who used such expressions as these took a trifling view of the case when they suggested the possibility of the measure being applied at the time and in the way which they had indicated. The hon. and learned Member suggested that the Government should deal with conspiracy alone. That was just the very thing that it would be useless to rely upon as being dealt with in this case. How were they going to prove conspiracy? It was because they could prove an individual act, where they could not prove conspiracy, that the clause was framed in this way, and that the admirable precedent of the Act of 1875 had been followed. Why was it that those words were introduced in the Act of 1875? For two obvious purposes. In the first place, to direct and assist the Court in the performance of its duties; and, in the second place, to inform the persons, who might otherwise make themselves amenable, to the consequences of a law which created a new offence. The hon. and learned Member, at the close of his speech, said it struck him as very odd to leave these things at the mere discretion of the Resident Magistrates, who had to make the inquiries, and who might not even be lawyers. In the first place, the clause gave a magistrate a clear indication of the character of the offence with which he had to deal; and, in the second place, it gave a fair warning to those persons who might otherwise be affected by the operation of the new law. The Act of 1875 was intended to meet a most remarkable instance of a new difficulty, with which it was necessary to deal, on account of conspiracy—perhaps conspiracy by the isolated act of an individual instead of a number of individuals. The object of the present clause was to deal with even more subtle and more novel offences than were even contemplated by the Act of 1875. He would like to remind the Committee, before the debate proceeded any further, of the view which was taken of the question of intimidation by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Last night, when speaking of the very words to which the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets now objected, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"The words 'business or means of living' were all-important, and could not be omitted from the clause without upsetting the main purpose for which it was intended. The clause was directed against the systematic nature of 'Boycotting,' which was carried out at the price of serious suffering to individuals. This system of 'Boycotting' was almost inextricably mixed up with the grosser forms of terrorism, and inflicted extreme hardship and cruelty—cruelty which frequently followed men very far indeed."

Mr. Plunket

These were the words of the official exponent of the views of the Government in bringing this clause before the Committee, and he (Mr. Plunket) did intreat the Committee and the Government to pause before depriving the Government of Ireland of the power they now sought by accepting any such suggestion as that of the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Bryce). It was quite idle to suppose that "Boycotting" had been carried out in Ireland entirely and only by violence or threats—violence either to the individual himself, or to any member of his family. No; the worst and the cruellest forms of "Boycotting" were those which had made a man's life not worth living; those which had ruined his prospects, which had effaced all the results of a long and honourable life; and those forms of "Boycotting" had been directed against those members of the community who least deserved to be treated in that manner, and they had been made use of for the purpose of forcing men to act in a manner dishonourable to themselves, and contrary to all the teaching of morality and religion. It was exactly this subtle and new invention, this terrible weapon with which they had armed themselves, that it was necessary to strike from the hands of the leaders of this movement in Ireland. These were the reasons which he thought ought to weigh with hon. Gentlemen, even if they had not been reinforced by the observations of some of the hon. Members from Ireland sitting below the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House that day. He did not wish to comment upon it at the time, as he did not wish to introduce matters of controversy there; but he wished to put this view to the Committee. Whatever they might think of the various ways of dealing with this matter if the clause had never been proposed in its present form, what did they think would be the effect if they now struck out those words from the clause? Why, the effect would certainly be that the people of Ireland would be told that this attempt to put down this species of "Boycotting" had been rejected by the House of Commons. That would be the effect in regard to the people; but what would be the effect upon the Court? In what position would the Resident Magistrate, who might not be a lawyer, and who might not grasp the undoubted truth that an Act of Parliament must be interpreted as it was found, and not by the surrounding circumstances, find himself? The Resident Magistrate would be told that there were definitions put into the English Act of Parliament, and it was proposed to introduce them in this Act; but, when the Bill came to be discussed in detail by the House of Commons, the particular words which aimed at this form of "Boycotting" were deliberately struck out. He wanted to know what the ordinary Resident Magistrate, endeavouring to administer the Act, was to do. Would not a difficulty be found owing to the difference which had been made between the wording of this Bill and the Statute applying to analogous offences in England? Must not any man who was not a lawyer be oppressed with this consideration, that the words had been deliberately introduced by the Government, but had been rejected by the Committee of the House of Commons? He would not longer detain the Committee on the present occasion. He hoped he had said nothing of an irritating character to any Member of the Committee. He spoke with very considerable experience, for he knew something of "Boycotting." He was on the farm of Captain Boycott before the relief came to his aid; he saw the process in its inception; he had watched every step of it since. It had been his duty—the necessary experience of his life—to watch it; and he now said, with all the solemnity that he could use, that he believed the words which it was now proposed to leave out were the most valuable words in the whole Bill for putting an end to this serious evil with which they had to deal.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had endeavoured to enter into the solemnity of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's (Mr. Plunket's) speech; but he confessed that, though he had endeavoured to tune his mind to the high emotions the right hon. and learned Gentleman had expressed, he had been unable to perceive either the necessity or the wisdom of the course which he recommended to the Committee. The great argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin was, that even supposing the words were unnecessary, even supposing that these provisions ought never to have been in the Bill, now that they were in the Bill they must stick to them. He (Mr. O'Donnell) did not know whether that was an argument peculiar to the Tory mind; but certainly he had never seen the statement of the great principle, that "whatever is right," more emphatically set forth in that House or elsewhere. The contention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman really amounted to this—Granted that you have made a mistake with regard to the fundamental provisions of your Bill, inasmuch as you have brought it in, and it has been read a second time, and is now in Committee, you must stick to it without amendment. He (Mr. O'Donnell) expected that, when they again took up the New Rules of Procedure, they would hear a strong appeal from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin against any further consideration of a Bill which had once passed its second reading. The right hon. and learned Gentleman attacked the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), on the ground that they tended to the whittling away of the necessary provisions of the Bill. Now, what the right hon. and learned Gentleman called whittling away, he (Mr. O'Donnell) called a just definition. He (Mr. O'Donnell) and his hon. Friends argued that if the Government maintained in the Bill indefinite, vague, and misleading provisions with regard to intimidation, so far from preventing intimidation, they would, in fact, encourage the very worst forms of it. Now, he frankly admitted, just as his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) admitted, that the practice of exclusive dealing, as carried on in Ireland, had, in many cases, been grossly abused, and he certainly would make no objection whatever to the punishment of such gross abuse. He could not, however, approve of punishing just and unjust combination and necessary and improper exclusive dealing alike. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin quoted a sentence from the speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland last night, a sentence in which that right hon. Gentleman pointed out that exclusive dealing was, in many cases in Ireland, mixed up with the grosser forms of terrorism. He (Mr. O'Donnell) did not deny that that was so. He said that whenever they came across a case of exclusive dealing that was mixed up with the grossest forms of terrorism, they ought to punish it; but where they had to deal with a case of exclusive dealing of a legitimate kind, such as was practised by English tradesmen, they ought not to punish it just as though it was a case mixed up with the grossest forms of terrorism. The vague form of words in the clause covered both the righteous and unrighteous forms of exclusive dealing. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Tower Hamlets spoke of "Boycotting" as one of the chief difficulties in the government of Ireland. With a slight change in the words, he (Mr. O'Donnell) would agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. If the hon. and learned Member had said that the practice of "Boycotting," as carried on during the last two years, had been one of the chief difficulties in the way of the misgovernment of Ireland, he would agree with him. The Government admitted that the law they had been endeavouring to enforce for the last year had been a wicked and unjust law; and they now, at the eleventh hour, proposed to amend it. "Boycotting," generally speaking, had been one of the chief difficulties in the successful enforcement of those bad and wicked laws which were now to be reformed by the Government. Let him, at the outset, protest against the use of the word "Boycotting." What was "Boycotting?" "Boycotting" was simply one of those expressions in reference to which the late Mr. Disraeli, in this House, offered a memorable protest, when he protested against the introduction of slang and jargon into legislation. "Boycotting" was a mere expression of slang and jargon, which might mean nothing—it might mean anything—it might mean what was right and what was wrong. "Boycotting" was a word like "Popish," a word which had acquired a certain evil significance amongst a large class of the English population. "Boycotting" was a word like "Muscovite ambition" in the mind of a strong Conservative. "Boycotting" was a meaningless and slang expression, and he protested against its use. He objected to the words in the clause on the ground of their extreme indefiniteness, and also on the ground that they openly and emphatically and unmistakably brought within the purview and operation of coercion practices which were not only legitimate but necessary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department stated that the criterion of the guilt of the offence of exclusive dealing was to be found in reference to Sub-sections a and b, and that it was the view with which exclusive dealing was brought into play that supplied the material for the legality or illegality of exclusive dealing. By Sub-section a, a person was forbidden to use what was called "intimidation." And intimidation was—

[Sixth Night.]

Mr. O'Donnell

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Any word spoken or any act done was intimidation, if it was done—

"With a view to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do."

He could see that under such a sub-section a man might be prevented doing a right and necessary act. If a man, in the exercise of his right, did an act which was distasteful to him, he, in return, had a right to express and display his displeasure. Suppose he had a pleasure ground, and admitted to it a number of persons, but excluded a certain person, because that certain person had, in his legal right, excluded him from his pleasure ground some days previous. The man had a perfect legal right to exclude him, but to punish him for his use of that legal right he was determined to inflict upon him a certain amount of inconvenience and hurt. If he did so he was guilty, under this clause, in Ireland, but not in England, of criminal intimidation. He was reminded of another instance. If he refused to deal with a baker, in an Irish town, because that baker was a supporter of some enemy of his, he would be punishable, under this clause, by six months' imprisonment with hard labour. He maintained that he had a perfect right to deal with whomsoever he pleased, and no one had a right to inquire the reason why he did not deal with any particular man. If a person was in the habit of doing something which was objectionable to any man, or any set of men, that man, or set of men, had a perfect and a legal right to refuse to deal with him. He was confident this attempt on the part of the Government to prevent the practice of exclusive dealing would utterly fail. Let them take the case of a newspaper established in an Irish town. That newspaper advanced views and principles objectionable to the people of the town, and some representative of the popular Party started an opposition newspaper. A public meeting was held, and it was resolved that, in consequence of the action of the unpopular editor, the support of the popular Party be in future given to the popular newspaper. Such action on the part of the people would be construed into criminal intimidation, punishable by six months' hard labour. He need not say that it was monstrous, and criminal, and illegal that such a provision should be contained in any Act. Again, they were interested in the improvement of the condition of the labourers in Ireland. The condition of the agricultural labourers in Ireland had been a pet topic with hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House; and, at the time the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was specially engaged in obtaining redress for the farmers of Ireland, the Conservative Members were in a constant state of gush about the labourers. Suppose that in a certain locality there was a farmer who treated his labourers unjustly, stinted them in their wages, compelled them to herd in some hut or hovel not fit for a pigstye—and these cases were numerous—suppose the labourers of such a farmer resolved that none of their numbers should work for that farmer, until he gave an undertaking to treat them rightly, properly, and justly; under this clause they would be visited with six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Further, let him instance the case of a rack-rented estate in Ireland, an estate in heavy arrears, an estate on which the practice of keeping the tenants in arrear was of old date. The Prime Minister and Parliament had passed a Land Act which, if allowed to operate on this estate, would shortly reduce the rack rents, and place all the tenants on a footing of liberty and prosperity. The landlord, or his agent, or his understrapper, made

[Sixth Night.]

He hoped the Government would believe that his hon. and learned Friend and himself, and others in that part of the House, had no desire to minimize the effect of this clause in the criticism they had thought themselves justified in offering to the Committee. Whether they had succeeded or not, their desire had been to render the clause as accurate as possible,

MR. SYNAN said, the Committee could not but look upon the tone and spirit of the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Horace Davey) as satisfactory. In that tone and in that spirit he (Mr. Synan) claimed to share, and cordially to concur, and though he might differ in some respects from the views of the hon. and learned Member, yet, on the whole, he might say he was on all fours with them. It was not his intention to go into the general question as to whether "Boycotting" or exclusive dealing was legitimate; neither was it his intention to go into the questions addressed to the Committee by hon. Gentlemen behind him, as to the justification for "Boycotting" in Ireland, although he concurred with those hon. Gentlemen to this extent—and he concurred in the concluding portion of the observations of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell)—that if it was intended to bring exclusive dealing on the part of the tenant within the provisions of the Bill, he hoped also it was intended to bring exclusive dealing on the part of the landlords also within them, so that there would be justice, in that respect, done all round. If exclusive dealing was to be treated as a charge to be brought within the terms of the Bill by any prejudiced magistrate in Ireland, he thought it was the business of the Committee now, and the duty of Her Majesty's Government, to make the words so clear that it would be impossible for any magistrate, however prejudiced, to bring legitimate exclusive dealing within the law. He came now to address himself to the clause before the Committee and to the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He was quite prepared to admit that the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend went beyond the words of the Act of 1875, because the words of that Act were "uses violence to or intimidates another person" so as to produce certain consequences more or less injurious to the person or property. His hon. and learned Friend used the word "violence" alone, and left out the words "or intimidates." But then the Act of 1875 was as much in force in Ireland as it was in England, and if anyone did come within that Act, he exposed himself to its punishments just as much as anyone who came within the present Act would expose himself to its punishments as soon as it became the law of the land. Which, he would ask, were the more reasonable, the words of his hon. and learned Friend, or the words of the clause, upon which hon. and learned Gentlemen on the other side of the House differed? Though they were inclined to support the Government, they condemned the words. But how were they to be amended? The words of the clause were "every person who wrongfully or without legal authority, uses intimidation," &c. Of course, a person would use intimidation wrongfully and without legal authority; and, as the clause stood, there seemed to be a contradiction of terms. The words supposed that a man could justly intimidate. A person, he supposed, might justly give a caution or advice; but how a man could justly intimidate another man it was difficult for him to conceive. But the words recommended the whole of the rest of the clause. And what was the rest of the clause? What did the word "intimidation" include? The clause went on to say—"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes." And the magistrate who might have to administer the Act might say—"Intimidation only 'includes' these things; but there are many things which come under it beyond those mentioned—what is said to be 'included' does not comprehend the whole meaning of the word intimidation." He certainly thought the word "includes" might be read as implying that something had been left out, and that something else was meant; therefore, it was impossible to keep in the word. Passing by that, and leaving on Her Majesty's Government the duty of correcting it, at all events let them see what was included. It included—

"Any word spoken, or act done, calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to force the community, who detested these oppressors, to live on friendly relations with them, and to attempt to force the community to do that would fail, because no law could permanently go against human nature. Was it pretended that, under this clause, the landlord who warmly demanded arrears in order to put pressure on his tenants in view of the operations of the Land Act, ran the slightest risk of six months' imprisonment with hard labour? No; there was not the slightest danger that the grossest intimidation by the landlords would be punished under the Bill; there was not the slightest danger that "Boycotting" by the landlord classes would be punished. There were scores, and hundreds, and thousands of cases all over Ireland of men who had been "Boycotted" by the landlord classes; there were hotel-keepers, stationers, drapers, and men in every walk of life in Ireland who, in consequence of their being members of the popular Party, were "Boycotted" by the wealthy gentry in their neighbourhood. A remarkable case of that had just occurred in Dublin, under the immediate notice, and with the full knowledge, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) when he was Chief Secretary for Ireland. A member of the Dublin Corporation and a tradesman of that City, had spoken in favour of the popular Party, and against the terrorist measures of the governing classes. That person had a large establishment in Westmoreland Street, where he sold stationery and articles of bijouterie and articles which were calculated rather to adorn than to be of any particular use; his trade lay exclusively amongst the wealthy classes. In the columns of The Daily Express there appeared an article, calling on the gentry and the wealthy classes to withdraw their custom from him, in consequence of his action. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford had not put the editor of The Daily Express in gaol under the Coercion Act on reasonable suspicion of intimidation; and he (Mr. O'Donnell) did not believe that any police magistrate of Dublin, or any Resident Magistrate throughout the country, would punish a similar exercise of the power of "Boycotting" by the landlord classes. He knew hotels that had been habitually used by the wealthy classes which, owing to their owners belonging to the popular Party, or to their being used occasionally by Land League orators, and by Members of Parliament belonging to the popular Party, were put on the black list by the neighbouring gentry, and such hotel proprietors had suffered considerable loss in consequence. Well, he maintained that the resident gentry had a perfect right to choose their own hotels. He did not propose that any man should be obliged to use any particular hotel—any hotel to which he might object—for, no doubt, he was the best judge of where he should go; but his (Mr. O'Donnell's) complaint was that under this Act there would be one measure of justice meted out to the popular Party, and another measure of justice meted out to the rich. What was more common in Ireland of late than for the proprietors of large estates to declare that they were so disgusted with the progress of the agrarian agitation and the changes in the relations of proprietors and tenants introduced by the Prime Minister, that they would break up their establishments, and henceforth have nothing but a money relation with the Irish tenantry—that they would take all the money they used to devote to their Irish establishments somewhere else? Was not that a distinct punishment of large numbers of people in consequence of the sympathy of the tenantry with the Land League, and the legislation of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister? But there was no danger that any gentleman who became an absentee to punish his parish would be liable to six months' imprisonment through the breaking up of his establishment, although the act might mean a loss of salary and means of livelihood to scores and scores of persons. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had listened with great attention last night to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. He was by no means desirous of implying that the new Chief Secretary for Ireland was not a vast improvement on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford; but as he had listened to the right hon. Gentleman's exposition of the Government case—the Dublin Castle case—on the subject of intimidation, he (Mr. O'Donnell) could not help saying to himself, "What a marked progress the right hon. Gentleman has already made in the ways of Dublin Castle?" He must confess that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, who had entered on his duties in Ireland with as clear an account, and with as popular a past history, as the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, did not show in so short a time so much progress in the ways and ideas of Dublin Castle as the new Chief Secretary had done. [Cries of "Question!"] That was exactly the question. Hon. Gentlemen who were ignorant of Ireland might not perceive it; but it was his duty to enlighten them on the point.

Mr. Horace Davey

[Sixth Night.]

MR. WARTON: I rise to Order. I wish to ask whether the question before the Committee is a comparison between the two Chief Secretaries to the Lord Lieutenant?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member for Dungarvan is about to reply to some arguments that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland brought before the Committee last night; and I think it quite fair that he should have an opportunity of replying.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland last night went exactly on the lines of his Predecessor in mixing up together the legitimate intimidation of exclusive dealing with the illegitimate intimidation of terrorism. It was enough for the right hon. Gentleman to say that over a large district in Ireland there was a good deal of "Boycotting," and also a good deal of outrage, in order to make him think he was justified in asking the Committee to consider that a combination of the popular classes against unpopular individuals must necessarily be put down as terrorism. There was no justification for that confusion of two totally different subjects. According to his (Mr. O'Donnell's) mind, the true criterion as to whether an act of exclusive dealing, or a resolution for exclusive dealing, was criminal or not was supplied by the question whether that exclusive dealing, or whether that resolution for exclusive dealing, was or was not to be carried out by terrorism? He contended that in every case in which the Government could prove that exclusive dealing, or a combination in favour of exclusive dealing, was supported in the case of any man, or any dozen of men, by terrorism, then the Government ought to punish the terrorizers with the whole force of the law; but he said that the tenantry, openly and honestly, had a perfect right, if they chose, to enter into a resolution not to take a farm from which another man had been unjustly evicted. They had an absolute right to do that, and any law which prevented them was a wicked and tyrannical law that ought to be evaded by every means at the disposal of the nation. The farm-labourers had a right, he contended, to enter into a combination not to work for any farmer or landlord who did not give a just wage, a fit house, and proper diet to his farm-hands; and though the result of that combination might be to reduce the hard and unjust employer of labour to the most extreme destitution, he maintained that if that employer of labour preferred to starve rather than give a fair wage, let him starve; and neither for his present condition nor for his condition in the world hereafter should he (Mr. O'Donnell) have the slightest regret. The objects and the scope of this measure were far beyond the objects and the scope which were represented to be all that were within the design and desire of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had declared that they were prepared to guarantee to the Irish people the same rights of combination enjoyed by the English people. Had they done so? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, again and again, declared that they were not willing to deprive the Irish people of a single right of combination enjoyed by the English people. Then let them carry out their intention, and insert into this Bill words conferring upon the Irish people the same rights as those enjoyed by the Trade Unionists of England. He did not ask for a single right more; but he and his Friends contended that, just as the body of English workmen—shipwrights, masons, bricklayers, &c.—had a perfect right to combine together, and to refuse to work except on certain terms, and had a perfect right to appeal to all their brethren in other trades to unite with them and refuse to work with a hard employer until that hard employer had granted the terms demanded by his labourers and tradesmen, so they contended that the Irish labourers, and Irish farmers, and Irish operatives in town and country had a perfect right to refuse to work for, and had a perfect right to refuse to aid and assist, their employers, and to refuse to supply these individuals and classes whom the decision of Irish trades' organizations had declared to be enemies of the trade interests and the just rights of the Irish labourers or farmers with the goods they required. They asked for no more. Where a man committed violence and outrage in support of a trade resolution, punish him with rigour, no matter what the trade resolution might be; but where the people choose to occupy a passive attitude, where they stood apart and shunned and refused to assist or to serve an unpopular person, whether he were an employer of town or country labour, a Bill that interfered with that right was a Bill unjust, was a Bill that could only be technically the law, and a Bill which, so long as it was in existence and on the Statute Book, would be an act of tyranny, and would justify the resistance which every free nation ought to oppose to tyranny until tyranny was dead. The crime of intimidation was left purposely so vague in this Bill that it would be left in practice to depend upon the arbitrary will of a number of Government nominees all over the country. There could be no confidence in such provisions; there could be no faith in such Judges; there could be no recognition of duty to carry out a law of that kind. If Her Majesty's Government would introduce words—whether the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) or others—which would make it clear that the object of the Government was to put down violence and terrorism, and not to put down rightful and necessary combination, then the opposition of the Irish Party would disappear in a moment; but if the Government would insist in mixing up in the one anathema lawful combination and rightful union on the part of the farmers against unjust landlords, rightful union of farmers against land-grabbers, and rightful union of labourers against unjust farmers, or the farmers against unjust labourers, with violence and intimidation, it was the duty of every honest man, by every means in his power, and by every encouragement and counsel, consistent with prudence, to oppose the Bill and to insure its failure. The Bill, in its present wording, and this clause of the Bill, were against necessary combination. Unless combination was permitted in Ireland, the Land Act could not work; there could be no protection against unjust arrears, no protection for the labourers against hard service and miserable wage; and the Bill, by preventing legitimate combination, would only give another and a most terrible stimulus to secret and desperate crime; and if, after this Bill became law, outrages of a most serious character multiplied, the moral blame would rest with the Government that insisted upon passing such an unjust measure.

Mr. O'Donnell

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, that the speech which the Committee had just heard was one of those speeches which made it most difficult for Liberal Members to offer such criticism or observations as they might wish to the proposal of the Government; but he would not be deterred by the observations which the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had made, from offering one or two criticisms upon the language of the clause under discussion. He should have the Committee with him when he said that the question under consideration was one of extreme importance; not only did he see the extreme importance of putting down the practice, which had been called the practice of "Boycotting," and which was admitted by hon. Gentlemen opposite to have been carried to a gross abuse; but he thought that the Committee must also appreciate the importance of taking care that, whilst they desired to put down that system in the manner in which it was now exercised in Ireland, they must be careful that they, as far as possible, framed their definition of the offence they intended to put down, and at which they intended to strike, so as not to introduce a precedent which might, on future occasions, be found to be fraught with some inconvenience. Now, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) had done injustice to the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), for he (Mr. Horace Davey) had not understood his hon. and learned Friend in any way to have palliated or extenuated the he should go into the Lobby with his hon. and learned Friend.

[Sixth Night.]

MR. GLADSTONE: I desire to make a suggestion. I would respectfully submit that this Amendment should now be allowed to come to a division. We all feel that we are on a matter of great importance, and I believe that everyone desires to make practical progress with the debate; but I wish to point out that no practical progress with the debate whatever can be made so long as we continue to discuss the subject on the immediate question before us. The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Synan) has delivered a speech which, I think, contributes very much to the better understanding of the question. That was preceded by what I may call the admirable speech of an hon. and learned Gentleman on this side of the House (Mr. Horace Davey); but those two speeches, if they referred to any part of this particular clause, referred to the latter part of it. We are now on the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and these words have been stated by him—as has been admitted on all sides—to exclude altogether the question of "Boycotting." But it is agreed in almost every quarter that "Boycotting," in some shape or other, is to be included. The speeches of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and that of my hon. and learned Friend on this side of the House, were both on the question in what manner, and on what terms, we should deal with it. I say, let us get quit of the Amendment immediately before us. That has nothing to do with "Boycotting" whatever, and there has been no debate on it. During the discussion to-day hardly 10 minutes have been spent in considering the Amendment; and if we are now permitted to get rid of that question, we can then proceed to the consideration of other Amendments which have reference to the way in which the provisions of the clause can be adapted to the object which it is generally desired to attain. If it is meant to have any limitation at all, we should be allowed to get rid of this Amendment and proceed with the discussion of the Amendments proposing such limitation.

MR. BIGGAR said, the right hon. Gentleman asked them to take a division on that particular question at that particular moment; but there were several objections to that course, which he would state to the Committee. One important objection to having a division was, as the right hon. Gentleman himself had said, that the subject had not been sufficiently debated. If he (Mr. Biggar) understood the Prime Minister, what he said was that a particular question had been raised and had not been sufficiently debated.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg the hon. Member's pardon; what I said was, that the debate had been completely exhausted, or, if I did not say it, that was my meaning.

MR. BIGGAR said, that as he understood it, the right hon. Gentleman, first of all, said he thought the debate had drifted into one particular line—namely, the question of "Boycotting;" but he (Mr. Biggar) ventured, with all due deference, to say that there were other questions which might arise on this Amendment entirely outside the question of "Boycotting," questions which were entitled to very serious consideration, and on which he and other Members of the Committee had not expressed their opinion. The hon. and learned Member who had moved this Amendment (Mr. Charles Russell) last night ought—not, perhaps, according to ordinary routine, but according to what was desirable on a matter of such great importance—to be present to reply upon the whole case with regard to this particular Amendment. If that were a trumpery Amendment, of no importance, the contention of the Prime Minister might be entitled to considerable weight; but it was not a trumpery Amendment. It was one of a very material character, and the hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved it, owing, no doubt, to his professional duties, had not been able to attend and take part in the discussion of his own proposal. For that reason, he (Mr. Biggar) submitted that the contention of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister did not hold water, and that the debate should be adjourned, and the Bill considered at its present stage at 4 o'clock to-morrow. There was another important question in regard to this branch of the subject, and it was this—that his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who was the Leader of that particular section of the House, had not yet had an opportunity of expressing any opinion with regard to the Amendment before the Committee. For these reasons, he thought the best plan would be to move to report Progress, so that the matter might be further considered to-morrow. He would not, however, make the Motion, as there were several hon. Members who had not yet spoken, who desired to do so to-day. He himself had not spoken, and as he had taken notice of certain points in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk, which had not yet been answered, he should be glad to go on now, and offer an opinion upon the hon. and learned Member's observations. The earlier part of the clause was of a very general nature, and, as the Secretary of State for the Home Department had specifically said, was to take cognizance of one particular form of offence—namely, "Boycotting." But there was one peculiarity as to this word "Boycotting," and that was that, so far as he (Mr. Biggar) knew, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had not defined what was really meant by it. He had heard a great many things called "Boycotting," some of which, as had been pointed out, were not defensible—at least, he did not undertake to defend them. He had heard of a farmer taking produce to market, and being unable to sell it, not because the buyers "Boycotted" him, but because rude people raised a crowd around him and drove away the intending purchasers. That was an offence which would come under the general law of intimidation or riot, and there would be no difficulty in dealing with it. But if action in a case of this kind were taken in a totally different manner, if the buyers merely abstained from buying from the farmer, surely that could have been done without infringing any moral or legal obligation even under the measure now before the House. To give, as an illustration, a case which had come under his own observation in a town in a central part of Ireland, a person went into a grocer's shop, and asked the grocer to buy a load of turf, but a little girl came in and said, "This turf is 'Boycotted,'" giving a hint to the shopkeeper that, perhaps, it would be as well not to buy the load of turf on that occasion. There was no intimidation there, but an expression of opinion on the part of the child that it would be better not to buy a load of turf at that time. It could not be said that this child was able to use any sort of intimidation against the shopkeeper, a man of mature years, and in very good circumstances. Would this case come under the Bill? Under the Act of 1875, it was possible to prosecute a person and punish him severely if he used any form of intimidation. Supposing, in the case he had quoted, instead of a little girl coming into the shop and saying, "This turf is 'Boycotted,'" a rough man had entered and said to the shopkeeper, "If you buy this man's turf, you will have your windows broken, or your trade taken from your shop, or some other punishment inflicted on you," the Act of 1875 would have operated, the offence of intimidation would have been committed, and, in all probability, the man would have been convicted in the ordinary course of law and punished. But it seemed to him (Mr. Biggar) that the Government were simply beating the wind. There was not the slightest use in bringing in a Bill of that kind to define a form of misconduct, which, if it were misconduct, was so hard of proof, and with regard to which it would be so easy to evade the law. An hon. Member had pointed out what was done in those cases which occurred in England and Ireland, and which closely approximated in character to "Boycotting."

Mr. Synan

THE CHAIRMAN: I have listened very carefully to the hon. Member; but I do not find that he is talking on the Amendment at all.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was replying to the observations which had been made in the course of the debate, and the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk had specifically stated that this question of what was called "Boycotting" was raised in the particular Amendment now before the Committee. He would take care that in the course of his observations he did not say anything that was out of Order, or anything that was not perfectly in reply to something which had been said by another speaker during these discussions, or that did not specially refer to the Amendment, or the words the Amendment referred to. As to this intimidation, no doubt, according to the law that existed in England, a certain sort of exclusive dealing was perfectly legal. Supposing a particular class of persons obtained a monopoly of a particular trade, that class must act impartially to everyone who went to them. Reference had been made to the publican. He was a person who was obliged to serve a man who went into his house during legal hours and asked to be served, whether he liked that man or not. A Railway Company, again, were bound to give accommodation to a person who proposed to travel on their line. But, on the other hand, a person who simply hired out carts without a licence was not bound to lend his horse and vehicles, unless he felt disposed to do so, and unless he liked the person he had to deal with. And supposing a shopkeeper lived in the next house to the publican, he was not bound to do as the publican had been obliged to do with regard to the supply of goods, but was perfectly at liberty to sell, or to refuse to sell, as he might feel disposed. And now he (Mr. Biggar) would make some reference to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department. He had laid it down that persons were not at liberty to inquire whether a customer had paid his rent. That was taking an extreme view as to cases that should come under the cognizance of the Act. It proposed that persons who, for trifling reasons, refused to give a supply of food to other people should be liable to punishment; but, on the other hand, if the landlord had claimed an excessive and unreasonable rent, and evicted his tenant, destroying his means of living, he suffered no punishment under this clause. He (Mr. Biggar) held that the Bill was one-sided in its substance, would have no operation, and was very mischievous, for the reason that it would give the Irish people to understand that there was to be one law for the rich and another for the poor, one law for the landlords and another for the unfortunate tenant farmers. It even went farther than that, and said that persons were not to incite to intimidation—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have pointed out that the hon. Member is discussing just now all the details of the clause upon an Amendment that is specific. It is with reference to a person using intimidation or inciting others to use intimidation by acts or threats of violence or injury to person or property.

Mr. Biggar

MR. BIGGAR said, he certainly was referring to injury done to person or property. What he had been referring to had seemed to him to be a question of intimidation—such cruel and oppressive conduct on the part of a landlord to an unfortunate was surely one of the grossest forms of intimidation. A threat of eviction was surely intimidation, and eviction, when carried out, was surely one of the severest punishments that could be inflicted on a man. He submitted that he was in Order on the point, and not deserving of the Chairman's censure. However, he would not pursue the matter further, as he should probably have another opportunity of speaking.

MR. PARNELL said, he trusted the Government would consent to report Progress. He understood the Prime Minister was anxious that a division should be taken on the Amendment before the Committee; but, in view of the fact that they had had no intimation from the Government that they intended to make a concession as to the definition of the offence of intimidation, and of the fact that a great many hon. Members who intended to vote on their (the Irish Members') side had left the House, under the impression that a division was not to be taken that evening, and also in view of the fact that several Irish Members desired to address the Committee on the subject of the Amendment, he did not see how they could agree to take the division until Thursday. At the same time, he might say that there would be no desire on the part of the Irish Members to unnecessarily prolong the debate on Thursday. He begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that after what had been said by the Prime Minister, the Government could not consent to the Motion for reporting Progress. Hon. Members opposite, seeing that the hour was approaching when the debate must, of necessity, cease, had the matter in their own hands; but to consent to the Motion would be to admit that the Amendment had not been fully discussed, and probably there was not a man in the House who thought so. It was admitted that the Amendment before them could not be sustained; therefore it was obvious they ought to allow it to be disposed of. All that the Prime Minister would ask was that they should dispose of this Amendment, leaving over any others that would modify the clause.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that as he proposed the Amendment, he should like to say a word with regard to it. He had listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Trevelyan) yesterday, and had heard a good deal of the debate to-day, and he confessed that the speeches which had been made did satisfy him that there were some cases of "Boycotting," which he might call extreme cases, unaccompanied by acts or threats of violence to person or property, which it might be perfectly proper to treat as criminal offences under the Bill, and which would not entirely come within his Amendment. But when he said that, he begged distinctly to say that he preferred his Amendment, with all its shortcomings, to the clause of the Bill as it stood. He thought it was matter for regret that the suggestion made by his hon. Friend below him the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), early in the day, was not adopted—namely, that the clause should be postponed and that the Government should bring in a new clause, which should have for its object the definition and limitation, the ascertaining with exactness the scope of the clause. He must say that he should oppose, as far as he possibly could, a clause which left it in the power of a magistrate, stipendiary or otherwise, to treat as an act of intimidation and criminal offence any word spoken or act done which, in his judgment, amounted to "Boycotting." He admitted there were shortcomings in his Amendment, and would willingly assist the Government in defining cases of "Boycotting," which yet might not be "acts of violence or threats;" but unless the Government endeavoured to define the offence more accurately he should stand by his Amendment.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 250: Majority 220.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress.

Committee to sit again To-morrow.

And it being Six of the clock, the House was adjourned without Question first put till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 8th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Local Government Provisional Order (Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings) * (121); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [122]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [123].
Second Reading—Justices' Jurisdiction (112); Metropolis Management and Building Acts (Amendment) * (104).
Report—Arklow Harbour * (98).

JUSTICES' JURISDICTION BILL.

(The Lord Bramwell.)

(NO. 112.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Bramwell.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, considering the great experience which his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) had had in trying the cases with which the Bill was intended to deal on Circuit, he could not hesitate to agree to the second reading of this Bill; but it was desirable that it should be considered by the Home Office, and therefore he hoped, if the Motion were agreed to, that a reasonably long interval would be allowed to elapse before the stage of Committee.

LORD BRABOURNE said, he also hoped that some time would be given for considering the provisions of the Bill. He was sorry that the Bill was introduced when the noble Earl, who represented the Home Office (the Earl of Rosebery) was not present, as it would be well that their Lordships should know what the opinion of the Secretary of State for the Home Department was in regard to it. He was glad to find, from the introduction of this Bill, proposing, as it did, to extend the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions, that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell) did not entertain that low opinion of the county justices which was held in other quarters. For instance, he might refer to a speech which was made by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), in which the right hon. Gentleman said that they were a foolish and unjust body of men, though it was his duty to appoint some to the Bench. Now, if they were as the right hon. Gentleman had described, they should not be allowed to try cases in Quarter Sessions. However, he was glad to find a different opinion in that House. There was, however, clearly a difference between the two classes of offences, the jurisdiction over which his noble and learned Friend proposed to intrust to the magistrates at Quarter Sessions. With respect to certain cases of burglary, a jurisdiction might properly be given to the magistrates; and one great reason for the change was that, under the present system, persons accused of comparatively slight offences might be kept a long time in prison without trial; but when they came to deal with the question of forgery, the matter required more consideration, because the evidence then was of a different character from that which commonly came before Quarter Sessions. There was no evidence which required more sifting than that with respect to handwriting. Many of those cases could not, he thought, be satisfactorily tried by the magistrates, who, in many cases, had had no legal training; but ought to be relegated to a Court where the very highest legal talent presided. The general scope of the Bill was, however, in the right direction.

LORD COLERIDGE said, that, though he should not oppose the second reading, being inclined almost at once to accept any measure proposed on the authority of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell), he must confess he did not desire, for several reasons, to see this Bill become law. No doubt, occasionally, ~~some~~ trumpery cases of burglary and forgery were sent to the Assizes, and the persons guilty or not guilty of them might, on that account, be kept in prison a few weeks longer than they otherwise would be. Now, he would be the last person to wish to see anyone accused of a trivial offence, coming under those heads, remaining in prison for a long time awaiting trial; but they must legislate, as it appeared to him, upon the general reason of the thing, and the offences of burglary and forgery contained some of the very gravest cases which, short of capital ones, could come on for trial, and required the ablest tribunal which the country could afford. He was perfectly aware that the Bill gave the committing magistrate a discretionary power to say whether particular cases should be tried at the Assizes or at the Quarter Sessions; but it by no means necessarily appeared, on the first investigation before the magistrate, what would be the real character of the offence, when it came to be tried before the tribunal which ultimately was to dispose of it. This jurisdiction was proposed to be conferred on a body of men who were to be numbered by thousands, many of whom were doubtless as competent to try the cases as any of the Judges on the Bench; but many of whom, on the other hand—and he desired to speak with all respect—had not had the experience that would enable them to exercise this jurisdiction satisfactorily. It was true that his noble and learned Friend attached to the exercise of this discretion certain safeguards. The Public Prosecutor, for instance, might intervene, and remove a case from the Quarter Sessions if he thought fit. But who was to tell the Public Prosecutor whether the discretion was well or ill-exercised, or who was to put him in motion, and was it certain that he would be put in motion in cases in which he ought? This matter did not come before him for the first time. When the noble and learned Earl opposite (Earl Cairns) was Lord Chancellor, he was good enough to appoint a Committee to investigate the question of Circuit jurisdiction, and to see how the time of Circuits could be economized. He (Lord Coleridge) was Chairman of that Committee, and their Report was laid before both Houses of Parliament. Probably none of their Lordships had read that Report; but in it were to be found reasons, stated at some length and with some care, why, in substance, the present jurisdiction should not be interfered with. First of all, the relief which this measure, if fairly worked, would give to the Judges would be very slight. The actual time taken up in the trial of these trumpery cases was very small

Lord Brabourne

now. In the next place, he was by no means sure that it was an unwise thing that Judges should, in the face of the country, now and then, for a reasonable portion of their time, try cases not of the very first importance. And it was to be remembered that the business on Circuit was gradually lessening. He was happy to say that the business of the Queen's Bench Division, which had charge of the Circuits, was now coming within reasonable limits; the arrears were nothing, so that the argument for economizing the time of the Judges had lost its force. Further, he thought it unwise to deal with the question in this way. If it were desired to re-construct the whole system of the jurisdiction of the magistrates of Quarter Sessions upon a better, or, at any rate, another principle, that was one thing. But just to take away some cases which were now and then important, but which might be insignificant in themselves, from a tribunal where they were well tried, and where they did not now occupy any great length of time, and to transfer them to a tribunal which had not the same experience, was not the way to deal with the question. He would not trouble their Lordships to divide against the second reading; but he must say that, in the position which he filled, he did not desire to see the Bill proceed further.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, before the Bill was read a second time, he would venture to say a word or two upon it. Speaking as one of the officials to whom the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) proposed, by the Bill, to hand over jurisdiction in certain cases of burglary and forgery, he must remark that the speech of the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chief Justice, in opposing it, was a remarkably Conservative speech to come from the Government side of the House. There was one thing to consider—they might be able to pass this small measure through Parliament, while a large measure would require a strong force to get it through. He (the Marquess of Salisbury) did not feel much enthusiasm for the measure; but, at the same time, he had no great sympathy with the objections of the noble and learned Lord, and failed to see that the points as to which it was said the Chairman of Quarter Sessions was inferior to a Judge had been clearly made out. The great weakness of the Chairman of Quarter Sessions was that he had not the legal training and experience of a Judge, and was, therefore, not equally well able to decide points of law; and, again, without a Judge's experience of Criminal Courts, a Chairman of Quarter Sessions had not the same capacity for deciding questions of evidence; but he (the Marquess of Salisbury) was not sure that in another and by no means unimportant particular, the apportionment of sentences, the inferiority was manifest. Indeed, having regard to the knowledge gained by the Judge and the Chairman respectively of the rural population and of the true character of the offences usually dealt with by the Quarter Sessions, he held that the latter was more likely to apportion penalties justly than the former, for he had more opportunity of gathering within the grasp of his mind the various considerations which should determine whether the felony he was trying should be regarded as a large or a small offence than had the Judge. In this respect, the Judge's legal superiority was of little or no consequence. He thought it very desirable, as the noble Lord (Lord Brabourne) had said, that intricate cases should not come before the Quarter Sessions; but the presiding magistrate might be trusted not to attempt the decision of questions of law, or the investigation of difficult evidence. In such cases he would probably see where the difficulty arose, and, in the event of a mistake, the Public Prosecutor would be able to correct it. As to cases of burglary—he was not so clear with regard to forgery—many difficult legal points were not likely to arise; and he, therefore, thought the Chairman of Quarter Sessions was as efficient to determine the amount of the penalty as the Judge. He felt convinced, however, that the majority of the cases contemplated by the Bill were such as might be properly dealt with at the Quarter Sessions.

LORD BRAMWELL, in reply, said his noble and learned Friend (Lord Coleridge) had stated several objections to the Bill; but there were no two crimes, with the exception of manslaughter, in which the degrees of guilt varied more widely than in burglary and forgery. There were, of course, cases of burglary which demanded the attention of the very best tribunal; but others were of the most trivial description, and might easily be disposed of at Quarter Sessions. For example, if, between 9 at night and 6 in the morning, a man opened a pantry window and stole a piece of meat, he committed burglary; and the lodger who, before 6 in the morning, walked away with another man's coat from a lodging-house, would be held to have broken out of the house and to be guilty of burglary. Neither of these acts, though both were criminal, constituted very grave or very dangerous crimes; but, as things were, they could not be sent to the Quarter Sessions. So as to forgery, the cases generally should be tried by the best tribunal; but there were some which were as trivial as were those of burglary, and could be better tried by the magistrates, as he proposed. He had once had before him a case in which a man was imprisoned for six months for forging an order for six-pennyworth of groceries. Could anyone give a reason why such cases should not be tried at Quarter Sessions, where, he believed, they would often be better tried and the sentences better apportioned than by the Superior Court? While he had no fear as to trusting these cases to the Quarter Sessions, he had no misgivings as to the way in which the magistrates would exercise their discretion of remitting difficult cases, both of burglary and forgery, to the Assizes. He claimed for the Bill that one of its results would be the more speedy trial of a large number of cases. In the next place, a great deal of time and expense would be saved to the prosecutors. It was true that the system of holding Assizes was altered, and that they were now held more often than was formerly the case; but the counties were fused, and witnesses and prosecutors frequently had to come from a distance, and were put to great inconvenience and expense. A man was not always willing to travel a long distance, say, from Cornwall to Exeter, in order to prosecute in a trivial case; and a prisoner, in such circumstances, might not be able to procure the attendance of witnesses as to character. Moreover, the time of the Judges would be saved to an appreciable extent, and this, which was important in the interests of the public, had also to be taken into consideration. He thought that, for these and various other reasons, they might safely trust to the discretion of the committing magistrates whether the cases should go to the Assizes or the Quarter Sessions; and, therefore, with the other safeguards it contained, he hoped that the Bill would be approved by the House.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE COMBINED FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: My Lords, I rise for the purpose of putting a Question to my noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, of which I have given Notice, as to the position of the combined Fleet in the harbour of Alexandria; and I do so because I think I shall not be accused of exaggeration if I describe that position as one of anxiety, if it be not critical. The Government have been—although I do not complain of them on that score—not unnaturally somewhat reticent on the subject, and whatever information has reached us from their lips has not on all occasions been strictly accurate. Only a very few days ago a Question was addressed to the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke) in "another place," and in his reply he stated that the earthworks, of which we have heard something, were not armed. Only the day before yesterday, however, he took occasion materially to correct that statement, because it appeared, I think, from his answer, that at the very time when he was replying to his first questioner in the House of Commons, the forts were in the course of being armed. But, although we have not got much information from Her Majesty's Ministers, the telegraph wires have not been at all silent on this subject; and I am bound to say that in the last day or two information of a disquieting character has reached us nearly every day. Now, my Lords, the harbour of Alexandria presents some peculiar features. The roadstead outside the entrance is open and exposed, especially in a north-west wind, when even ordinary steamers do not venture to go in, and the entrance to the harbour, as is well known, is narrow and not particularly deep. I believe I am right—and if I am wrong I shall, no doubt, be corrected—I believe I am right in saying that the extreme depth is 24 feet 8 inches. I need not remind your Lordships that no first-class iron-clad fighting ship of the present day could enter that harbour. I apprehend that those powerful vessels in the Mediterranean Fleet—the Alexandra, the Inflexible, the Superb, and the Téméraire—could not enter the harbour. I doubt even whether the Monarch could do so, unless she was lightened of her coals, and the only vessel of any size which can be of use would be the Invincible, which is at present inside the harbour. The harbour itself, as I understand it, is protected by a succession or chain of forts which crown the heights above the town, and lie in a sort of semi-circle; and the intervening spaces between the forts and the shore are occupied, in some cases, by very sumptuous residences, almost palaces. These are closely situated, in some instances, and a great number of them are occupied, not by Egyptian subjects at all, but by wealthy foreigners, Europeans, and others engaged in trade and other avocations; and I apprehend that in event—the untoward event—of the Fleet being compelled to reply to the fire of the forts, these residences would be in a very dangerous position, and would probably be destroyed. But there is more than this, for I have alluded to certain earthworks. When Her Majesty's Government decided not long ago on despatching the Fleet to Alexandria, I apprehend, and, indeed, it was said that one great motive was to overawe the mutinous soldiery and their commander by the presence of the Fleet. But it has not appeared to have had that effect, for the action of Her Majesty's Government was immediately responded to by a counter-demonstration—namely, the erection of earthworks, on which the soldiery have been employed for some days. No doubt some of these works were already armed; but they naturally attracted the notice of the British Admiral, and he at once telegraphed to Constantinople to protest against their construction.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: No, no!

THE EARL OF RAVENSWORTH: I may, then, take it that the statement is not correct. But is it not true that a prompt and immediate message was sent from Constantinople to stop the construction of the works? That is true. An immediate and peremptory message came at once from the Sultan to stop the construction of the earthworks; and now comes a piece of information which is of a remarkable character, and I must call particular attention to it. We are informed that upon the receipt by the Khedive of the message of the Sultan, it was transmitted to Arabi Pasha, a council of officers was summoned, and the reply sent by Arabi is reported to be—

“I have directed the construction of these works as a necessary step to calm the irritation and excitement created in the minds of the nation by the presence of the Fleets. They are necessary repairs only; but in obedience to my Sovereign's command, I will immediately order the suspension of these defensive works; but I expect the removal of the Fleets.”

Now, the natural and only inference to be drawn from this is, that that readiness to suspend the works was conditional; and, if the conditions were not agreed to, no doubt the works will continue to be constructed. I do not think that is an unfair assumption; and I need not remind your Lordships that everybody knows perfectly well that Arabi Pasha is master of the situation. He has at his disposal the only armed force in Egypt at this moment, and it appears to me impossible for any statesman to say from day to day what steps he will take, or to what purpose, pacific or warlike, he will not apply those troops. I wish to put this Question to Her Majesty's Government, because I think I may fairly describe the position of our Fleet as an anxious and critical one. I have been exceedingly careful to abstain from mixing up political matters with the Question, which only relates to matters of fact, and those matters of fact ought to be well known to the Government, because they are patent to every human being in Alexandria. I do not ask these Questions for the purpose of embarrassing the Government in the slightest degree. It would be wrong, unfair, and unpatriotic to interfere with the Government in the conduct of difficult and delicate negotiations; but I think the English people are entitled to know at least as much of these affairs as the people of Alexandria. Therefore, it is in the hope that the Government may be able to give a satisfactory reply, which will do something to reassure the anxiety which exists, that I ask the following Questions—I wish to know, first of all, precisely where the Fleet is lying? Is it lying in the Old Harbour, or in that which is known as the New Harbour—a large space of water lying to the South-East of the Old Harbour, and which has been, during recent years, improved and deepened, and is now shown on the Admiralty Chart as the New Harbour? I would then like to know whether the old forts, which I call old in contradistinction to the new earthworks, are fully and effectually armed; and whether they command the whole of the harbour, including the new portion? Then, I would like also to ask whether it is true, as has been stated, that when the order from the Sultan arrived, and was conveyed to Arabi Pasha, it was too late, because the earthworks and their batteries were complete? Lastly, I should like to know whether the Government are in possession of information at this moment as to the situation and the power of the defences and fortifications of Alexandria, sufficient to enable the naval and military authorities of this country to judge whether, in the event of hostilities occurring, the position of the Fleet would be tenable?

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ravensworth) has asked me three or four Questions in one, regarding Her Majesty's Fleet at Alexandria, and in doing so has made one or two observations on which I may say a few words. In the first place, he refers to answers given by my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the House of Commons (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and he seems to challenge the accuracy of the answers given by him. At any rate, he so interprets his words as to challenge their accuracy. As no Notice has been given me on that subject, I am not prepared to go into the question; but, so far as I can understand the statement of the noble Earl, my hon. Friend answered one day a question of fact as it was on that day, and on another day answered in another way, simply because since he spoke the circumstances had changed. This is only another instance of what so often happens in consequence of Questions being put without Notice referring to what takes place in the other House, as to which it is impossible to give a complete answer in your Lordships' House. Then the noble Earl went into the question of the draught of water of Her Majesty's ships on the Mediterranean Station, and I may say on that point that two of them—the Invincible and the Monarch—are actually in the harbour of Alexandria, so that, at all events as to them, there is no question at all as to their being able to enter. But I must ask the noble Earl to allow me to say, with regard to the draught of water of the ships and the depth of the harbour, that it is obviously inconvenient to enter into such details. The noble Earl seems to feel some anxiety as to the safety of the Fleet, and he used the term that the Fleet was in an anxious if not a critical position. He then goes on to ask Questions with respect to the armament of the forts and the completion of the earthworks; and wants to know whether the Government are in possession of information to enable us to assure your Lordships of the safety of the Fleet. As to the details of the armament of the forts and the earthworks, I think the most satisfactory answer I can give is that without entering into further details, I am able to assure your Lordships that Her Majesty's Government have a sufficient knowledge of the fortifications of Alexandria and the position of the earthworks such as to cause us not to feel the slightest anxiety or apprehension with regard to the safety of the Fleet.

The Earl of Ravensworth

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till to-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 8th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—First Reading—Police [197]; Trusts (Scotland)* [198].
Second Reading—Corn Returns (No. 2) [193]; Married Women's Property [191].
Select Committee—Public Offices Site* [111]. Sir Edward Reed discharged, Sir Arthur Otway added; Conveyancing and Settled Land* [121 and 120], nominated.
Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Seventh Night].

*Committee—Report—Interments (Felo de se) [98].

*Report—Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3) [151]; *Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders [142].

*Third Reading—Tramways Provisional Orders [141]; *Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2) [149]; *Judgments (Inferior Courts) [44], and passed.

QUESTIONS.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—SUPERANNUATION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If the previous service of the Civil Service clerks who have been placed in the Lower Division, under the provisions of paragraph 12 of the Order in Council of the 12th February 1876, and who did not possess certificates, will not now count towards superannuation?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the Treasury Minute presented on Tuesday contains a full answer to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman.

POST OFFICE—ADHESIVE STAMPS ON POST CARDS.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the Postmaster General, If he will consent to an amendment of the Post Office Regulations to enable cards of the size of the halfpenny post cards to be sent through the Post Office, with an adhesive halfpenny stamp affixed, on conditions similar to those now in force with regard to halfpenny post cards; and, further, if he can amend the Post Office Regulations so as to enable a similar card to be sent with a penny adhesive stamp as a Foreign Post Card, and also to enable a halfpenny post card to be sent as a Foreign Post Card, with the addition of a halfpenny adhesive stamp?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the Question of the hon. Member has been carefully considered, but I am sorry to say that I do not think it would be expedient to adopt such a change as he suggests. If cards with letters written upon them were allowed to be sent through the post with adhesive postage stamps affixed to them, it would be necessary for the officers of the Department to examine such cards carefully, in order to satisfy themselves that the cards were of the proper size and substance, and this would involve much delay in sorting. As regards the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, what he asks for has been for some time allowed, as the public are permitted to send ordinary inland post cards to any country in the Postal Union if postage stamps are affixed to make up the requisite postage.

MR. R. H. PAGET said, he regretted the unsatisfactory nature of the right hon. Gentleman's reply to the first part of his Question, and gave Notice that on a future occasion he would call the attention of the House to the subject.

THE LIBRARY OF THE FOUR COURTS, DUBLIN.

MR. MARUM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a report of the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court in Dublin, on Wednesday the 24th of May, whereby it appears that the judges of that Court have been obliged to complain of the action of the Committee of the Law Library of the Four Courts in closing the same during the sitting of the Court of Bankruptcy, notwithstanding the reiterated remonstrances of the bar; whether he is aware that one of the judges stated that an important case had to be postponed,

"At great inconvenience, delay, and expense to the parties, solely because, the Library being closed, the counsel were unable to procure the necessary books for law argument;"

and, whether he can take steps to remedy such delay in the administration of justice and great inconvenience to the public?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland to deal with this Question, as it relates to a matter that does not come under my Department.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the Law Library at the Four Courts, Dublin, is a private collection of books maintained by voluntary subscription by Judges and barristers, and managed by a committee elected by the subscribers. The committee provide for the closing of the library at the usual periods to afford some holiday to the attendants. One of the learned Judges of the Bankruptcy Court is reported to have stated that he was informed by the other learned Judge of that Court to the effect set out in the Question of the hon. and learned Member; but I can hardly imagine that the eminent counsel practising in that Court could find any difficulty in taking their own books into Court if they required them for their arguments, or that any case should be postponed "to the delay and expense of the parties," because counsel had not brought his books into Court with him. The proper course, however, for the learned Judge, or any other person interested, is to bring the matter before the Library Committee.

VACCINATION — TRANSMISSION OF DISEASE THROUGH INOCULATION OF SOLDIERS IN THE FRENCH ARMY.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has deemed it right to inquire, through the Foreign Office, and with what result, of the French Government concerning the inoculation of a foul disease by vaccination in fifty-eight soldiers of the Fourth Zouaves in Algiers, during the month of December 1880, as reported in "Le Petit Colon," and the "Journal d'Hygiène," of Paris, of June 30th and August 25th 1881, and by the French Correspondent of the "Daily News;" and, if not, whether he will be able in any other manner to obtain authentic information on a subject of such great interest?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have to say that in August last the Foreign Office were good enough, at my request, to cause a communication to be addressed to the French Government relative to the alleged inoculation of a foul disease by vaccination in certain soldiers of the 4th Zouaves in Algiers during December, 1880, and some months afterwards a reply was received by the English Embassy in Paris from the French Government on the subject. The information, however, was incomplete, and I have not since been furnished with further particulars. I have now directed another application to be addressed to the Foreign Office, and I hope that if the French Government have obtained any further information since the date of their former letter they will not object to supply it.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND)—VACANCIES ON THE IRISH BENCH.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

The Attorney General for Ireland

When the Government intend to fill the vacancies caused in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland by the death of the late Mr. Justice O'Brien, and by the recent promotion of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald? He wished to ask, in addition, whether any appointments had already been made?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant is now in communication with the Prime Minister on the subject.

MR. GIBSON: Sir, bearing in mind that one of these vacancies has been four months in existence, I shall ask on Monday whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the fact that the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland stated on the first day of the term that in consequence of these vacancies no Divisional Court of Queen's Bench could sit for the present, and I shall repeat my Question.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIONS AT DRUMLISH, CO. LONGFORD.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can state the number of families evicted within the last two years in the parish of Drumlish, in the county of Longford, on the estates of Lord Granard, Colonel King Harman, Captain Douglas, Mr. Galbraith, and Mr. Crofton; and, whether the Government is aware that these evicted tenants were for the most part so poor that they had to live principally on relief meal during the late seasons of distress?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I am informed that there is no parish of Drumlish in the county Longford; but in the parishes about Drumlish in the last two years the number of families evicted on the estates in question has been 129. The local constabulary inform me that they do not believe that any of the evicted families were so poor as to be obliged to live principally on relief meal during the late seasons of distress.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked if the right hon. Gentleman could state if the rents on many of those estates were 40 per cent above the Government valuation?

MR. TREVELYAN: I cannot answer that Question without Notice.

POST OFFICE—INSURANCE OF REGISTERED LETTERS.

MR. GREER asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is the case that the City of London Marine Insurance Corporation (Limited), and other Companies, insure the contents of registered letters at the rate of one shilling per £100 declared value; and, if so, whether he will consider the advisability of granting the public the same benefits as given by other Insurance Companies?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, I believe that facilities for the insurance of the contents of registered letters are afforded by certain Companies at something like the rate which the hon. Member has mentioned. In reply to the latter part of the Question, I am not prepared at present to add the insurance of registered letters of declared value to the existing work of the Post Office.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—CASE OF
J. M. JOHNSON, EX-SUSPECT.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the case of J. M. Johnson, of Dundalk, ex-suspect, who was, on the 2nd of June instant, ordered by the magistrates in Petty Sessions at Dundalk, to find bail to keep the peace, and committed to prison for three months in default thereof; whether the magistrates acted upon the complaint of a police constable who alleged that while Johnson was, on the 14th May, engaged in photographing a hut in which a woman and her family lately evicted were living, the constable bade Johnson good day, to which Johnson made no reply; that Johnson then told the constable "to mind himself of the dynamite in the camera," and added—

"That he heard that three landlords and a sub-inspector of police had been arrested for the Phoenix Park murders;"

whether any information or complaint was made by the constable till twelve days after the occurrence, namely the 26th May, when a warrant for his arrest was issued by the resident magistrate, under which Johnson was brought in custody before the magistrates on the same day; whether the case was adjourned for a week, Johnson being allowed bail by a majority of the bench

(the resident magistrate dissenting); whether the Crown Solicitor, who attended to prosecute on behalf of the police, did so in consequence of any special instructions, or on account of the supposed gravity of the case; what offence Johnson is supposed to have committed, and under what statute the warrant was issued, the proceedings taken, or the order to find bail or for committal was made; and, whether the Lord Lieutenant approves of the course pursued by the magistrates or proposes to take any steps in reference thereto?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the facts as set forth in the Questions of the hon. and learned Member are substantially correct, except that Johnson is charged with telling the constable to "beware of dynamite," without any reference to the camera. The Executive considered it proper that the Crown Solicitor should attend the hearing of the charge. This being a case in which an order has been pronounced by the magistrates, and which the party concerned may have reviewed in the Court of Queen's Bench, His Excellency does not consider that the matter is one in which he should interfere.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered his Question, what was the offence Johnson had committed?

MR. TREVELYAN: That is precisely the Question I am not willing to answer, because the case can be brought to the Court of Queen's Bench and reviewed there.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL gave Notice that on a future day he would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether it was a rule of the Irish Executive, when a case was one which might be reviewed on an appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, not to interfere when there was that right of appeal?

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO-PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR.
THOMAS EGAN.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any special reason for the further detention of Mr. Thomas Egan, of Cloonalough, county Roscommon, who has been confined since 24th November 1881; and, if not, whether he will order Mr. Egan to be released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the only answer I can give the hon. Member is that His Excellency reconsidered Mr. Egan's case yesterday, and decided that he could not at present order his release.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. DENIS KELLY.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any special reason for the further detention of Mr. Denis Kelly, P.L.G. Dysort, county Roscommon; and, if not, whether he will advise the Lord Lieutenant to order his discharge?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant reconsidered Mr. Denis Kelly's case on the 6th instant, but found that the state of his district did not admit of his release at present.

INDIA—SIMLA ARMY COMMISSION.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, before a final decision is arrived at by him and his Council upon the recommendations of the Government of India as to the Report of the Simla Army Commission, he will lay upon the Table either a Copy of the Report or of the Recommendations of the Government of India?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am afraid I cannot add much to the reply which I gave to the hon. Gentleman last February. Some of the recommendations of the Commissioners and of the Government of India have been adopted and carried into effect; and, therefore, so far as they are concerned, the Report cannot be laid on the Table before a final decision is arrived at. As to other very important recommendations, I am sorry to say that much difference of opinion exists among my advisers at home, civil and military, and the most careful consideration is necessary before coming to a final decision upon them. If the views of the Government of India are fully adopted, legislation will be necessary, and I will, of course, take care that the House has full information before it is asked to legislate. If, on the other hand, the recommendations of the Government of India are finally negatived or materially altered, it will also be necessary that the House should have the materials for forming a judgment on the policy of the Government, and some portions, at least, of the Report and of the Correspondence will be necessary for this purpose. But I cannot think it expedient that while some of the most important questions raised by the Report are still under consideration, any of these Papers should be presented to Parliament.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—HALL OF SCIENCE, OLD STREET.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to a notice of Motion by the honourable Member for Harwich, which has appeared for many months upon the Notice paper, in which it is asserted that Dr. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the daughters of Mr. Charles Bradlaugh, are not proper persons to be employed in the work of instruction in connection with the Science and Art Department of Her Majesty's Government; and, whether he will cause inquiry to be made by the appointment of a Select Committee or otherwise as to the justice of the allegation?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the Notice of Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir Henry Tyler) has been on the Paper since August last, and, having regard to its personal character, I think that it ought before this to have been brought to an issue. I cannot, however, consider it of sufficient importance to demand investigation by a Select Committee of this House. There is really nothing to inquire into. The classes at the Hall of Science were admitted to grants by the late Government in 1879. The committee, the teachers, and the place of meeting were the same then as now. The Inspector reports the teaching to be efficient, and the classes to be properly conducted. I cannot see how persons can be refused the benefits of the Science and Art Department on account of their religious opinions, or how any Committee can inquire into such Questions.

EMIGRATION—THE "NEMESIS."

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to a paragraph in the evening paper of Monday 5th June, purporting to give an account of the sufferings of some emigrants on board the English steamer "Nemesis," said to be chartered by the Netherlands Steamship Company, resulting in an outbreak of diarrhoea, dysentery, and measles, and causing the death of eighteen persons; and, how far his authority extends in such cases, and what steps he proposes to take, or what inquiries he will make?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, my attention has been called to the statement referred to by the hon. Member concerning the steamer Nemesis. I have made careful inquiry, and I find that the steamer Nemesis is a British ship, chartered to the Royal Netherlands Steamship Company for the purpose of conveying passengers and cargo from ports in Europe to New York. I am informed by the owners, and find by the terms of the charter-party, that no responsibility whatever attaches to the owners for the food of and attendance on the passengers; and I learn from the agent of the Company that the surgeon, who was a military doctor, and all other persons, 17 in number, necessary to attend on the passengers, were engaged and provided by the Netherlands Company, and that before the Nemesis left Amsterdam the Netherlands officials had to be and were satisfied that the Netherlands law concerning emigrant ships had been complied with. I find from a telegram received from the Consul General at New York that 10 deaths occurred among the passengers, and that inquiry is about to be instituted by the Emigration Commissioners there; but no complaint had been lodged with the British Consul General. Under the circumstances stated, I have no authority to interfere or take any further steps in this matter.

MR. MOORE: Is the President of the Board of Trade aware that large numbers of persons are booked in London under the impression that they are to be carried direct from British Ports to America, and instead they are fraudulently taken to foreign ports and transhipped to a foreign line?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am not aware of that. If the hon. Member gives Notice of the Question I shall cause inquiries to be made. That inquiry could have no connection with the present case, because I am informed that the emigrants of the Nemesis were principally Jews expelled from Russia, and going to New York.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—COLEMAN NAUGHTON.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Columb Norton, the only prisoner from Arran Island, is still detained under the Coercion Act in Kilmainham Prison, at a long distance from his home; that he is unable to speak English and that there is no other prisoner in that prison who is able to speak Irish; and, whether he will now order his release?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Coleman Naughton is the name of the person to whom this Question relates, and his case is at present under the Lord Lieutenant's consideration. The other persons arrested at the same time as Naughton, charged with the same offence, have not been released, as the hon. Member seems to think. Naughton was transferred to Kilmainham Gaol in February last, and there are warders in that prison who can speak Irish.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN KELLY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any special reason for the further detention in Dundalk Prison of Mr. John Keely, in view of the fact that all other persons arrested in his locality have been released; and, whether he will now order his release?

MR. TREVELYAN: There was a John Kelly in Dundalk Prison, but he was released on the 3rd instant.

SOUTH AFRICA — ZULULAND — JOHN DUNN'S TERRITORY.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether extensive disaffection prevails in the territory of Mr. John Dunn, in Zululand; whether he can give any information as to the causes of such disaffection; and, whether that chief makes any report to the Government of Natal of his annual revenue and expenditure; and, if he does not, whether Her Majesty's Government are able to lay before the House any authentic information on this subject derived from other sources?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, I would somewhat demur to the word

"extensive" in my hon. Friend's Question; but, at the same time, there undoubtedly is disaffection in John Dunn's territory. As to the cause, I have a reasonable suspicion that it is the desire of certain Chiefs within the territory to oust John Dunn and place themselves or some of their relatives in his place. Indeed, some half-brothers of Cetewayo have already been to Natal at the head of a deputation to ask for his restoration. As to the Question about John Dunn's budget, we have no authentic information about his revenue and expenditure, as his territory is not under the British Government.

MR. GORST asked whether the hon. Gentleman would instruct the British Resident in Zululand to make inquiries as to John Dunn's expenditure?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY asked that Notice should be given of the Question; but he apprehended that the Government had no authority to interfere in the internal management of John Dunn's territory.

MR. GORST said, he would put a Question upon the Paper upon the subject.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will be able to lay upon the Table a Statement showing how the 2,734 persons evicted in Ireland during the month of April (as shown in Return No. 199) are circumstanced; i.e. the number receiving temporary shelter in the neighbourhood of their late homes; the number of those who have emigrated; the number of those who have been forced to go to the workhouses; and the number of those who are altogether homeless and wandering?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I regret that I cannot give the hon. Member this Return. It could only be given approximately, and even to do that would be a work of considerable time and labour, and the time of the constabulary is at present fully occupied by their many important duties. I may say that I have directed a very important Return to be prepared of the number of tenants evicted in Ireland whose term of redemption is now running out, and have ordered it to be pressed forward with all possible despatch.

Mr. Evelyn Ashley

ARMY—FIELD DAYS IN HOT WEATHER.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the number of deaths from heat-apoplexy reported from Aldershot last season at a Field-day held by the Duke of Cambridge, it is his intention to cause orders to be issued directing Regimental, Brigade, and Divisional Field-days to be held in the early morning during this summer in all the three kingdoms?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; by a Circular issued last year, all parades and field-days were ordered to be held in the early morning and evening while the hot weather continued. This will be repeated this year.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT SUDA BAY.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the case (as stated in the "Times" of 5th instant) that the rendezvous of the English and French fleets at Suda Bay is forty-five hours' steaming from Alexandria, whereas the anchorages of the Island of Cyprus are only twenty-six hours distant; and, whether there are any considerable advantages or facilities, as to coaling, provisioning, water, or otherwise, connected with the position of Suda Bay which justify its selection in preference to those under the administration of one of the Combined Powers, and within a shorter distance from the point of observation?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, the reason why the Mediterranean Squadron was sent to Suda Bay, in Crete, rather than to Famagousta, in Cyprus, was that the former affords a much more secure anchorage, and is more conveniently situated for the objects we had in view. It lies directly in the way between Corfu, from which the ships were moved, and Alexandria; whereas Cyprus is entirely out of the way.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. E. J. AND M. J. BARRETT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that Mr. E. J. Barrett, postal telegraphist, of Craugh-well, county Galway, has been confined in Galway Gaol for over twelve months, while another man from the same place, arrested on a similar charge, was released in March last, and if the Lord Lieutenant was aware of this when he re-considered Mr. Barrett's case; if he can state whether there is any reason for the continued detention of the brother of the above, Mr. M. J. Barrett, who is confined in Naas Gaol; and, whether he is aware that both brothers were the sole support of their aged parents?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, with regard to the case of Mr. E. J. Barrett, I beg to say that His Excellency reconsidered the case on the 3rd instant, when he decided that he could not at present order his release. Every case must be decided on its own merits, and must be considered by itself. There is no such person as M. J. Barrett in custody under the Protection Act. There is a Nicholas Barrett in custody in Naas Gaol. He is a brother of Edward Barrett, and his case is about to be reconsidered very shortly. I have not been informed whether these men were the sole support of their parents.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MARTIN MULLEAGUE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What decision has been come to in the case of Martin Mulleague, who has been confined for over twelve months in Kilmainham, and respecting whom the House was informed a few weeks ago that his case was under consideration?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency has reconsidered this case, and has called for some further information in reference to the state of Martin Mulleague's district. He cannot finally determine on the case until he receives the further report.

POST OFFICE—THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. LEAMY asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware that a strong feeling exists in Ireland in favour of accelerating the Mails between London and Dublin, so as to allow of their despatch, at an earlier hour than at present, to the other cities and large towns of Ireland; whether any representations have been made to him on the subject; and, whether, as a new contract is about to be entered into for the carriage of the Mails between Holyhead and Dublin, the Government will endeavour to make arrangements for a speedier transmission of the Mails from England to Ireland via Holyhead, and thereby confer a great advantage on the traders of the two countries?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I beg to state that several representations have been made to me in favour of accelerating the mails between London and Dublin and other cities and large towns in Ireland, and the suggestions received are being carefully examined. With reference to the last part of the hon. Member's Question, the subject of accelerating the mails from England to Ireland, via Holyhead, will not be lost sight of in considering the tenders for a new service, which have been called for.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—ARMING OF THE FORTS AT ALEXANDRIA.

MR. BOURKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he still adheres to the statement made by him on the 2nd of June that "the earthworks in Alexandria Harbour were not yet armed in any way," or whether it is the fact that some time before the 2nd of June there were in those earthworks three 18-ton guns and twenty 64-pounder guns?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir. I adhere to the statement which I made on the 2nd of June, and in reply to my right hon. Friend's second Question, I can inform him that it is not the fact. I may add that the Admiralty possessed sufficient knowledge of the fortifications at Alexandria not to entertain the slightest apprehensions.

INDIA (BENGAL)—MORTALITY IN GAOLS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, What punishments, if any, have been inflicted upon the authorities responsible for the excessive mortality in the gaols of Bengal, through deficient diet, during the year 1879 and part of the year 1880?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, no punishment has been inflicted, so far as I am aware, upon anyone in respect of the great mortality in the gaols in Bengal in 1879-80. I have never denied that there was a very great mortality during the period referred to, not only in Bengal, but in other Provinces. At first it was believed by many persons, including the Lieutenant Governor and the Inspector General of Gaols of Bengal, that the increased mortality was mainly caused by the reduced scale of diet introduced in March, 1879. The question, however, is an exceedingly difficult one. It has been engaging the anxious attention of the authorities in India as well as in this country, and further inquiries show that it is far from clear that the reduced diet had anything to do with the increase which occurred in the rate of mortality; but, whatever may have been its effect, the reduction of the scale of diet was on the recommendation of a Committee, and was not the act of any individual official. The Government of India, having gone very fully into the subject, transmitted, in February last, their despatch upon it. They are of opinion that there are good grounds for the conclusion that the connection between the mortality and the reduced diet has been too hastily assumed, and that there is no reason to believe that it was because they were insufficiently fed that the prisoners anywhere died in excess numbers in 1879; and they attribute the rise in the death-rate mainly to influences affecting the general population of the country. They think that the reduced rate of diet may possibly be susceptible of improvement in detail, but that, when compared with the scales which have been found to answer well in English prisons, it cannot be considered deficient to such an extent as to have been, in any appreciable degree, a cause of mortality. If the hon. Member likes to move for the Correspondence, I shall have no objection to give it as an unopposed Return.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether, since there had been an improvement in the diet, the rate of mortality had not sunk; also, whether any punishment had been awarded for the excessive floggings inflicted on prisoners while they were under an almost starvation scale of diet?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I am happy to say that there has been a very great diminution in the rate of mortality, and certainly it has taken place since the alteration was made in the scale of diet. But, as I have said, the Government of India is not satisfied that the increased rate of mortality was caused by the reduced scale of diet. With regard to the punishment inflicted on prisoners, that has also been carefully inquired into, and orders have been issued on the subject.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that on going into Committee of Supply he would call attention to the flogging of 11,000 prisoners in the gaols of Bengal between the 1st of January, 1879, and the 31st of March, 1880, almost exclusively on charges of short work, although the scale of diet was admitted to be insufficient to support healthy life, and although many hundreds of prisoners died of starvation and starvation diseases; and that he would move that such flogging, under the circumstances, was brutal, inhuman, and criminal, and that the appointment to the Indian Council of Sir Ashley Eden, late Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, was a condonation of maladministration which was calculated to discredit good government in India. He also appealed to the noble Marquess to afford him any opportunity in his power for a thorough examination of that most serious question.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. DENIS CROSBIE.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any special reason for the further detention, under the Coercion Act, of Mr. Denis Crosbie, in view of the fact that all the prisoners from his district, in the county of Wexford, who were arrested upon similar charges, and at the same time, have been released, and that the district is and has been entirely free from outrages of all kinds?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Denis Crosbie was released on the 6th instant.

POST OFFICE—AUXILIARY LETTER CARRIERS.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, With reference to the claims of the letter carriers and auxiliary letter carriers of the United Kingdom, set forth in their Memorials to the Postmaster General more than twelve months since, whether he will now enable the Right honourable gentleman to terminate the long suspense of the Memorialists, as being productive of serious discontent in his department and of consequent injury to the interests of the Public Service?

The Marquess of Hartington

MR. COURTNEY: As the hon. Member is aware, the matter of this Question has been for some time under deliberation, and the communications between the Treasury and the Postmaster General have now arrived at a point which, I believe, will lead to a speedy settlement.

STATE OF IRELAND — OUTRAGE AT RATHCOOLE.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received any information as to an attack reported (in the "Times" newspaper of the 4th June 1882) to have been made upon the house of a farmer named Timothy Lyons, at Rathcoole, near Kanturk, in which two soldiers were stationed on protection duty; and, whether any arrests have been made in connection with this outrage?

MR. TREVELYAN: Yes, Sir; I have received a report upon the case referred to in the Question of the noble Lord, which is to the effect that the house in question was attacked on the morning of the 5th instant. Two arrests have been made in connection with the matter.

PETROLEUM ACT (INDIA), 1881 — IMPORTATION OF EXPLOSIVE OILS FROM AMERICA.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether the cargoes of petroleum stopped for inflammability at Calcutta, but admitted, by special privilege, on receipt of information from the Home Government, were intended for the use of Government, or for sale to the people of India; who were the shippers of the said cargoes, and what representations were made on their behalf at the India Office; whether it is permissible in England to suspend the safeguards and prohibitions against the importation and sale of dangerous oils in England; and, whether the Government of India will grant compensation in case of loss of life or injury to person or property arising from the use of the inflammable petroleum landed at Calcutta by the special licence of the Indian authorities?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon. Member had probably placed the Question on the Paper before I had answered the Question of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) on Tuesday. The cargoes of petroleum in question were not admitted into India, but are still under detention. They were for sale, not Government stores. The shippers were Messrs. Wallace Brothers and Messrs. Blackwood and Conor. I stated on Tuesday the nature of the representations they made at this office. The Legislature in India, as in England, can, of course, modify existing Petroleum Acts. If the Indian law is modified by the Legislature no question of compensation can arise.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether the quantity of petroleum in question was not nearly 3,000,000 gallons, and whether the objection to landing it in India was not that according to the temperature of India it was, in its present state, explosable? He also asked if the noble Lord would give a pledge that none of the petroleum should be landed in an explosable condition?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I stated on Tuesday what I believed the quantity of the petroleum to be. No petroleum can be landed in India until the Act is modified, except under the conditions of the existing law. I have not received any additional information from the Government of India, but I have reason to believe that they have postponed legislation for a time, in consequence of representations made to them in India.

ARMY — COMMITTEE ON DRESS OF THE ARMY.

COLONEL BARNE asked the Secretary of State for War, When the Committee on the Dress of the Army is expected to make its report; and, whether, when made, it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. CHILDERS: I find, Sir, that the Committee will report soon; but its business has been delayed by an accident to one of its Members. When I have read the Report I will consider whether it can be laid on the Table.

POST OFFICE — LETTER CARRIERS
(BLACKHEATH AND GREENWICH).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is not the fact that the established letter carriers in Woolwich originally entered the service as suburban letter carriers under the Metropolitan Suburban District, and that they have since been classed as Provincial Letter Carriers, with the effect that their clothing allowances have been reduced; whether their duties are not of the same nature as those of the letter carriers in Blackheath and Greenwich, who receive higher pay; whether, under these circumstances, steps will be taken for restoring to the Woolwich letter carriers the rights they enjoyed when they entered the service, and for placing them in the same position as regards emoluments as the Blackheath and Greenwich letter carriers; and, whether the Treasury have yet arrived at any decision on the question of the emoluments of the letter carriers generally?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, it is a fact that certain of the letter carriers at Woolwich originally entered the Service as suburban letter carriers in the Metropolitan district; that they are now classed as Provincial letter carriers, though on the same scale of wages as previously; and that a portion of their uniform used to be renewed somewhat more frequently than it is now. I will consider whether, as regards the men who entered the Service prior to the transfer of Woolwich to the Provincial district, the old arrangements for the supply of uniforms should not be reverted to. I do not consider that the circumstances would justify the adoption of an equally high rate of wages for the letter carriers at Woolwich as at Blackheath and Greenwich. The latter part of my hon. Friend's Question has already been answered by the Secretary to the Treasury.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any persons confined under the Protection Act in Ireland, under the reasonable suspicion of being guilty of crimes other than intimidation, have been recently released; and, whether he will give the number of such cases, and the crimes with which such persons were charged, and the grounds on which their release was ordered?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in reply to the Question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to say that 24 persons who had been in confinement under the Protection of Person and Property Act, under reasonable suspicion of being guilty of crimes other than intimidation, have been recently released. The right hon. and learned Member will be able to inform himself of the nature of these crimes if he will examine the list already presented to Parliament, together with that presented on the 5th of June, which will be in Members' hands in the course of a few days. In all these cases His Excellency, after careful inquiry and consideration, ordered the release of the parties, because he was satisfied that there was no longer any sufficient necessity for their detention.

MR. GIBSON: Is it a fact that some of the persons so released were suspected of the crime of murder?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, some of those persons were in prison on suspicion of inciting to murder; but the circumstances and the nature of that suspicion are obviously among the considerations which His Excellency has taken into account.

MR. GIBSON: I do not think I could have conveyed my Question. I asked whether any of the persons so released were confined under suspicion of having committed murder?

MR. HEALY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I beg to ask whether that suspicion was not merely the opinion of the right hon. Member for Bradford?

MR. TREVELYAN: None of those persons, so far as I am aware, were confined under the suspicion of having committed murder.

Subsequently,

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will consider the advisability of releasing from custody Mr. Joseph Fay, of Ballymore, county Westmeath, who has undergone more than six months' imprisonment on the ground of reasonable suspicion of inciting to non-payment of rent, and who is known to the clergy and people of Ballymore to be a man of orderly habits and good character; also, whether he will take into consideration the advisability of directing the release of Mr. Patrick Scally and Mr. Lawrence Daly, of Castle-town, Geohagan, in the county of Westmeath, now imprisoned as suspects in Dundalk Gaol, on charges of intimidation, the truth of which they entirely deny, and their detention being the cause of great hardship and suffering to their families?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant reconsidered Mr. Joseph Fay's case yesterday, but found that he could not at present order his release. His Excellency also reconsidered the cases of Messrs. Patrick Scally and Lawrence Daly yesterday, but found that they could not at present be released with safety to the peace of the district.

MR. BULWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a suspect called Power from the neighbourhood of Tralee has been recently released from custody in Ireland by the Lord Lieutenant; with what offence was he charged; and, what was the reason for his release?

MR. TREVELYAN: Michael Power, of Tralee, was released from custody on the 18th of May by order of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and learned Member will find the particulars of the offence of which he was reasonably suspected in the Returns before the House. I think it is not convenient that in the case of this great number of "suspects" I should be asked to state to the House the nature of each offence. His Excellency carefully inquired into the case, and found that the state of the district now admitted of this man's release.

METROPOLIS—EPPING FOREST.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether having regard to the fact that the Lord Mayor of London has received a baronetcy, and the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex knighthoods, in connection with the opening of Epping Forest, with the freeing of which they were absolutely unconnected, it is intended to reward, and, if so, in what manner, the brothers Wellingdale, the working men who initiated the agitation which resulted in the freeing of the forest, and who are now residing in its neighbourhood?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, my hon. Friend seems to be under the impression that I am the dispenser of baronetcies and knighthoods. It may be a matter of interest to him to know that the bestowal of dignities of that character belongs to more important quarters. With regard to the man who is referred to in the Question, his real name was Willingale; he was an old man who played a very gallant part in vindicating lopping rights, and was deserving of all honour. Long ago he passed out of the reach of baronetcies, knighthoods, or any other rewards. But I am happy to say that I have had a note from the solicitor to the Corporation of London, who says that the Corporation gives a small annuity to the man's widow—a very proper thing.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will be good enough to tell me to whom I am to apply in case I wish for a baronetcy or any other reward.

IRELAND—KILLALOE DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the present condition of the drainage works at Killaloe, the number of men in daily employment, and the date at which the officials in charge expect the works to be completed?

MR. TREVELYAN: This is not a Question for the Irish Government. It should be addressed to the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. COURTNEY: As this Question relates to the Board of Works, I beg to answer it on behalf of the Treasury. About three-fourths of the work at Killaloe sluices has been finished. Forty-six men on an average are employed there, which is as many as the nature of the works admit of. It is expected that the works will be completed in August next.

POOR LAW—THE BURNLEY BOARD OF GUARDIANS — ROMAN CATHOLIC CHILDREN.

MR. CALLAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his at-

POST OFFICE — LETTER CARRIERS (BLACKHEATH AND GREENWICH).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is not the fact that the established letter carriers in Woolwich originally entered the service as suburban letter carriers under the Metropolitan Suburban District, and that they have since been classed as Provincial Letter Carriers, with the effect that their clothing allowances have been reduced; whether their duties are not of the same nature as those of the letter carriers in Blackheath and Greenwich, who receive higher pay; whether, under these circumstances, steps will be taken for restoring to the Woolwich letter carriers the rights they enjoyed when they entered the service, and for placing them in the same position as regards emoluments as the Blackheath and Greenwich letter carriers; and, whether the Treasury have yet arrived at any decision on the question of the emoluments of the letter carriers generally?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, it is a fact that certain of the letter carriers at Woolwich originally entered the Service as suburban letter carriers in the Metropolitan district; that they are now classed as Provincial letter carriers, though on the same scale of wages as previously; and that a portion of their uniform used to be renewed somewhat more frequently than it is now. I will consider whether, as regards the men who entered the Service prior to the transfer of Woolwich to the Provincial district, the old arrangements for the supply of uniforms should not be reverted to. I do not consider that the circumstances would justify the adoption of an equally high rate of wages for the letter carriers at Woolwich as at Blackheath and Greenwich. The latter part of my hon. Friend's Question has already been answered by the Secretary to the Treasury.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any persons confined under the Protection Act in Ireland, under the reasonable suspicion of being guilty of crimes other than intimidation, have been recently released; and, whether he will give the number of such cases, and the crimes with which such persons were charged, and the grounds on which their release was ordered?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in reply to the Question of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I beg to say that 24 persons who had been in confinement under the Protection of Person and Property Act, under reasonable suspicion of being guilty of crimes other than intimidation, have been recently released. The right hon. and learned Member will be able to inform himself of the nature of these crimes if he will examine the list already presented to Parliament, together with that presented on the 5th of June, which will be in Members' hands in the course of a few days. In all these cases His Excellency, after careful inquiry and consideration, ordered the release of the parties, because he was satisfied that there was no longer any sufficient necessity for their detention.

MR. GIBSON: Is it a fact that some of the persons so released were suspected of the crime of murder?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, some of those persons were in prison on suspicion of inciting to murder; but the circumstances and the nature of that suspicion are obviously among the considerations which His Excellency has taken into account.

MR. GIBSON: I do not think I could have conveyed my Question. I asked whether any of the persons so released were confined under suspicion of having committed murder?

MR. HEALY: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that Question, I beg to ask whether that suspicion was not merely the opinion of the right hon. Member for Bradford?

MR. TREVELYAN: None of those persons, so far as I am aware, were confined under the suspicion of having committed murder.

Subsequently,

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will consider the advisability of releasing from custody Mr. Joseph Fay, of Ballymore, county Westmeath, who has undergone more than six months' imprisonment on the ground of reasonable suspicion of inciting to non-payment of rent, and who is known to the clergy and people of Ballymore to be a man of orderly habits and good character; also, whether he will take into consideration the advisability of directing the release of Mr. Patrick Scally and Mr. Lawrence Daly, of Castle-town, Geohagan, in the county of Westmeath, now imprisoned as suspects in Dundalk Gaol, on charges of intimidation, the truth of which they entirely deny, and their detention being the cause of great hardship and suffering to their families?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant reconsidered Mr. Joseph Fay's case yesterday, but found that he could not at present order his release. His Excellency also reconsidered the cases of Messrs. Patrick Scally and Lawrence Daly yesterday, but found that they could not at present be released with safety to the peace of the district.

MR. BULWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether a suspect called Power from the neighbourhood of Tralee has been recently released from custody in Ireland by the Lord Lieutenant; with what offence was he charged; and, what was the reason for his release?

MR. TREVELYAN: Michael Power, of Tralee, was released from custody on the 18th of May by order of the Lord Lieutenant. The hon. and learned Member will find the particulars of the offence of which he was reasonably suspected in the Returns before the House. I think it is not convenient that in the case of this great number of "suspects" I should be asked to state to the House the nature of each offence. His Excellency carefully inquired into the case, and found that the state of the district now admitted of this man's release.

METROPOLIS—EPPING FOREST.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether having regard to the fact that the Lord Mayor of London has received a baronetcy, and the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex knighthoods, in connection with the opening of Epping Forest, with the freeing of which they were absolutely unconnected, it is intended to reward, and, if so, in what manner, the brothers Wellingdale, the working men who initiated the agitation which resulted in the freeing of the forest, and who are now residing in its neighbourhood?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, my hon. Friend seems to be under the impression that I am the dispenser of baronetcies and knighthoods. It may be a matter of interest to him to know that the bestowal of dignities of that character belongs to more important quarters. With regard to the man who is referred to in the Question, his real name was Willingale; he was an old man who played a very gallant part in vindicating lopping rights, and was deserving of all honour. Long ago he passed out of the reach of baronetcies, knighthoods, or any other rewards. But I am happy to say that I have had a note from the solicitor to the Corporation of London, who says that the Corporation gives a small annuity to the man's widow—a very proper thing.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the right hon. and learned Gentleman will be good enough to tell me to whom I am to apply in case I wish for a baronetcy or any other reward.

IRELAND—KILLALOE DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the present condition of the drainage works at Killaloe, the number of men in daily employment, and the date at which the officials in charge expect the works to be completed?

MR. TREVELYAN: This is not a Question for the Irish Government. It should be addressed to the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. COURTNEY: As this Question relates to the Board of Works, I beg to answer it on behalf of the Treasury. About three-fourths of the work at Killaloe sluices has been finished. Forty-six men on an average are employed there, which is as many as the nature of the works admit of. It is expected that the works will be completed in August next.

POOR LAW—THE BURNLEY BOARD OF GUARDIANS — ROMAN CATHOLIC CHILDREN.

MR. CALLAN asked the President of the Local Government Board, If his attention has been directed to a statement which appears in the "Weekly Register" of the 3rd instant, to the effect that—

"At the last meeting of the Burnley Board of Guardians, the Rev. James Merrissey made application that the Catholic children should be allowed to attend the services in the Catholic church, instead of attending the services of the Church of England as at present. Mr. J. W. Hartly moved, 'That the application of the Rev. James Merrissey should be allowed, pointing out that the guardians stood in the position of parents to children, and, as such, ought to give them religious training, which would be afforded by the fathers and mothers.' Mr. Law, in seconding the motion, remarked that it was only common sense and fairness to grant the application, and that they ought not to refuse to Catholic children the religious training they would wish them to have. The Chairman pointed out that if any inconvenience arose from the granting of the application the guardians could rescind it, but the guardians, by a majority of sixteen to ten, refused the application, the result of which is that the Catholic children are obliged to attend the religious services and instructions of the Protestant Church;"

whether, in view of the foregoing circumstances, the Local Government Board will take the necessary steps to secure to the Catholic pauper children in the Burnley Workhouse the full and free exercise of their religion; and, whether, in view of the many and grave complaints that have been made of the religious intolerance of boards of guardians in England towards Catholic inmates of workhouses, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill to give to the Local Government Board in England the same controlling power, in the matter of protecting the rights of conscience and providing for the religious requirements of paupers, as is exercised by the Local Government Board in Ireland?

MR. DODSON: Sir, the Board have received no information whatever on this subject, and as the Notice only appeared to-day, I have had no time to ascertain the facts. I will, however, have the matter inquired into, as it is my wish to secure to the Roman Catholic children in the workhouse the full and free exercise of their religion.

IRELAND — PRISONERS UNDER THE STATUTE 34 EDWARD III. CAP. 1—MISS GLEESON.

MR. J. C. LAWRENCE asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether Miss Gleeson, a member of the Ladies Land

League, was recently released from custody, having within the last few weeks been sentenced to three months' imprisonment in default of giving bail for good behaviour; whether this release was ordered by the Lord Lieutenant without such bail being given, and without any communication with the convicting magistrates; and, whether the conviction was legal and warranted by the facts; and, if so, what were the grounds for release?

MR. TREVELYAN: Miss Gleeson has been set free by His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant in the exercise of the prerogative. It is not for me, Sir, to inquire reasons from His Excellency; but if I may do so with respect, I may express my conviction that sufficient reasons influenced him in the matter, and also that I have no doubt he communicated with the magistrates.

INSPECTORS OF FISHERIES.

MR. BIRKBECK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the appointment of Inspector of Salmon Fisheries, lately held by Mr. Spencer Walpole, has yet been filled up; and, if not, whether he can now state what decision the Government have come to as regards the vacancy; and, further, whether, taking into consideration the great importance of our fisheries, they would appoint an Inspector of inland fisheries and two Inspectors of sea fisheries?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I may say that it is not the intention of the Government to fill up the present vacancy on the same conditions as the former appointments. The Government fully recognize the importance of the subject, and the question of what is to be done both with inland and sea fisheries is still under consideration.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. CROSBIE AND MRS. QUINN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If the Lord Lieutenant has reconsidered the case of Mr. Crosbie, of Bannow, county Wexford; and, if, in reconsidering the case of Mr. Quinn, assistant secretary of the Land League, the Lord Lieutenant had before him the fact that the two secretaries of the Land League were released from prison, and that Mr. Quinn simply acted as an official with clerical duties in the office of the League?

MR. TREVELYAN: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave in an earlier part of the day. This case must be considered separately.

MR. HEALY: I will repeat the Question again on Monday, and repeat it daily until I get an answer.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the British Government intend to press for a Conference against the opposition of the Porte; and, whether he will state the exact character of "the favourable replies" which he stated on Tuesday had been received from all the Great Powers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, in reply to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave on Monday to the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite, and in reply to his second Question, I can only state that he will learn the exact character of the replies received when the Papers appear.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT wished to know whether an Identic Note had been presented to the Porte by England and France, and whether the Sultan had offered to restore law and order and to support the Khedive; and whether, in consideration of the extreme injury to British interests which would accrue from the alienation of the great Mussulman Power, it was the intention of the Government to co-operate with the Porte?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I decline to answer the argumentative portion of the hon. Member's Question, and with respect to the rest, there is no foundation, of which I am aware, for the rumour respecting the Identic Note.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is the hon. Baronet able to state whether the Government are pressing this Conference, or whether they will await the result of Dervish Pasha's mission?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I must decline to make any further reply. If the hon. Member likes, he can give Notice of his Question. I have nothing to add to what I said on Monday last. It was a very brief reply, but it was a real answer to that Question, and I can add nothing to it.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask when the Papers will be laid on the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The printers promised the first portion of the Papers—up to the 5th of January—by to-morrow. The further Papers are being rapidly proceeded with in two sections, and I apprehend there will be no great delay in their presentation.

MR. BOURKE: The hon. Baronet said, I think, on a previous occasion, that he was in communication with the French Government; but I did not understand him to promise the later Papers at any particular time. Perhaps on Monday he will be able to give that information.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I think I shall be able to answer that Question on Monday.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—CLAUSE 5—DEASY'S ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government have drawn the fifth Clause of the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill, subsection (b.), in order to prevent the exercise by the tenant of his existing right of redemption without the landlord's consent, in cases where the court issues a writ of restitution on payment of the rent and costs; if not, whether he is aware that the Clause, as it now stands, will infringe on the tenant's existing rights under Deasy's Act; and, can he state in what way this will tend to the prevention of crime in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: This is a Question that might more properly be asked when the House reaches the 5th clause in Committee; but I can answer it briefly. So far as the intentions of the Government are concerned, they do not contemplate in any manner interfering with the rights giving security to the tenant, under what is known as Lord Deasy's Act, and they are quite prepared to introduce words, if this is thought necessary, to make this plain.

MR. HEALY asked when the Government would place on the Paper the Amendments they proposed to make on the Prevention of Crime Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is not the opinion of the Government that the clause, as it stands, interferes with the rights of tenants; and, therefore, they do not propose to move an Amendment unless this were shown in argument to be necessary.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — ENGLISH AND SCOTCH AGRICULTURAL MEASURES.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been drawn to recent expressions of opinion by Scotch and English agriculturists as to the pressing necessity of legislative remedial measures for the farming interest; and, whether, considering the small portion of the present or past Sessions which has been devoted to the discussion of English and Scotch agricultural topics, he will, in the event of the amendments to the Irish Bills now before the House not having been disposed of before Wednesday next, make arrangements for the Agricultural Tenants' Compensation Bill being taken on that day; and, if not on that day, whether the Government will give a future day for the purpose of discussing this and other Bills before the House of a like character?

MR. CHAPLIN said, he wished to ask another Question before the right hon. Gentleman replied. He presumed that the Question of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard) related to the Bill which stood in his (Mr. Chaplin's) name, and was the First Order for Wednesday next. He was very grateful to the hon. Member for the interest he took in that Bill, more particularly as he did all he could to prevent its introduction. Important as the question was, he (Mr. Chaplin) should certainly not think of asking the Prime Minister, in the present position of public affairs—["Order!"]—

MR. JAMES HOWARD: Will the hon. Member permit me?—["Order!"]

MR. CHAPLIN, continuing, said that, having regard to the gravity of the situation in Ireland, he should not think of asking the Prime Minister to interpose before Irish Business was concluded. What he wished to ask the Prime Minister was, when the stages of the Prevention of Crime Bill were further advanced, whether the Government would consider this question with a view to saying whether they would be able to give a favourable reply, and whether they would be able to give some facilities for the discussion of a question of so much importance before the Session was concluded?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he did not see that the question of the hon. Member differed from that put on the Paper by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire; but he must give an answer on the subject which he was very unwilling to give. There was no doubt whatever as to the pressing necessity of legislation in the direction indicated by the Bill of the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin). He admitted that in the strongest terms; but he was sorry to say he could give no pledge whatever in regard to any particular measure at the present moment other than those measures which were before the House, nor, indeed, could he give a pledge with regard to the whole of those measures; and until the House had been pleased to make large modifications in its methods of transacting Business, he felt that both this great and important subject, and many other subjects of possibly equal importance—at any rate of great importance—must remain in a position generally unsatisfactory to the country—a condition which it would be the object and desire of the Government to bring as soon as possible to a close.

MR. CHAPLIN gave Notice that in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, he would, after Committee on the Prevention of Crime Bill had concluded, repeat the Question.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Land Commissioners had made any suggestions for improving the mode of enforcing their orders for the erection of cottages on farms the rents of which had been reduced by the Land Court; and, if so, whether the Government proposed to introduce a measure in accordance with those suggestions?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in reply to the Question of the noble Lord the Member for North Leicestershire, I beg to say that the Land Commissioners have offered suggestions for amending the law for enforcing orders made by them for the erection of labourers' cottages on all farms where judicial rents have been fixed and such orders made. I can promise that the suggestions shall receive careful attention; but I cannot as yet make any statement as to the precise intentions of the Government with respect to them.

NAVY—ACCIDENT ON BOARD H.M.S.
"SWIFTSURE."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has received any information with regard to the accident which occurred on board Her Majesty's ship "Swiftsure?"

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Sir, the Admiralty has received a report from the captain of Her Majesty's ship Swiftsure of the circumstances of the accident which occurred on board that ship while saluting the Portuguese flag at Madeira on the 31st ultimo. The breech-piece of a 25-pounder breech-loading gun was blown, when the gun was fired, across the deck, killing Charles James, gunner's mate, breaking the right arm of James W. Caroline, able seaman (afterwards amputated), and slightly injuring two other men. The inquiry which was held shows that the accident was entirely due to negligence on the part of the gunner's crew, and not to any defect in the gun itself. This negligence will, in due course, be dealt with by the Admiralty.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. THOMAS DUNLEAVY.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If there is any reason for the further detention of Mr. Thomas Dunleavy, a suspect, in Galway Gaol, who has been imprisoned for eighteen months, and who belongs to Kilmonee, in the county of Mayo, a district free from disturbance and outrage?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant reconsidered Mr. Thomas Dunleavy's case on the 30th of May, and decided that he could not at present order his release. The hon. and learned Member is in error in supposing that Mr. Dunleavy has been for 18 months in detention. He was arrested on the 23rd of November last, and has, therefore, been in custody for about six and a-half months.

NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE CONFERENCE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF gave Notice that on Monday next he would ask the Prime Minister, Whether, in the event of the proposed Conference being held, the British Plenipotentiary would be directed to call the attention of the Conference to the non-fulfilment of certain stipulations in the Treaty of Berlin, especially those which provided for the introduction of reforms in Asiatic and European Turkey, the demolition of the Bulgarian fortresses, and the assumption of part of the Ottoman Debt by the States which formally formed part of the Turkish Empire?

MR. PULESTON gave Notice that on the same day he would ask the Prime Minister, Whether, at the proposed Conference, Her Majesty's Representative would be directed to call attention to the state of things in Tunis caused by the recent action of the French Government?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND)
BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 7th June.]

[SEVENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 4 (Intimidation).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 3, to leave out lines 14 and 15, and insert "by acts or threats of violence, or injury to person or property, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation."—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It may be convenient to the Committee that

[Seventh Night.]

I should state that Her Majesty's Government have been very anxious to consider the suggestions which have been thrown out in reference to this clause in the course of the debate yesterday, and as to whether in any or in what respect we could make any amendment to the clause, so as to make it meet any objections which may appear to be well founded. The character of the difficulties raised by two hon. and learned Gentlemen—the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) and the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce)—was this—that the latter part of the clause was too absolute in its terms, and that it applied to every act of the nature indicated, without giving an indication of any limitation whatever. I would venture to point out to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) that that is not really the case, because the latter part of the clause is really only an interpretation of the word intimidation at the beginning of the clause, and that that word is introduced at the beginning of the clause in respect of the limitation of Sub-sections a and b—that is to say, that those acts will not be offences unless they are done with a view to certain things there mentioned, or in consequence of certain things there mentioned. As I said in answer to a question that was put to me, it is these acts by themselves that are made an offence, having relation to the surrounding circumstances, the intent with which they are done, and the object at which they aim. Now, that was always the intention of the clause. I believe that, interpreted by a lawyer, no other construction could be put upon the words of the clause. But we desire that this should be made perfectly clear, because the latter part of the clause, as has been properly said, is meant to be a declaration of the meaning of the clause, and would so be regarded by the magistrates who administer it, and the public who are to be governed by it. Therefore, that there should be no doubt whatever on that subject, we are willing to add certain words. I have stated that "intimidation" includes—and the suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend was that it was made to include—acts which might not, of themselves, be considered an offence. I perfectly understand what he meant by that; but I object to it, on the ground that it would be a negative declaration. You say it is not by itself to constitute intimidation; but you give no indication to anybody of what are to be the circumstances which are to make the act an offence. I propose to amend the clause by adding at the end a Proviso that the case is only to be regarded with respect to the surrounding circumstances, such as the condition of the district, and so forth. The Proviso I propose to add is as follows:—

"Provided that the circumstances of the case show that such words are spoken, or acts done, with a view to or in consequence of the matters mentioned in Sub-sections a and b of this section."

That will indicate that the act is not to be regarded as an offence unless the surrounding circumstances show the intent with which it is done. It is to be regarded in reference to the circumstances of the case only; and it must be shown that the words were spoken, or the acts done, with a view to, and in consequence of, the matters mentioned in the sub-sections. That will make quite clear what I say is in effect the scope of the clause—that "intimidation" is governed by Sub-sections a and b, and that the interpretation of "intimidation" is also governed by Sub-sections a and b. Then, in addition to that, I am quite willing to accept an Amendment which stands on the Paper in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen), in page 3, line 26, after "done," insert "in order to, and" calculated to put any person in fear, &c. That would provide that the Court should be of opinion that the act was done with the intent to produce the result there defined. Therefore, it is quite proper that the words "in order to, and" should be added before the word "calculated." These words are entirely consistent with the intention of the clause; and if they serve to make the clause clearer it will be an advantage, although I am of opinion that the section, with the Proviso I have suggested, would make the matter sufficiently clear.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would read the words following, so as to show the exact position of the clause after the Amendment was adopted?

Sir William Harcourt

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he proposed to add the Proviso at the end of the clause.

MR. HEALY asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman to read the Proviso as it would stand in the Bill, if adopted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I propose, at the end of Clause 4, to add these words—

“Provided the circumstances of the case show that such words were spoken, or acts done, with a view to or in consequence of the matters mentioned in Sub-sections a and b of this section.”

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: In point of fact, that they were done intentionally?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The words “in order to and” will be inserted before the word “calculated,” in line 26 of the clause. That is a separate Amendment, proposed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen), but it is an Amendment which I propose to accept.

MR. GIBSON:

“In order to and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself,” &c.?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes.

MR. PARNELL said, it appeared to him that the supposed concession of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was entirely illusory. Indeed, it made the clause almost worse than it was at present. If it was not surplusage, it certainly could only have the effect of making the clause worse.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am quite willing to admit to the hon. Member that if he does not wish to accept this Amendment I am not anxious to press it. I believe that the clause, as it stands already, will meet all the circumstances of the case.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very glad to see that the view of the right hon. and learned Gentleman coincided with his own—that the addition he proposed to make to the clause was already contained in it. In point of fact, the right hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to repeat words in his Proviso which were already in Sub-section a. Sub-section a commenced in this way—

“With a view to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to do.”

The Proviso provided that the circumstances of the case should require that such word was spoken, or act done, with a view to, or in consequence of, the matters mentioned in Sub-sections a and b of this section. What in the world, then, was the object of this wonderful concession? If it was not intended to throw dust in the eyes of the Committee, he did not know with what intention it could possibly have been brought forward. With the utmost respect for the views of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), who had proposed this Amendment, and also for those of his Colleagues with whom he was acting in regard to the Bill, he felt bound to give his own impression upon the matter, and he certainly considered that this Proviso would be mere surplusage. It left the clause in all its full mischief, and it did not alter the scope or effect of it in the slightest degree. It still left the tribunal which was to administer the operation of the Bill to be the judge of the intent and of the effect of it. He thought it was necessary that those who undertook the task of putting down combinations in Ireland should know what it was that they really did undertake. Last year they were told that the Government desired to put down crime and outrage and intimidation—according to the law that then existed and which existed now—resulting from combinations among tenants. But this year the Government told them that the result of the combinations among tenants in Ireland had been to produce crime and outrage; and, therefore, that they must now take power to put down the combinations themselves, because it was found by experience that if a certain combination was made, crime, outrage, and intimidation resulted from that combination. What was the attitude of the Government? They might cover it over as much as they liked, and the Home Secretary might pretend that he did not mean to put down combination; but the Committee knew what the results of the protestations of the Home Secretary and other Members of the Government last year had been. They knew perfectly well that if these undefined and vast powers were to be intrusted to the stipendiary magistrates throughout the country, all open combination would be forbidden, and it would be utterly impossible to carry on any open movement of any kind whatever in Ireland. The Home Secretary said the other day that the tendency of legislation had been to limit the right of combination among Trades Unions. He (Mr. Parnell) denied that altogether. He thought that everybody who had studied Trades Unionism knew that the Trades Unions had been engaged in very much the same sort of struggle as they were now engaged in in Ireland. As a result of this struggle, the Acts of 1871 and 1875 were passed; and those Acts expressly prevented the Law of Conspiracy from being applied to those combinations of workmen, and expressly defined the kind of intimidation and the acts of intimidation for which workmen might be punished if coercion were resorted to in connection with these combinations. The Irish farmers now were very much in the position of the English workmen 20 or 25 years ago, when they were struggling for alterations in the law, and when the Law of Conspiracy was being used to put down those combinations. He would repeat again what he said the other day in that House, that they were perfectly willing that the Government should define the offence of intimidation as regarded the Irish farmers, and all that the Irish Members asked was that it should be defined. They asked that it should be defined according to the Conspiracy Act of 1875, in which there were five distinct grounds of intimidation laid down. In this case the Government might lay down 40 if they liked to apply them to the Irish farmers; but they wanted to know what it was they could really do, and what they were not to do, and they objected to intrust the stipendiary magistrates with these undefined powers. It was perfectly absurd to suppose that the Lord Lieutenant would be able to control the action of the stipendiary magistrates. If he attempted to do so, the result would be that this legislation would be nugatory, and that it would be impossible for the magistrates to act. If he did not do so, the result would be that the magistrates, who were really representative of the landlord class—the class of ascendancy—would act against the people and their rights and privileges. In taking power thus to put an end to “Boycotting,” they were practically taking power to put an end to every kind of open combination. The public were told that outrages and intimidation were so much mixed up with exclusive dealing that it was impossible to define what intimidation meant. Now, that he denied; and he said that it was perfectly possible for them to define what intimidation was, so that the tenant farmers and the labourers of Ireland should know whether they were standing within the law, and where the limit outside the law was. What the Home Secretary appeared to object to was the right of the people to combine so as to affect other people who were not parties to the combination; but if they denied that right to the people of Ireland, why did they not also deny it to the mechanics of England? Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary mean to assert that the workmen of England could combine and could strike against an employer without affecting that employer, who was not a party to the combination? If the employer was not a party to the combination, he must be affected by the strike; and if, in the words of this Bill, he was placed in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living, then, according to the intentions of the Government, they were not treating the Irish tenant farmer and labourer as they were treating the English mechanic; but they were expressly depriving the Irish labourer of the power which the law admitted an English mechanic to be entitled to. They were told that intimidation was as Protean in its shape as it was impossible to define it. It was, however, defined in the Conspiracy Act of 1875. It was there defined, with five separate definitions, and this clause of the Bill was so cunningly devised by the Government, that it made it almost impossible to introduce any Amendment to it. They had taken the clause out of the Act of 1875, and then, having cut the Bill in two, they had turned it upside down and introduced the definition at the end.

[Seventh Night.]

Mr. Parnell

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member was in error. The Act of 1875 did not define what intimidation was. There were separate paragraphs dealing with particular offences; but intimidation itself was left without a definition.

MR. PARNELL: Yes; but, practically, the paragraphs were taken as a definition of what intimidation was, and were clearly directed to the magistrates to guide them in the administration of the Act. What would have been the use of putting them in at all, if they were not to be read in the sense of a limitation as regarded the offence of intimidation? No doubt, it was cruel to deprive a person of the means of his existence. He admitted that. He did not wish to prevent the Government taking power to prevent a person, no matter what his station was, from being deprived of the means of his existence. But they did a great deal more in this clause. If, in any part of Ireland, attempts were made to prevent people from obtaining food, or clothes, or fuel, by all means treat it as intimidation, and put it down. But he disputed the expediency of preventing people from entering into a combination. They had a right to do that outside intimidation; and what he claimed was that the Government ought to alter their Law of Conspiracy, so as to make it as permissible for a tenant farmer to do a thing as it was for a workman to do that thing. They ought not to alter the Law of Intimidation in such a way as to make it practically impossible for a tenant farmer or a labourer to do anything at all, either with combination or without combination, in Ireland. The Government desired legislation to put a stop to any action in which crime and intimidation, as now known to the law, were the result. He was quite willing to assent to such legislation. But this clause went to the extent of rendering it penal for a workman to leave his employment. By-and-bye, if a magistrate chose to find that a workman, by leaving the employment of a farmer or a landlord, had given reason to that farmer or landlord to fear injury to or loss of his property, business, or his means of living, would be the result of that workman's act, he could hold the workman to be guilty of intimidation within the meaning of this clause, and send him to prison for six months with hard labour. If the tenant refused to pay his rent, either through inability or in consequence of the rent being an unjust rent, what would be the result? The magistrate might consider that the refusal of the tenant to pay his rent put the landlord in fear of injury to or loss of his property or means of living; therefore, the tenant might be convicted, in such a case, of intimidation, and sent to prison for six months with hard labour. He thought the Irish Representatives had an unanswerable claim to a definition on the part of the Government of what they meant by intimidation. They had waived the right of trial by jury as it existed in England in regard to the offence of intimidation. They had waived the right of trial by jury as long as the Government told them what they meant to prevent. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated in general terms that he desired to prevent "Boycotting." He (Mr. Parnell) should be glad if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would give them a definition of "Boycotting," and of what he wished exactly to check as regarded the evil resulting from "Boycotting." But they had no such information. They had been told by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant that what he wanted to check was outrage resulting from offences which were now to be called intimidation. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech the other day in reply to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), went over a great variety of offences which resulted from intimidation. He spoke of the posting of threatening notices, and the sending of threatening letters, and he stated that some tradesmen in a certain town had received threatening letters warning them not to supply a magistrate with bread. The right hon. Gentleman spoke also of the case of Mrs. Moroney, in connection with which a cruel and dreadful murder was committed in consequence of "Boycotting." In the case of Mrs. Moroney, it was true that the tradesmen of the town refused to deal with her, or supply her with food; but he understood that that was put a stop to, and very properly put a stop to, not by the action of Mr. Clifford Lloyd, but by the common sense of the people. Mrs. Moroney could now obtain food and clothing, if she was willing to pay cash for them, so that that was quite right. If the right hon. Gentleman wished to take power against any refusal on the part of a shopkeeper to supply food, clothing, or the necessities of life to any person, where the person would suffer in consequence of not having those necessities of life supplied to him, let him state that as an offence according to law, and they would know where they stood; but at present they had no definition of the kind. They had had definitions given in the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant; but no definition had been given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary as to what he desired to put an end to in the name of "Boycotting." Until they could see their way to enabling the Irish farmer and labourer to combine, possibly in order to obtain an alteration of the law by Constitutional action, they must do their best to oppose the passage of this clause in its present shape.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there were one or two things which had fallen from the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) which it was necessary he should reply to. The first objection of the hon. Member to this clause was that it was drawn in accordance with the method employed in dealing with a similar class of offences in the Act of 1875, and in support of that view he said there was a definition of intimidation in the 7th section of that Act. Now, he submitted to the Committee that the hon. Member's view was entirely wrong. If the Committee would turn to the 1st sub-section of the 7th clause, they would see that there was a general provision against any person who used violence to or intimidated some other person, or his wife, or children, or did any injury to his property. But that clause was a separate and independent clause. ["No, no!"] He repeated that the clause was a separate and independent clause. [Mr. PARNELL: Certainly not.] It had no connection with the clauses that followed after it, and hon. Members who thought differently would have an opportunity of stating their views afterwards. The words were not placed there as a definition of intimidation, because there were no words saying that the sub-section was to form a definition; but the sub-section was placed there in addition to the original words "using violence or intimidation." Now, under this 1st sub-section any person could be convicted according to the judgment of magistrates who had to determine a case of any kind of intimidation or violence, according to what that magistrate thought to be intimidation. [Mr. HEALY: No.] He would not enter into any conflict with the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). He did not think that the Committee would wish him to do so. If the hon. Member differed from him, the Committee, no doubt, would listen to his views; but in a legal matter of this kind he did not think that the personal views of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would carry very much weight with them. The view which he (the Attorney General) had expressed was one which he thought any man who understood the constitution of an Act of Parliament would entertain. The Committee would see that this was to be a substantive offence, "using any violence or in any way intimidating;" but the intimidation was to be according to the view entertained by the tribunal, and if the tribunal found a case of intimidation established, then the person who committed it committed an offence, and could be dealt with under the Act. In the present case they were dealing with a particular class of offences, and they wished that people who were to be punished should have specific information, from day to day, that they were not to do certain things, and words were inserted, not by way of definition, but for the purpose of pointing to particular acts. Any person who prevented another person from obtaining food or clothing, or did injury to property owned by another person, or prevented a person dealing with another, would be guilty of intimidation. But it was not considered necessary to include such offences in a general definition, because they were to be regarded as specific offences. In this clause the Government had followed the words of the sub-section of the previous Act, as far as intimidation was concerned; and if it was thought that lines 25 to 29, which gave a definition of intimidation, should be struck out, let hon. Members strike them out. But it was thought that in order that there should be no doubt as to "Boycotting" coming within the words "uses intimidation," the Government thought it should be known that those words should include any of the acts specified in the sub-section from line 25, and that every person should be told plainly that it was the clear meaning and intention of the Legislature that intimidation included any word or act calculated to put any person in fear of injury to himself, or any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of injury to or loss of property, business, or means of living. If the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) wished that to be left entirely open, he was sure the Committee would listen to his opinion; but he (the Attorney General) thought it would be wiser, in relation to the tribunal and the person subjected to it, that it should be clearly understood that such acts would come within the term "intimidation." In this the Government had followed the precedent of the Act of 1875. Hon. Members opposite must not suppose that his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary was bound to follow the exact wording of the Act of 1875. The Government had now to deal with different circumstances and a different class of offences; and, although it was pointed out in the Act of 1875 that a particular class of offences would come within that Act, they were not dealing with precisely the same class of offences in the present Bill. In the Act of 1875 they had to deal with workmen's offences, with "ratting," and so forth; but they were acting to-day in the same spirit with regard to the particular offences which existed in Ireland at the present moment. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, and other hon. Members, said the words contained in the clause admitted a class of offences which ought not to be punished. The example given by the hon. Member for the City of Cork was that a workman leaving the service of his employer would be liable to be punished under this Act. He thought the hon. Member would consider that if a workman chose to leave his employment he had a free right to leave it; but if he and all the workmen employed with him chose to say to their employer—"We will not allow you to cultivate your land; we insist on leaving you, so that we shall prevent you from cultivating your farm or from paying your rent," what was that but intimidation? Their object was to prevent a combination of this kind, or a combination of persons refusing to deal with a particular shopkeeper, or of hotel-keepers refusing to serve food, or bakers and butchers in a town refusing to allow a person to obtain the necessaries of life. Such a combination as that he understood to be "Boycotting," and the object of the Government was to endeavour to prevent such a combination. In order to put it down effectually, they must deal with all the classes through which it ramified. He certainly could see no difference of principle between this case and that of a direct intimidation expressly rendered illegal under the Act of 1875. What they were dealing with was the evil of preventing a man from obtaining the necessaries of life, or being able to carry on his business. "Boycotting" a man might be to prevent him from obtaining the service of labourers in the conduct of his farm, and was of the same class of evil as they had to deal with in endeavouring to prevent a man from refusing to supply another with food and the necessaries of life. It had been said that, under this clause, if a person were to ask another to give up dealing at a particular shop and to go to another, or to say to a man, "I will never deal with you again," or "I will cease to deal with you because you have given a vote for a certain candidate," he would be liable under this Bill to be punished. Why, at this very moment a person who did that would, under an English Act, be liable to two years' imprisonment for doing it. If they would turn to the 4th clause of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1854, they would find that if such threat were used to inflict loss upon a man in consequence of giving a vote, or abstaining from giving a vote, the man who used the threat was liable to two years' imprisonment. And who had ever complained of the working of that clause? No one, that he knew of. No one asserted that any hardship was inflicted by the Statute. It was of no use to take extreme cases. Every case must be judged by the circumstances of the time at which it occurred. There were hard cases which would occur under the application of every Act, no matter how they might define the law. If they took every extreme case within the definition, they would be certain to find some case in which they would be able to say there was hardship; and if the Government left out all extreme cases of this nature, it would be impossible to carry out any measure for the repression of crime, under any circumstances. The fact was that they must look, not only at what might by possibility be done, but at what the result would be if intimidation, such as that to which he had referred, were left out of the Bill. He would not follow the matter any further than to say that in the clause they had endeavoured to follow the principle, if not words, of the Act of 1875, and he thought the Committee could not do better than accept the clause.

Mr. Parnell

[Seventh Night.]

MR. PARNELL said, he accepted the offer of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), which would strike out the words of the clause from line 25 to line 29, giving the definition of intimidation. But he would invite him, in the process of assimilating the new Law of Intimidation in Ireland to that which existed in England and Ireland at present, to go a step further, and to alter the first portion of his clause, which was altogether differently constructed from the section of the English Act, and which, in fact, left the offence of intimidation entirely different in Ireland from what it was in England. The language of the English section was this—that every person who agreed to do the two things described in Sub-sections a and b, intimidated or used violence to such other person, or his wife, or children. Now, that required that there should be intimidation on the part of some person; but in the present Bill the words employed were, “uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation,” without saying that it was to be the intimidation of any particular person.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES):

“With a view to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing.”

MR. PARNELL: But not to “any person.” He submitted to the common sense of the Committee that, if they gave up the right of applying to a jury in a case of intimidation in Ireland, surely it was sufficient to leave the Law of Intimidation in Ireland as it was now. The claim of the Government had always been that they had been unable to obtain convictions in these matters; but if it was left to them to get summary convictions before the tribunal established by this Bill, without the right of an appeal to a jury in cases of intimidation, surely the definition of the law that was sufficient to put a stop to intimidation in England or in Scotland, as regarded the operation of the Trades Unions, should be sufficient to enable the Government to put a stop to intimidation in Ireland. He did not want the hon. and learned Gentleman to imitate the words of the English Act. He had always admitted the force of the contention that the offences mentioned in Clauses 4 and 5 were not applicable to this case; but if the hon. and learned Gentleman maintained that in addition to the power given in the 1st sub-section of Section 7 of the Act of 1875—that was to say, a definition of intimidation—namely, using violence to and intimidating such other person—if he wanted anything in the definition to apply to some special offences which he wished to meet, then let him follow the example set in the Act of 1875, and let him put into the sub-section the offences he desired to deal with. If the hon. and learned Gentleman was willing to do that, he (Mr. Parnell) would raise no further objection; but the object of the Government appeared to be to carry this section without informing the Committee of their real reasons for doing it. They appeared to be anxious to obtain a wide and sweeping power enabling them to make use of this Bill in order to put down any combination, however Constitutional, at their own will and caprice, so that it should be utterly impossible for any person to take part in any movement of any kind with any hope that he would escape from the application of this section.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member asked him to give in the sub-sections a definition of intimidation; but there would be very great difficulty in doing that.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not exactly mean that. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not appear to understand his meaning. He accepted the definitions supplied by the Act of 1875 in the 1st sub-section, and what he said was, that if there were any other offences they wanted to meet, or any special practices they wanted to put a stop to, let them put them in a separate sub-section, as in the English Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he quite understood the hon. Member; but what he wanted was quite impossible. They could not define what constituted intimidation. Suppose they were to say that it should be cruelty towards animals, how could they define what was cruelty towards animals? They used the term cruelty to animals, and it was very well understood; but it was impossible to define it. In the same way, in the Act of 1875, it was not attempted to define what was intimidation. It was impossible to attempt to define it in a subsection of the present Act, and it was impossible for him now to accept the suggestion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and strike out Sub-sections a and b. He did not understand that he had offered to strike out those sub-sections. When he referred to them, he was only endeavouring to convey, by way of argument, that if they were struck out it would be worse for the people who would come under the operation of the Act than if they were left in. He had not intended to make any promise that they would be struck out. If there was an impression, from what he had previously stated, that the Government would consent to strike out these sub-sections, it was an entirely mistaken impression. He had certainly not intended to convey that the Government would for one moment strike them out.

MR. GIBSON said, that everything that had occurred in the course of that evening showed the wisdom of the suggestion made last night by the Prime Minister, that they should get rid of the Amendment moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) with the division then taken, and that they should start on a new subject to-day. He regretted that they had not disposed of that Amendment yesterday, and he hoped it would be disposed of as soon as possible, so that they might proceed in something like a business-like way to the discussion of the Amendments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. He had not taken any part in the discussion yesterday; but he had confined himself to a close and anxious consideration of the question, with a view of seeing whether any safeguards might be adopted, and he should certainly reserve his criticism until the substantial proposals were made. In reference to what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had said, he was unable to follow the argument of the hon. Member. He had listened to it with a great deal of attention, as he had also done yesterday, and he was certainly unable to follow the hon. Member's reasoning. Either the hon. Member for the City of Cork wished "Boycotting" to be put down, or he wished it to be kept up. It was absolutely impossible to "sit on a rail" in this case, and to say, at the same time, "Avoid 'Boycotting,'" when they were not prepared to define it, or to tell the Committee how they were to deal with it. When they came to deal with "Boycotting," it could only be dealt with by a real and vigorous clause. "Boycotting" was a terrible reality and appallingly vigorous in its operation. To ask the Government to deal with this terrible reality in a milk-and-water clause was rank nonsense and an insult to the understanding of the Committee. The way in which the Government proposed to deal with "Boycotting" was on the lines indicated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork himself in his first statement on the question. The hon. Member was now leaving the line he then took. When he first spoke on the matter, the hon. Member indicated that he would be satisfied if the crime of "Boycotting," which was essentially an Irish crime, generated in the recent agitation, were dealt with on the lines which were applied to England in the Acts of 1871 and 1875, with such alterations as were necessary to bring the law into harmony with the altered circumstances of Ireland.

MR. PARNELL: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman repeat what I really did say?

MR. GIBSON said, he should be glad to be corrected if he had not represented the hon. Member properly, and he was ready to resume his seat and allow the hon. Member to correct him on the point. But he had heard the speech of the hon. Member referred to several times and read, and he had heard no qualification of it made. If he had quoted the words of the hon. Member incorrectly, he was prepared at once to resume his seat and allow the hon. Member to state what it was he really had said. But if that was the canon laid down by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, wherein did that clause, if it was to be a real clause, depart from it? As far as it went, it adhered to the lines of previous legislation, and only departed from those lines when it became necessary to grapple with new developments of crime, such as those which had been developed in Ireland during the last two years. It would not be fair to the magistrates—it would not be fair to those who were called on to administer the law, or those who were to obey the law, to leave them practically without guidance as to what intimidation was. Therefore, he thought it was not only wise, but absolutely necessary, that there should be some paragraph like the last paragraph in the clause. If the Committee consented to modify that paragraph, or to qualify it in a single essential word, the result would be to deprive the clause of a considerable portion of its utility. This fact was present, no doubt, in the mind of the Prime Minister in the course of his speech yesterday, and also in that of the Home Secretary, who pointed out that the object of the Government in introducing the measure was to inform the people clearly and distinctly what the law was, so that when it was passed there could be no doubt on the subject. It was also present to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary when he indicated that the closing words of the last paragraph were of vital importance, in order to tell the magistrates how they were to act, and the people what they were to obey. Under these circumstances, he thought they would all agree that the Amendment now before the Committee, and which had been moved by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), was not in itself one that would commend itself to any substantial section of the Committee. Therefore, he (Mr. Gibson) ventured to throw out the suggestion that it would be wiser for the Committee now to pass away from that Amendment altogether. Although they had made no great apparent progress with the Bill yesterday, he did not mean to say that they had not made real progress, because the debate which took place was most valuable and instructive. But the discussion on this particular Amendment had been absolutely exhausted; and if any proof of that were wanting, it would be found in the circumstance that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), with all his acuteness and ingenuity, had not uttered a single syllable in regard to it. He (Mr. Gibson), therefore, thought it would be wiser and more prudent at once to dispose of the Amendment, and then proceed to consider the suggestions which had been thrown out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary.

[Seventh Night.]

Mr. Gibson

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the Committee were getting into something of a muddle, and this was pretty clearly shown by the fact that the hon. and learned Attorney General, in the course of his speech, offered to withdraw the last paragraph of the clause, in answer to an appeal from the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Parnell). But while he (Mr. Labouchere) understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to agree to withdraw that portion of the clause in the course of his speech, yet, at the end of his speech, he fell back upon the concession, and said he declined to withdraw it. Now, the Home Secretary had proposed an addition to the clause. That addition might be very useful; but he hardly thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would say that it was any concession to the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The Committee were really in a position of considerable difficulty at the present moment. If his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) withdrew his Amendment, or took a vote upon it, they would not proceed to consider the clause de novo; but the words now objected to would have been ordered to stand part of the clause. That would be the difficulty the Committee would be in. He would suggest to the Prime Minister—solely from a desire to act in a conciliatory spirit—whether he would take this into consideration—that, in view of the muddle into which the Committee had got, and the divers suggestions which had been made, it was not desirable at present to pass over this clause—to go on with the other portions of the Bill, and subsequently to return to this clause. It had been stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who, with his right hon. and learned Colleague, seemed to be the official exponent of the views of the Government in this matter—for, whenever a suggestion was made from the Liberal side of the House, or from the Irish Benches, for the reconsideration of the wording of the clause, up jumped one of these two right hon. and learned Gentlemen and said—“The Government are pledged to make no concession.” It had been stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that upon this clause the Government could not by any possibility give way. Now, he (Mr. Labouchere) knew what the Government wanted and what hon. Gentlemen from Ireland wanted. They wanted a clause that would define what intimidation was, and that the Government should not use that vague word without a definition; because hon. Members representing Ireland knew very well what sort of persons these Resident Magistrates were, and they did not desire to place any discretionary power in their hands. Now, he would ask the Prime Minister if this Bill had not been met by the Irish Members in a very different spirit from that in which the Bill of last year was met? He had listened just now to the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). His hon. Friend made a very reasonable suggestion, which amounted to a large concession. His hon. Friend said—“Put into this Bill every single matter you find in the English Bill. And more—put in any definition you like as to what you think right to come within the term definition—beyond what you find in any English Bill.” His hon. Friend said he was ready, to a certain extent, to accept the views of the Home Secretary, that the intimidation should be regarded not only as exclusive dealing, but as the system of sending a man to Coventry; and if anyone advised anyone else to do anything that would render it impossible for a person in the neighbourhood to live and pursue his calling, then the hon. Member said—“Put that into the Bill, and I am ready to accept it.” He would ask the Prime Minister, who knew all these things as well as he did, why not accept this suggestion? Was it not a fact that in England this system of sending a man to Coventry existed just as much as in Ireland? Surely the Prime Minister knew that before the Ballot Act was passed it was the frequent habit of the voters in a neighbourhood—he would not say Conservatives more than Liberals, for they were just as bad on one side as on the other—to “Boycott” those who did not, but whom they wished to, vote. He knew of cases in which Liberal as well as Conservative voters had been told—“If you don’t vote—the Ballot will not protect you—if you don’t vote as we wish, then you had better take care of the consequences.” In fact, it was almost unnecessary for him to enter into these cases. Every hon. Member knew perfectly well that this sort of Coventry did exist, and that it existed not in regard to electioneering matters, but in regard to Trades’ Unions. He would ask hon. Members if it was not the case, if a man went into any shop in England who did not belong to a Trades’ Union, and it was a Trades’ Union shop, all the other persons employed there would not do the best they could to injure their employer’s means of obtaining a livelihood, unless he consented to give that man up? [“No, no!”] The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence) seemed to pass his existence in saying “No, no!” Perhaps the hon. Member regarded this matter in the same light as he would regard some paltry and insignificant Bill which might be brought in for the abolition of the corrupt Corporation, of which he was a member. These things did exist, and he challenged the hon. Member to disprove them.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: I really must remind the Committee that we are not getting on with the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that perhaps one of the reasons why they were not getting on so rapidly with the Amendment as they ought to do was that it still remained before the Committee. He would suggest to the Prime Minister that the Amendment should be withdrawn, and that it should be considered at a later stage of the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not think the Government had the power to withdraw the clause, for the purpose of postponing it until the end of the Bill. Whether it was expedient to place the clause where it now was, was another matter; but as the Committee had already entered on a discussion of the clause, and an Amendment had been moved, and the Mover of that Amendment—his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell)—had distinctly stated yesterday, at the last hour, that he would not withdraw it, he did not see what course the Government could take in the matter.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) would be quite willing to withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that the clause would be brought up afterwards.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Member could not expect the Committee to accept from him a statement as to the intentions of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell).

MR. LABOUCHERE said, the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk had authorized him to make the statement.

MR. GLADSTONE thought it most unfortunate that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk had moved an Amendment, the effect of which, if adopted, would be to give a Parliamentary sanction to the practice of "Boycotting." The Government were determined to deal with intimidation under a definition which would effectually put a stop to "Boycotting." The question had been fairly raised whether they were to have any legislation against "Boycotting" or not, and he could not see the force of the request made to the Committee to allow the Amendment to be withdrawn now, after it had been moved and discussed at very considerable length. At the same time, he would respectfully point out to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and to all other hon. Members, that they were not pursuing a rational course in prolonging the debate on this Amendment. Was it too much to say that in a debate of this kind they were bound not only by general rules of courtesy, but of good sense, to make to each other, from their respective positions, such concessions as they could make without any sacrifice of their own views? On this principle, would it not be reasonable that they should dispose of this question at once? It was not a question of giving sanction to the clause, but to a very few of the first words of the clause. All that would be affirmed by the rejection of the Amendment was, that the words "wrongfully and without legal authority uses intimidation" should stand part of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment also includes the words "or incites any other person to use intimidation."

MR. GLADSTONE asked if it was not correct to state that the only effect of rejecting the Amendment would be to declare that these words should stand part of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; that is so.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had not heard from the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) any declaration that these words were objected to. What the hon. Member desired to get at was the definition contained in the subsequent part of the clause. Without reference to Party or extreme views, they must all feel that the question was one of great and serious difficulty. The Government were determined to legislate against "Boycotting." It was their first duty to see that that legislation should be efficient and effective; but they were extremely anxious not to carry legislation beyond what was necessary for the purpose. The hon. Member for the City of Cork told them that the clause, as proposed, was a clause forbidding the people of Ireland to combine; that, in point of fact, it would make it impossible for the people of Ireland to combine, or to obtain by Constitutional means any changes in the law. That was not part of the intention of the Government. It was no part of their desire to legislate in such a manner that the clause would have that effect; and the Bill would not interfere in any way with such combinations. The only mode of testing their propositions was to come to a discussion of them point by point; and, so far, they had been passing hours, and even days, upon the preliminary question, whether there should be any interference at all with "Boycotting." That was the question now raised, and all he said was, let them dispose of that question at once, and then proceed to deal with the great practical issues before them.

MR. PARNELL said, the advantage of the withdrawal of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had, he thought, been very clearly stated by the Prime Minister, who had pointed out to the Committee that if they divided on that Amendment and accepted it, they might sanction the principle of "Boycotting." He (Mr. Parnell) did not think that that was quite so, because a division would not be taken on the words of his hon. and learned Friend, but on the question of leaving in the objectionable words which at present stood in the Bill; and the fact that those words were included in the Bill would make the measure a departure from the legislation of 1875. That was one of the chief objects of his objection. He did not see why they should say in this Bill—"Every person who uses intimidation," while in the English Act they only said—"uses violence to or intimidates such other person." Clearly, the power given by this clause was very much wider than the power given by the Act of 1875, and that was one reason why he regarded the clause as objectionable. If the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) were withdrawn, or if the Government would agree to support that Amendment as far as concerned the leaving out of the objectionable words which his hon. and learned Friend proposed to leave out, the Committee would then be free to consider the subsequent portion of the clause in the spirit indicated by the Prime Minister. But, with these words in it—words which practically made the clause operate so widely and vaguely, that they considered it almost impossible to limit it—it would be impossible for them to approach the further discussion of the clause with a view to its limitation in any satisfactory manner. He thought that he made a reasonable request to the Prime Minister, and that he asked him a fair question, when he asked him whether, if the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk withdrew his Amendment, the Government would postpone the clause? He took it that if the Committee permitted the withdrawal of the Amendment, the postponement of the clause would then be possible. It was a fair question, then, to ask the Prime Minister whether, in the event of the withdrawal of the Amendment, he would postpone the clause so that it might be further considered by the Government, and by those who opposed it? He could not conceive what possible object could be served by going on with the discussion in the present state of entanglement into which the matter had got. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not submit to the dictation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), as he had done on a former occasion, when the Attorney General was compelled to withdraw a concession he had made to the Irish Members, in pursuance of that dictation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the Committee would allow him to put himself right in this matter. He had followed the dictation of no one. He quite admitted that in endeavouring to convey his meaning to the Committee, he had used words which might have been regarded as a withdrawal of part of the clause; but that had not been his intention. He knew that the feeling of his Colleagues was to retain that latter portion of the clause, and he had never intended to give it up. While he regretted that any misapprehension should have arisen, he could assure the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that he had never the slightest intention of making such a proposition.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he wished to put a question to the hon. Member for the City of Cork, which he thought might somewhat elucidate the discussion. He had not been quite able to follow what the particular words were which the hon. Member for the City of Cork proposed to move. There was a certain amount of ambiguity in the matter, which he wanted to clear up. The words that were really now under consideration, as was pointed out both by the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) and by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), were—

"Wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation."

Was the hon. Member alluding to these words, or was he alluding to the words of definition at the end of the clause, which, as had been pointed out by the Prime Minister, were not now under discussion, and would have to be considered subsequently? He asked this question for this reason—that if the hon. Member alluded to the words at the beginning of the clause, he could quite reconcile what the hon. Member said just now with what had fallen from him in a previous speech. He hoped that he was not misrepresenting the hon. Member. He understood the hon. Member to say that he accepted what he believed to have been an offer made by the Government; but in regard to which he appeared to have been mistaken—namely, the supposed offer on the part of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) to give up the words defining intimidation. But if the hon. Member was willing to accept the offer, real or supposed, of the Attorney General, there was no reason at all why he should object to the proposition which had been made by the Prime Minister, that the Committee should determine, one way or another, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and then proceed to consider, at the proper time, when they arrived at the last sub-section of the clause, if there was to be any definition at all, and, if so, what that definition was to be? He also wished to ask the hon. Member for the City of Cork this question. Was he correctly understood to say just now that if the offer of the Attorney General were carried out, that the words relating to intimidation should be abandoned, he was willing to follow the wording of the English Act, leaving the definition of intimidation entirely open, and to add words like those in the sub-section of the English Act, specifically aimed at "Boycotting?"

MR. PARNELL said, the noble Lord had correctly stated the first portion of his remarks; but with regard to the later portion, what he had intended to convey was, that a proposal should be made by the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) showing what he was willing to accept. He had also asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to make his clause proceed in the same way as the English clause, adopting the words in the English Act, Sub-section 1 of Section 7, which left the definition of intimidation open, and inserting, in addition, such other offences as he wished to guard against. Of course, he did not pledge himself definitely, until he saw the offences that the Attorney General wished to guard against, as to whether they should oppose their insertion in this Bill; but it would put the matter into a clearer and more distinct shape to define those offences as they were in the English Act of 1875.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for the City of Cork showed how reasonable and necessary it was that they should proceed to dispose of the clause. The objection which the Government entertained to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) was not so much on account of what he struck out as on account of what he introduced. But the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) proposed to replace in the Bill the words—"Uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation." Both sides of the House were then agreed on the retention of these words, whatever else was to be done, and, that being so, was it not better to dispose of this point? There would then be time for the hon. Member for the City of Cork to state his arguments in support of the point raised by him.

MR. BULWER said, he did not rise for the purpose of prolonging the discussion; but having listened to the speech of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), he was bound to say he did not understand the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw any single portion of the clause. On the contrary, he understood his hon. and learned Friend to put, by way of illustration, the supposition that a portion of the clause was withdrawn, and then to argue upon that assumption. In justice to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he thought it necessary to make these observations.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that he had not uttered one word upon this subject of "Boycotting" since the House went into Committee, and he would have remained silent had it not been that he entertained a hope of making one or two observations to the Committee which might be useful. He had noticed with pleasure that his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork objected to this clause on very different grounds from those on which it was objected to by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). When the hon. Member for the City of Cork said he was anxious that the words of this clause might be so carefully expressed as not to interfere with legitimate combination on the part of Irish tenants, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) heartily agreed with him. But he had said, in the course of the debate on going into Committee, that he also agreed heartily with the wish of Her Majesty's Government to put down "Boycotting." He now desired to state that he was opposed to the modified "Boycotting" sketched out to the House by the hon. Member for Tipperary, because he absolutely denied to any political or trade organization, whether English or Irish, the right to inflict penalties on individuals for doing, or abstaining from doing, that which they had a right to do. He need hardly say that he attached the fullest credit to the disclaimer of the hon. Member for Tipperary in reference to the extreme length to which the practice of "Boycotting" had been carried on in Ireland. But he was at a loss to understand how the logical mind of the hon. Member could not see the difficulty of drawing the line when once a principle of that destructive character was laid down. If it were determined that a man should be cut off from his fellow-creatures, and that these were to shut their doors against him, and have no dealings with him of any kind—and although, at the same time, it was said that all this was done without doing injury or violence to him—he (Mr. O'Connor Power) contended that it was the most cruel, and, in a negative sense, the most distressing violence which any body of men, or any community, could exercise against one whom they might call an erring brother. Although he had stated, on the Motion for going into Committee, that he heartily sympathized with the Government in their endeavour to put down "Boycotting," he felt at the time that the definition in the clause was too wide even for the purpose of carrying out the object of the clause itself. That being so, he agreed with the Prime Minister that the time had arrived for disposing of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). He would not say that if he thought the disposal of that Amendment would in any way interfere with the right to amend the sub-section in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He thought his hon. Friend, who had considerable skill in framing Amendments in Committee and otherwise, would, with the aid of those Gentlemen who sat around him, be able to frame a modification of the clause which would guard against interference with the right of legitimate combination, and if that were so he should be happy to support him.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had altogether misrepresented the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork.

His hon. Friend had never consented to the retention of the words "uses intimidation;" on the contrary, he absolutely declined to pledge himself to those words; and, so far from the statement of the Prime Minister being correct, his hon. Friend had proposed words of a very different and opposite description. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk said, in effect, he would not allow the words "uses intimidation" to stand part of the clause; and it was plain that if they were to allow those general words to remain, Irish Members would be pledging themselves to them without any definition. It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and his Colleagues had not made up their minds about the clause; and his suggestion was that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should spend a little more time in endeavouring to do so. He was aware that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had taken up the position of standing upon every word in the Bill; but he could assure him that, so far as hon. Members on those Benches were concerned, they were determined not to allow one syllable of the clause to pass until they were assured that it would not interfere with legitimate combination amongst Irishmen.

MR. PARNELL said, he rose to ask a question on a point of Order, which might, perhaps, facilitate the Business of the Committee. In the event of the Amendment before the Committee being negatived, could he move to add, after the word "intimidation," the words "to any person?"

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member would be quite in Order in moving the addition of those words after the second word "intimidation," in line 15.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 266; Noes 45: Majority 221.—(Div. List, No. 117.)

MR. PARNELL said, the Amendment on which he had just asked the ruling of the Chairman would have the effect of making the commencement of this clause, as far as it could be made, similar to the 7th section of the Conspiracy Act of 1875. He presumed the

[Seventh Night.]

Government would not object to the addition of the words which he begged to move.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 15, after the word "intimidation," to insert the words "to any person."—(Mr. Parnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not quite understand the purpose for which this Amendment was proposed, nor had the hon. Member who moved it been very explanatory with regard to it. Did the Amendment mean to say that intimidation must necessarily take place against individuals? Because, if that were so, Her Majesty's Government were unable to agree to that limitation. There was, he need not remind the Committee, both general and particular intimidation. It went under many forms; and, without an act of intimidation towards any single person, a whole village might be intimidated. In short, intimidation was so Protean in its character that it must be dealt with by the most general words, and it was in view of that that the general words "using intimidation" were employed.

MR. CARBUTT: I wish, Sir, to ask the Government if there is any truth in the bad news which has arrived from Ireland?

THE CHAIRMAN: Unless the question is one of extreme urgency, it is not one which can now be put.

MR. CARBUTT: I considered it would be a question of extreme urgency. The rumour is that Mr. Bourke—

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I rise to Order. Is the hon. Member in Order in referring to any matter which cannot properly come under the consideration of the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that this is the stage of Committee on a Bill.

MR. PARNELL said, in answer to the observations of the Home Secretary, he did not quite understand the meaning which the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself attached to the Amendment before the Committee. The meaning which he (Mr. Parnell) attached to it was that it must be shown that intimidation had been used against some person. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might wish to put in some limitation; but it seemed to him that, as the Amendment stood, its meaning was perfectly obvious. Irish Members said that in the English Conspiracy Act it was necessary to show that some person had been intimidated; and they contended that that condition should be in this Bill also. That was the point which he urged upon the right hon. Gentleman. Of course, the Amendment would not interfere with the application of the Bill to the case referred to by the Home Secretary of a whole village being intimidated.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked if the Amendment meant that it should be necessary to prove that some person had been intimidated? Her Majesty's Government could not agree to that, as he had before said in the most distinct manner. He repeated that if you carried intimidation far enough you could prevent the proof of it—it could be carried against a man so far that he dare not say he had been intimidated. In point of fact, by requiring proof you gave licence to intimidation; and this was one of the greatest difficulties they had to contend with; because, as he had already stated, the Act of 1875 applied to Ireland as well as England; and, as it contained the words moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, they could see how far it was useful in restraining "Boycotting." The fact was, it had completely failed in that respect; and if the proposed limitation of the clause were permitted the object of this Bill would be defeated also. The act of intimidation prevented proof of its effect. If a man went out with a loaded pistol, and said to another—"If you don't do so and so, I'll blow your brains out," in such a case as that clearly it ought not to be necessary to call upon a man to prove that he had been intimidated.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked if a person who denounced landlordism at a meeting would come under the operation of the clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Clearly not.

MR. HEALY said, it was difficult to reconcile the statements of the right hon. and learned Gentleman with regard to public speeches. He now stated that the denunciation of landlordism did not come under the Bill. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman had previously said that a man who made a speech of a similar character to the tenants of an estate would be committed for six months to prison, and that it was necessary to prove intimidation.

Mr. Parnell

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, clearly it would not; but if a man were to say to A, B, C, and D, that if they did not leave their farms next day they would be shot, it would not be necessary to prove that those people had been intimidated. A speech of that character would be "using intimidation," whatever the result of it might be.

MR. HEALY said, Irish Members were quite with the right hon. and learned Gentleman when he said that the person who was intimidated ought not to be made to come forward. Their contention, however, still remained, that it was necessary to prove that somebody had been intimidated.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the offence was in the attempt to intimidate—a whole family might be intimidated by the head of that family being threatened. Further, if a man so far yielded to intimidation as not to seek redress, the offence would go unpunished if these words were inserted in the clause. He repeated that the offence was in the attempt to intimidate—not in the act of intimidation.

MR. GIBSON said, this was an attempt to re-open the question, which had been fully discussed and decided on the first Amendment proposed to the clause. When the matter first came before the Committee, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), or one of his Colleagues, suggested that the clause should so run as to make the person intimidated accountable for bringing the charge forward. It was to rest upon his information. That, of course, implied that the individual intimidated should come forward at once, his name and residence being published, to prove that he had been intimidated. All that, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had pointed out, was in the Amendment. The Committee should never lose sight of the fact that "Boycotting"—or, in other words, the terrorism now existing in Ireland—lived by the generality of its operation—by the creation and spreading of terror; and if it were necessary to prove that some person had been intimidated, prosecutions for intimidation would be rendered impossible.

MR. O'KELLY said, it seemed to him that the object of the Amendment was to require, when the prosecution was begun, that some special act of intimidation should be proved. After carefully considering the matter, he arrived at the conclusion that unless the words were introduced into the clause there would be prosecutions instituted against persons in Ireland for all sorts of imaginary offences—offences that existed only in the minds of magistrates and the police. How was it possible to approve a special offence unless it was proved by whom the offence was committed? Under the clause, as it stood, every Resident Magistrate in Ireland would be at liberty to assume that the words of anyone politically opposed to him amounted to intimidation. The liberty of the people of Ireland would, therefore, be at the discretion of the Resident Magistrates. If the Government wished to deal with and put down actual and not imaginary crime, what possible objection could they have to accept the Amendment before the Committee, which simply called for a clear statement of the act of intimidation and the person against whom it was perpetrated? One would think it was impossible to prove an act of intimidation without proving against whom that act was committed. If, then, that was not proved, by what right was this law to be put in force?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the words, "uses intimidation," were deliberately employed, in order that, whether a person was or was not intimidated, intimidation should be reached by this Act. As he had before stated, he was ready to meet any Amendment that was a fair one. Intimidation, no doubt, must be against somebody; this was involved in the very idea of intimidation; and it seemed to him quite unnecessary that the clause should say that intimidation should be against somebody. However, if the words, "to or towards any person or persons," would make the clause any clearer, he was willing to agree to their insertion.

MR. T. O. THOMPSON said, that, even with these words in the clause, there must be proof that somebody had been intimidated. They would be obliged to fall back on the principle of law, that the best evidence should be given, and the best evidence was that of the person intimidated.

[Seventh Night.]

MR. PARNELL said, he was willing to accept the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, and, with the leave of the Committee, to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GIBSON said, he had no objection to the hon. Member for the City of Cork withdrawing his Amendment. He readily accepted every syllable of the statements of the Prime Minister and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary as to the way in which they wished the clause and the Amendment to be dealt with; but, at the same time, he had some doubt as to whether the words of the Secretary of State for the Home Department could be added to the clause without some grave consequences resulting therefrom. Unquestionably, "Boycotting" had been carried out by wide, general, and insidious operations. Offences were sometimes committed, words spoken, and acts sometimes done, which might not appear to be directed against any particular individual, but which were intended to have a substantial effect in creating and spreading an atmosphere of terror. That was the difficulty in the present case; and if words were put into the Bill in the sense that acts, and incitements, and words had been used towards A, B, C, and D, it might be that by this limitation Her Majesty's Government would be prevented from reaching the crime, which he fully recognized that the Government sought to put an end to. Therefore, he could not give his assent to the words suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, although they should receive his earnest consideration. Without troubling the Committee any further, he wished to be understood to reserve his right of raising the question subsequently.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was a case which had some bearing upon this question, and which might meet the objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). He referred to the trial of Most, the publisher of The Freiheit. In that trial it was alleged that the prisoner had not recommended the assassination of any individual because he had recommended the assassination of Sovereigns generally. The contention did not prevail, and it was understood that to recommend to assassination of Sovereigns generally was to recommend the assassination of persons.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to put the case of a district in which there were only two landlords, and where hon. Gentlemen who approved of "Boycotting" gave the same advice to the people as they had so frequently done in the course of the last year or two—namely, that landlords were obnoxious, and should be got rid of. Let it be supposed that the people were recommended not to buy from these two landlords, work for them, or sell to them, and suppose, also, that tradesmen in the town where the landlords obtained their necessities of life received a notice saying that any shopkeepers who sold to them were persons who deserved punishment. Now, he pointed out that although no names might be mentioned, either of landlords or shopkeepers, in such a case as he had instanced, it would be perfectly well known who were the parties intended. If, therefore, the clause were limited in such a manner as to make it apply only to the intimidation of individuals by name, he ventured to say that the advice given to the people in the case he had supposed would be taken, and that the shopkeepers would be ruined, and that the most dire condition of things would be brought about in the district.

MR. WARTON said, that under the words proposed to be admitted into the clause by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, the persons who committed the offence of intimidation would go entirely free. He hoped the Committee would not admit the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it was important that they should not lose sight of the legal bearing of the alteration. The clause, as it stood, began thus—

"Every person who wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation."

Now, supposing, after the last word "intimidation," the words were added, "or towards any person or persons," what would be the position with regard to the Bill of a person who made a speech in any district very strongly recommending "Boycotting?" Would such speech be, or not be, an incitement to use intimidation?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that general terms of speech which a person might use in a philosophical mood would not be sufficient to bring such person within the clause. The clause would, however, apply the moment he made use of particular words, although no name might be mentioned. It was intimidation to tell people not to deal with the shopkeepers in a district without mentioning names. The words suggested by his right hon. Friend were perfectly consistent with the words in the following Sub-sections (a) and (b), and the same rule of construction would be applied in both instances.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he endorsed the interpretation given by the Attorney General, for this reason. If it were the intention that intimidation should be used towards a particular individual for the purposes of the Bill, then the word "specified" would be put in, and the words would run, "to or towards any specified person or persons." If the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were adopted, the clause would remain quite as general as before; but the proof required would be more ample, and the possibility of escape for the persons charged more frequent.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he presumed, if the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department were added, that it would not be required for the purpose of prosecution that the name of any person should be given; but that it would be required that some person or persons should have been intimidated, or put within the possibility of being intimidated.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that was so.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether trade strikes would be legal in Ireland under this clause? It was impossible that there could be trade strikes without mechanics and tradesmen advising one another as to the employment of particular persons, and this was calculated to cause loss to some individuals. These strikes were not made illegal in England, for the House of Commons appeared to be tender with regard to every form of popular liberty in England. The plain question he wished Her Majesty's Government to reply to was—Would this clause render trade strikes in Ireland illegal?

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he had been unable to reconcile the replies of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, and the hon. and learned Attorney General, to questions asked in the course of this discussion with regard to the application of the clause. He understood the Secretary of State for the Home Department to say that it was not illegal for a man to denounce landlordism as a system—in point of fact, that a man could do this if he liked. This was in reply to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings). On the other hand, he understood the Attorney General to say, if anyone condemned a class of people in a village, that this was illegal. It seemed to him that one of these propositions must be untrue. Now, it was a common thing, when workmen in a district were on strike, that the word was passed that a certain number of tradesmen should not be dealt with. He understood that that could be done, and was done constantly in this country, and it would be done in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, combinations and Trades Unions would be possible, because they were distinctly protected by the 3rd section of the Act of 1875, and that Act applied to Ireland in exactly the same way as to England.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that, while Trades Unions were protected by one Act, they were rendered illegal by another. Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman explain that? Certain combinations and a certain line of action were protected by one Act, but were rendered illegal by a subsequent one. On which of these Acts would the Government stand?

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he wished to point out a verbal difficulty in the clause, which, as it was now proposed to amend it, would run in these terms—

"Every person who wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation to any person or persons."

And then followed Sections a and b; but if Section a was omitted for the moment, then the clause would run—

"Every person who wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses intimidation, or incites any other person to use intimidation with a view to cause any person or persons in consequence."

That was a duplication of words, and it would be very difficult to give them any meaning. He was anxious to see some words introduced which would make intimidation clear.

[Seventh Night.]

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he thought the question put by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was deserving of consideration—namely, whether Trades' Unions would be possible under this Act? The Home Secretary's reply was that the Act of 1875 applied to Ireland; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to forget that if the proposed Act was construed by itself as rendering Trades' Unions illegal, then, being later in date than the Act of 1875, it would control that Act. Therefore, assuming that the Home Secretary meant to guard the right of Trades' Unions, which was legal in England, and to make it legal in Ireland, it would be necessary in some part of the Bill to introduce a Proviso that "nothing in this Bill should affect the right of combination under the Act of 1875."

MR. SERJEANT SIMON said, he did not agree with this Amendment. According to the Bill as it at present stood, the use of intimidation, or the inciting of others to use intimidation, with a view to cause any person or persons to do or abstain from doing what he had a right to do, would be an offence created by the Statute; and any words calculated to put any individual in fear of any injury or danger to himself would be an offence. The words "to or towards any person" would limit the clause. The intimidation need not be general, such as words spoken or acts done towards a class, but towards some particular person. Now, intimidation might be applied to the whole class of landlords or tradesmen, or any other class, and to every member of that class, and they might be kept in terror and prevented from exercising their lawful rights. It seemed to him that the words proposed would considerably limit the operation of the clause. He did not at all object to any definition which would so define the offence of intimidation as to make it easily ascertainable by a Court of law; but if the offence of intimidation was to be created by words generally spoken against a class or a particular section of a community, putting each individual of that class in fear and terror, then the operation of the clause would be limited if the words proposed were adopted. That was what appeared to him to be the effect of the Amendment, and he thought that if it were adopted they ought to add, "to or towards any person or persons or class of persons." Unless that was done, the great evil under which Ireland was now labouring would still exist.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, there was one thing which would dispose of these fears and doubts. The section under which the man Most was prosecuted—namely, the Act of 1851—made it criminal to encourage or persuade, or endeavour to persuade, or to propose to persuade, any person to murder any other person. That definition included classes.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the question of the hon. Member for Westmeath had not been answered to his satisfaction; but it had been answered in anticipation by the Attorney General, who stated that, in case a number of workmen formed themselves together, they would come under the terms of the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I never said that; I said if they became members of a League that would come under this Act.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, if for any purpose of their own—if they quarrelled with their landlord, and struck against him, and left him as the result of that strike, they would come under the law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): No.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked under what conditions could a number of labouring persons work together under this Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Bill had nothing to do with combinations. There was nothing to prevent combinations under the Act of 1875; but there was no inconsistency between the two Acts.

MR. WARTON said, he thought there was considerable objection to the proposed addition by the Home Secretary. The first was that the person or persons should be named who were being intimidated; and the second and greater objection was that classes were left quite unprotected. A speech might be made advising the shooting of all landlords, or of a whole class, or of all Englishmen. If ingenious agitators availed of that, they would be able to terrorize over any person.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether the Attorney General would object to insert these words—

“Provided always, that nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with the right of combination secured under the existing Statutes to persons working for wages?”

THE CHAIRMAN: We must get rid of this Amendment first.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 15, after “intimidation,” to insert “to or towards any person or persons.”

MR. GIBSON said, he was disposed to think that the words suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Serjeant Simon) were more entitled to consideration, and that these words now proposed should not go into the clause in this place, as they would confuse the drafting.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought it would be necessary to carry out this Amendment, and to add, in line 23, “to or towards.” That, he thought, would meet the objection of the right hon. and learned Member opposite.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). The Chief Secretary for Ireland had stated the other night that there were a number of cases in which it was desirable that the Government should have power to act. So far as they could, Irish Members had endeavoured to find out from the Government what particular cases it was desired to strike at by this Bill. They gathered from the Chief Secretary for Ireland that these offences were chiefly four, and if the Government could show that it was desirable to enlarge that list they would be willing to agree to that. The Chief Secretary was especially strong on the posting of circulars and threatening notices, and said if 20 notices were posted the man against whom they were directed could not be expected to go into the witness-box and give evidence. For the purposes of this section an Amendment had been withdrawn providing that magistrates should act summarily in regard to the circulation of threatening notices. Then came the question of “Boycotting” by public proclamation. If a man made a public proclamation that it was desired to “Boycott” a certain person, he might be dealt with under the Act, and also if a person sent round a bellman to announce a ban upon a man in a particular locality he might be dealt with. Then the third class of offence mentioned in the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was intimidating by wrongfully or illegally holding up any person to public odium. That definition was of so wide a character that it was very liable to abuse, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork was so anxious to meet the objections of the Government that he had taken on himself to propose another Amendment. He himself looked rather askance at that, because he thought it was an exceedingly wide proposition. He thought that holding up persons to public odium was a very wide matter. If a man was opposed at an election he was held up to odium, and while he was willing to assent to the words his hon. Friend proposed, he confessed that he regarded them with some apprehension. Then the fourth instance was by using violence, or threats of violence, to any person or persons. To discover what were the offences which the Government desired to meet under this Act had caused the Irish Members anxious deliberation; but if the Government did not consider the offences mentioned in his hon. Friend’s Amendment sufficient they would be willing to amend it. What they objected to was that the word “intimidation” should stand unqualified. They had asked the Government to recite in this Bill, as they did in the English Bill, what it was with which they desired to cope. It was all very well to say that these offences were of such a Protean character that it was impossible to grapple with them definitely. The Home Secretary put the case of cruelty to animals—everybody knew what that was. But there was no possible case of cruelty to animals which could not be fairly dealt with; and, furthermore, there was the consideration that nobody was interested in cruelty to animals. England was the only place which was disgraced by cruelty to animals, and it compared badly with Ireland in that respect.

[Seventh Night.]

It could not be said that a magistrate belonged to a class opposed to a prisoner in such offences in England. But that was what was alleged against the Resident Magistrates in Ireland. If a Resident Magistrate in Ireland was not a landlord himself, he was tinged with landlord views, because in Ireland there was no other society for persons of his class. Society in Irish villages generally consisted of magistrates, bank-clerks, sub-inspectors of police, and local agents. The magistrate had nobody else to mix with, and he must decide as they desired, or they would not ask him to their balls and parties, and in that way they would "Boycott" him. He was shut out from all the local society and was bound to go with those classes. There was no middle class with whom the magistrates could mix as belonging to their own creed, and accordingly they strained the law in order that the landlords should not "Boycott" them. Magistrates in Ireland must have some society, and as there was no other class for them they must mix with the landlords. He was exceedingly jealous of these gentlemen getting powers of this exceptional character without any reservation. If the Home Secretary or the Attorney General were sitting on cases in Ireland he should expect justice at their hands, and should believe their sentences would be correct, and if the Prime Minister had the carrying out of this Bill he would not have the smallest hesitation in allowing the right hon. Gentleman to exercise it. But he should be sorry to give any person power over his liberty, and he should have some suspicion with regard to the Attorney General for Ireland after some of his recent declarations. The suspicion with regard to magistrates was well justified, and he hoped the Government would limit this clause in such a way that the magistrates should have some direction as to intimidation.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 15, after "intimidation," insert—

- "(1.) By posting or circulating notices of an illegal character;
- (2.) By making public proclamation by bell or otherwise inciting others to place any person or persons under a ban;
- (3.) By wrongfully and illegally holding up any person to public odium or;
- (4.) By using violence or threats of violence to any person or persons."—(Mr. Healy.)

Mr. Healy

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was glad that the hon. Member had only objected to the tribunal; but this Amendment was seeking to alter the Bill, apart from the question of the tribunal; and, although he would be repeating what had been so often said, he must point out the objection to this Amendment and to accepting the offer, which was apparently genuine, with regard to definition. He thought the Committee would see at once that the attempt to define intimidation within these four sub-sections would fail, because if the four sub-sections were accepted, not any other "Boycotting" that could be resorted to would be illegal besides these four definitions. There were many other methods which were used, and which, under this Amendment, could be legally employed. He could give numerous examples of "Boycotting" that did not come within these four sub-sections. Suppose a person refused to supply necessary food to other people, that would not come under any of these sub-sections. The Government were endeavouring to stop that cruel "Boycotting" which the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) said ought to be punished. They did attempt to define "Boycotting" with violence only. They were endeavouring to deal with that cruel evil of preventing people obtaining the means of living. They ought to deal with the more general view as to whether there should be any definitions at all. It was an offence to use violence or intimidation to another person, and there was no attempt to define the use of violence or intimidation, and if an act amounted to violence or intimidation, that would be an offence not included in these four sub-sections. Then came the alternative—"or persistently does these things;" but that was distinct from using violence or intimidation, which was only expressed in general words, and not by particular definitions. These four sub-sections were conditions of intimidation covered by the 1st sub-section. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) asked that the Government should do what could not be done under the Act of 1875. They were not giving a different law to Ireland in respect to the principle upon which this clause was framed. They were doing exactly the same thing, or rather they were doing more, because in the English Act the words "uses violence or intimidation" were omitted. He could not give a better example than he had already given when he spoke of the impossibility to define the general term, than that which represented, not a particular act, but represented what might be carried out by many acts—cruelty to animals, for instance. The hon. Member for Wexford said everybody knew what that was; but everybody did not know the different methods, and if it was detected in one way other ways would be adopted. Then the hon. Member argued that the tribunal must be looked at separately from the enactment. In 1875 he (the Attorney General) had said that the Act was going to give powers, with regard to workmen, to employers of labour who were themselves magistrates. [Mr. HEALY: You have public opinion here.] There was public opinion here; and it would have been more properly applied if it had been properly appealed to. It was impossible to define intimidation in general terms.

MR. DILLON said, he strongly supported the view that there should be some definition introduced into the Bill in regard to what was legal and what was illegal. He recollected, at the outset, saying to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary—"Let us know what is the law and what is not, and we will obey the law." The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he would do so; but what the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) now said was that the clause was drawn on the same lines as the English Act. Now, that was the chief basis of the argument of the Irish Members. If that were so, it was unnecessary to take out the first two lines of Sub-section 1, Clause 7, of the English Act, and replace them by the lines they complained of in the present Bill. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the definition of intimidation was to be left as open in the Irish Act as it was in the English Act, why not use the same words? If they did not do so, the Committee were driven to the inevitable conclusion that there was some object aimed at by the Government in altering the wording of this Act from that of the English Act; and it was not a frank and honest statement of fact to say that intimidation was left undefined in the Irish Act as it was in the English Act. To his mind, the magistrates, or anybody administering the law, must look very carefully at the context in interpreting the word intimidation. They had no other guide to go by. One man might intimidate another by firing at him, or he might intimidate him by saying that he did not like the cut of the clothes supplied by his tailor. There were a hundred ways in which a man might be intimidated, and the magistrate who was administering the law must be guided by common sense and also by the context of the Act. Now, what was the context of the English Act? It was that any man who "uses violence or intimidates" was guilty of an offence—it was that intimidation meant using violence. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): No.] At any rate, it must mean something approaching violence. The words were, "uses violence or intimidates any such person or his wife or children." How could a man intimidate the wife or children of another man, except by an act of violence? The Act went on to say, "or injures his property." They had a definite act mentioned, and this would inevitably influence the mind of the magistrate in saying that intimidation meant an act of violence, or something which created an apprehension of violence in the mind of any person, or injury to property, or a threat to injure property. He had said already that the Irish Members were perfectly prepared to take the Attorney General at his word; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman said that his only intention was to assimilate the present Bill to the English Act, then let him take the words of the English Act.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is not the hon. Member really discussing the Amendment we have already decided, and not the definition, which is now placed before the Committee?

MR. DILLON said, he did not propose to discuss that in the least. He was only pointing out where it was that the Irish Members dissented from the opinion of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) in the argument he had used against the insertion of a definition—namely, that in the English Act the question was left open. The hon. and learned Gentleman had used that argument, and he had used it as his chief argument. He (Mr. Dillon) was doing his best to reply to that argument by showing, first, that the question of intimidation was not left open in the English Act; and, secondly, that the Irish Members were prepared to give up their opposition if the Government would transfer the words of the English Act to the Irish Act. What they said was, that if the clause was left in its present position, it would materially influence the minds of the magistrates who had to administer the Act. An attempt had been made by several Members of the Government to induce the Committee to leave out of the question altogether any consideration in regard to the tribunal; but it was utterly out of the question that they could remove from their minds the consideration of what the tribunal was to be which was to administer the law. Very frequently the law was drawn entirely in reference to the tribunal which had to administer it. They might leave the clause quite open if they had perfect confidence that it would be administered impartially; but if there was a strong feeling on the part of a large section of the people that it would not be administered impartially, then they were the more entitled to press for a clear definition. This, he thought, was perfectly sound reasoning. What had they got in the English Act? The Attorney General (Sir Henry James) asserted that that Act contained an open Intimidation Clause. He (Mr. Dillon) did not admit that it was an open Intimidation Clause. There was a reservation contained in the 9th clause. Why was that reservation inserted in the English Act? It was inserted because it was said and felt that there might be employers of labour in a Court of Summary Jurisdiction who might be inclined to strain and misinterpret their jurisdiction, and, therefore, that the accused was entitled to object and to claim to be tried by a jury, so that the case might be removed from the prejudices of local magistrates. Now, if the Government would give them here this reservation clause of the English Act, so as to give to every prisoner the right to be tried under this Act by a jury instead of by a bench of landlords, he should have no objection to make.

[Seventh Night.]

Mr. Dillon

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is really discussing the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), at the bottom of the third page.

MR. DILLON asked what that Amendment was?

THE CHAIRMAN: That the case may be withdrawn from the Court of Summary Jurisdiction and tried by the Court of Quarter Sessions.

MR. DILLON said, he respectfully submitted that he was not discussing that point, but another question altogether. He said that was one of the strongest arguments in the minds of the Irish Members, in favour of their insistence on this Amendment for a strict definition as to the nature of the Court before which the case would have to be heard. It was not at all in reference to an Amendment on any other part of the Bill, but in reference to the fact that the Government had informed them that they proposed to have these cases tried before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. That constituted, to his mind, a strong argument against the definition of the offence, and in favour of leaving it an open clause. If these cases were all of them to be tried by the Court of Quarter Sessions, he should not lay so much stress upon his objection. Although he should still be in favour of the definition, he should not consider it of such vital importance as he did now, seeing that they were threatened with a trial on an open clause, which left it to a bench of magistrates to put whatever interpretation they chose upon it. There was a common expression in Ireland that if they "looked crooked" at a man they intimidated him. The Committee would recollect that a Question was asked in the House that day in regard to the case of a man named Joseph Johnson, at Dundalk. The Question asked of the Attorney General for Ireland in regard to this case was what the offence was that Mr. Johnson had committed; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman refused to state. Now, the fact was—and he was ashamed to say so—that the offence laid against Mr. Johnson was this. A constable went up to him and said, "Good morning," and Mr. Joseph Johnson did not say, "Good morning" in return. The Committee must recollect that this had all been sworn in open Court. This was the first offence. The second offence was that he walked over and stared at a photographic machine. Mr. Joseph Johnson began to laugh, and said something about the power of dynamite. It was sworn by several witnesses that the constable laughed also, and seemed to look upon the matter as a good joke. There was no evidence of any other act produced in Court, and yet the man was now lying in Dundalk Gaol on a charge of intimidation, having been committed by a bench of Irish magistrates. No offence was alleged against Mr. Johnson, except the two he had mentioned. The constable was asked in Court—"Were you afraid?" and his reply was—"Yes; I was somewhat frightened." He (Mr. Dillon) thought he was entitled to argue that what had been done by a local bench of magistrates in this case might be done again by a Commission Court under this Bill. The only difference was that whereas Mr. Joseph Johnson was lying as an untried prisoner, under the rule of bail, in Dundalk Gaol, if this Bill had been passed he would have been tried in some way before some tribunal under this clause, and might have been committed for six months with hard labour, a punishment which, by the way, was a most savage one, as it would be an undeserved one, as he had had some opportunity of studying cases in which that punishment had been inflicted. His argument was that as long as the Government employed this tribunal it was the duty of the Irish Members to insist to the utmost of their ability on having laid down, in black and white, what the grounds were on which a man might be sent to six months' hard labour in Ireland. He refused to make it an open clause, or to leave it for the body of men represented by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) to carry out in an obnoxious manner. By this clause, as it stood, any man who made himself obnoxious to the landlord class would render himself liable to six months' hard labour, and that was the reason why the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) and his friends liked the clause so much. The answer the Irish Members received in the House, when they brought forward facts such as those which had been mentioned that evening in respect of Mr. Joseph Johnson, was that it was not the business of the Executive to interfere between the magistrates and the discharge of their duties. Further than that, the Queen's Bench in Dublin had systematically refused relief, and an obsolete Act of Parliament was brought forward, under which it was contended that the magistrates had acted legally. Although such decisions would have been upset at once in England, this was the sort of jugglery played off in Ireland, and the Court of Queen's Bench would not interfere to restrict the eccentricities of the magistrates, and the people against whom the power of the magistrates was brought into force could get no satisfaction at all. Without committing himself to any definition, he would say that he was prepared to the utmost of his ability to insist, as long as the Government provided that prisoners charged with these offences should be tried before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction consisting of landlord magistrates, that there should be a clear definition of what was to be a crime, and what was not to be a criminal act.

MR. GIBSON said, he only desired to say one word in support of the clause; but he was bound to say that he concurred in the view which had been put forward by the learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) in reference to the Act of 1875, especially when he found the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) dissenting from that view. With all the other qualifications possessed by the hon. Member for Tipperary, he had not had the misfortune of a legal education. If he had had, he would have felt that the natural construction of the clause was that which the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had put upon it, and it would require a great deal more argument than he had yet heard to twist it so as to make it bear the construction suggested by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon). He (Mr. Gibson) had carefully examined the clause during the observations of the hon. Member for Tipperary with an anxiety to see if he was able to give any support to the doubt which existed in the hon. Member's mind. He felt himself unable to do so, and it was only proper that, as a member of the Legal Profession, he should say that he found it impossible to arrive at a conclusion differing from that stated by the Attorney General (Sir

[Seventh Night.]

Henry James) in reference to this matter. There was one observation which ought to be made in reference to the speech which had been delivered by the hon. Member for Tipperary. The hon. Member had demonstrated the absolute necessity of the last paragraph of the clause, because the hon. Member said that to ordinary minds the word intimidation would only import threats by violence.

MR. DILLON said, that was not what he had stated at all. What he had said was that, placed in conjunction with the context of the English Act, that impression was created in his mind.

MR. GIBSON said, that if the hon. Member for Tipperary had not been speaking in reference to this clause, he would have passed the matter by altogether. He wished, however, to say one word in reference to the particular Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). Anyone who had recognized the ingenuity of the Irish intellect would readily see that if the four particular modes of "Boycotting" which had been mentioned were put in the Bill, the Government would soon find it necessary to define six or seven other methods which would not be covered by the clause. He, therefore, ventured to think that the Amendment of the hon. Member threw an amount of responsibility upon Her Majesty's Government which was scarcely fair and reasonable; and after the discussion which had taken place he hoped the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment, or, as the hon. Member was not present, somebody authorized on his behalf would withdraw it. The hon. Member seemed to be anxious to have it declared that those matters which were clearly criminal should be made crimes. He (Mr. Gibson) had no objection to these four offences being declared to be crimes within the meaning of the Bill; but he did not think that an exhaustive definition of intimidation ought to be introduced.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he wished to point out to the Committee that there was an inconsistency, if not a difference of opinion, between what had fallen from the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) and what had been said by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) at an earlier stage of the proceedings. It would be in the recollection of the Committee that a short time ago he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) had specifically asked the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) this question—whether, assuming that he had correctly understood the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) to offer to withdraw the words defining intimidation at the end of the clause, he would be willing to accept that offer on the part of the Attorney General; and also to add to the clause certain words, not in substitution or in limitation of the expression "intimidation," but constituting a description of those offences which he considered should be specifically made criminal, in the same way as in the English Act, or, rather, in the General Act known as the Employers' and Workmen's Act? In that Act intimidation had been left as an open offence in the 1st sub-section. While certain specific offences—such offences as those popularly known as rattening, and others—were rendered criminal and punishable in a certain manner by the subsequent provisions of the Act, there was no other definition of intimidation. In reply to the question he had put to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the hon. Member, after consulting those whom he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) felt he did not misdescribe as his Law Officers, said that he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) and others who sat on the Liberal side of the House were mistaken. Now, he was glad he was speaking in the presence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen), who heard what passed, and who, in a matter involving rather complicated points of law, was better able to follow the questions that were raised than he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) was, because he need hardly say that on questions of law he was only able to speak with very great submission. Now, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) came forward—as he had a perfect right to do—and, in the absence of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), moved the Amendment which stood on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), in the shape and in the very words in which it stood on the Paper; and it was because he (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) observed a discrepancy and an inconsistency between what had fallen from the hon. Member for the City of Cork in the first instance and the words which had been placed on the Paper that he desired to see a little light thrown on the question. How did the matter stand? What were the admissions and intentions of hon. Members opposite? Did the hon. Member for Tipperary Mr. Dillon represent the wishes and desires of hon. Members opposite, or did the hon. Member for the City of Cork; or had the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) moved the Amendment in order to elicit the opinion of the Committee generally? He knew that the hon. Member had a perfect right to move the Amendment as it stood on the Paper; but what he wanted to get at was the views and intentions of hon. Members opposite, because they had the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) rising in his place, and stating, in reply to a question, one particular view, and then they had the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), who was also high in the confidence of hon. Members opposite, immediately afterwards taking an entirely different view. The result was that those who were most anxious to do all they could to meet the legitimate views of hon. Members opposite on Irish questions were naturally placed at a very great disadvantage.

Mr. Gibson

MR. DILLON rose to explain the difficulty in which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice) appeared to be placed. The noble Lord seemed to be under the impression that because his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) accepted the declaration of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) he had got all he wanted, and that that would have been a sufficient alteration of the clause. Now, the hon. Member for the City of Cork did not intend to say anything of the kind. They understood from the speech of the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) that he would be willing, on behalf of the Government, without exacting any condition whatever, to withdraw the definition of intimidation contained in the latter part of the clause, from line 25 to line 29; and his hon. Friend the Member for Cork stated, on behalf of the Irish Members generally, that they would be prepared to accept that withdrawal.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that that was not quite the objection that was raised. It was correct as far as it went; but what the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said was that he wished to follow the analogy of the English Act, and the English Act constituted specific offences, in reference to what was popularly known as rattening and other matters. These offences were not included in the definition of intimidation, but were made distinct and separate offences. He wished to know whether, if the Committee added these words relating to specific offences, following the analogy of the English Act, hon. Members opposite were prepared to stand by the Amendment on the Paper, when an intimation had been given that the Government were prepared to follow, in that respect, the analogy of the English Act?

MR. DILLON said, he understood now the point that was raised. He had supported the Amendment as it stood on the Paper; and he had explained his views at the time, stating why he thought there was a necessity that as strong a definition should be given in the present Bill as in the English Act. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had expressed himself as inclined to withdraw his demand for a definition of intimidation, if the Government would follow the analogy of the English Act; but he had gone on to explain that reasons existed in Ireland why there should be even a more strict definition than in England, among those reasons being the difference in the tribunal by which the offence was to be tried.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had not happened to be present when the dispute arose about the nature of the Attorney General's (Sir Henry James's) offer, and therefore he would not venture to make any remark on the subject; but he considered it highly probable, without any disrespect to the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, but simply from the general action of the Government in regard to this Bill, that the offer of the Attorney General was one that was not worth accepting. At the same time, he (Mr. O'Donnell) was afraid he could not quite support the whole of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). This clause proposed to make liable to the provisions of the Act any person who used intimidation, or incited any other person to use intimidation, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork proposed to insert after "intimidation," the words, "by posting or circulating notices of an illegal character." Now, who was to say whether the notices were or were not of an illegal character? Illegality was a very wide term, and if the illegality of a notice was to be determined by an irresponsible Bench of magistrates, acting summarily, he was afraid there would be but small guarantee for the liberty of the subject. Again, the hon. Member for the City of Cork proposed to make penal a public proclamation by bell or otherwise inciting odium against persons, and placing them under a ban. He altogether denied the right of any Government to interfere in a matter of this kind. If a number of persons considered that there was another person, who was an enemy to the community, and who was acting injuriously to the interests of the community, he said it was the common right of such persons to point out the wrong-doer, and exhort all good citizens to enter into a league against him; and if they did no act of violence, but simply struggled to send him to Coventry, to black-ball him, to avoid his society, and to make him feel that he had earned the detestation of honest men, he failed to see why they should be punished in consequence. Suppose, for instance, they had to deal with a notorious usurer in a district. He believed there were a good many of these notorious usurers in London. Well, there were some usurers in Ireland also, and if that fact were known to the community, and if it could be shown that there were persons who were likely to be victims of a scoundrel of this description, it was not only right, but it became their duty to make a proclamation, either by bell or otherwise, so as to put the country on its guard against that usurer, and to advise all honest men to send him to Coventry, and to hold aloof from him, simply as a protection of the interests of the rest of the community. It would be perfectly monstrous that putting a usurer under a ban of this kind should be an offence punishable with six months' hard labour. It was the right and duty of everyone to single out a public offender, even although he might not technically be a criminal, as offending against the general body of the community. Then, again, under this Amendment, it was proposed to make an offence, to be punished under the powers of the Bill, of wrongfully and illegally holding a man up to odium. Who was to interpret the wrongfully and illegally hold a person up to public odium? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had held up a good many persons to public odium in the course of his life; but he (Mr. O'Donnell) should be sorry if any act of that kind rendered the right hon. Gentleman liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. Nevertheless, under this Bill a man would be liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour for doing the same thing as had obtained for the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster no small portion of his political eminence. If a man was held up to public odium, in most cases, if the odium was not deserved, it would not fall upon him, and where it did fall upon him it very often happened that it was very well deserved. The fourth section of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) he could heartily support. In that section his hon. Friend proposed that there should be an explicit offence under the Bill in every case where violence or threats of violence were used to any person or persons. There he was entirely with his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork. Violence or threats of violence were things to be put down; but he said it was right, and very often must be a duty, to hold up persons to public odium, that it was often right, and might be a duty, to make a public proclamation calling upon the community at large to place a certain person under a ban. Persons of infamous character or of infamous houses, ought rightly to be placed under the ban of the community generally; and, as to circulating and posting notices of an illegal character, he was not prepared to allow one of the magistrates who were to form the proposed tribunal to have the power of declaring notices to be illegal, and of thus creating, under the general provisions of the Act, as many separate offences as there might be separate notices on which they had to adjudicate in the fulfilment of their functions. He did not think that the adoption of the proposed Amendment would really amount to the promotion of public liberty, and he would suggest that a safer and more regular way of testing the bona fides of the Government would be by specifically inserting in the clause extracts from the general law relating to intimidation in England, and allowing the Irish people to practise the same kind of intimidation as was allowed to the English people to practise. These provisions ought to be taken bodily out of the Act of 1875, and inserted in the present Bill, and he had no doubt they would then have the satisfaction of seeing the Government voting against granting to the Irish people the same power of combination as had been granted to the English people. He had said on the first reading of this Bill that he did not think it could be materially amended, but that the Irish Members ought to make use of every means in their power of exhibiting the true character of the Bill. He did not think the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork was sufficiently well calculated to expose the character of the Bill, because it went too far in the way of concession, which, he thought, was one of the worst things Irish Members could assent to under present circumstances. He should not vote for Sub-sections 1, 2, and 3, but he should be happy to vote for Sub-section 4. He hoped Irish Members would do as little as possible towards meeting the views of the Government, and that they would contest and exhibit in the strongest light the general character of this Bill, and after that they would trust to all the resources of their nation and race at home and abroad to bring it and its author into hatred and contempt.

Mr. O'Donnell

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought the speech of the hon. Member who had just spoken would be very convincing to the Committee.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who regarded the hon. Member's speech as convincing, would accept the three sub-sections?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The hon. Member disapproved of three out of the four, and supported only the fourth.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought the disapproval of these sub-sections would be a recommendation of them to the Home Secretary. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, by the Amendment, wished to test the desire of the Government to effect a real prevention of intimidation. The Home Secretary had admitted that he proposed to create perfectly new offences in Ireland. If that was to be done, Irish Members had a right to ask that the new offences should be strictly defined. Under this clause it was quite possible that any single word a man might say, respecting the character, or conduct, or business of another, would be held to be a crime, for which the man might be sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The only Gentleman who spoke in favour of the clause, as it stood, was the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), who was quite satisfied with this clause. Any magistrate would be safe who held that any word spoken in hostile criticism against a person was an offence against the Act. The Government had promised to give the right of appeal to persons convicted under the Act by magistrates, and that was a very considerable gain, and he was sure that it would be a right that would be used by people who had the means of appealing; but a great many of the people likely to come under the Act were too poor to appeal, and, consequently, they would be at the mercy of the magistrates. Under this Amendment a magistrate would be able to put down every case which the Home Secretary said ought to be put down in Ireland; but the Government had refused to accept the Amendment, and appeared to be resolved to give to the magistrates powers which they never before possessed, and ought not to be intrusted with. It would be much more honest if the Government proposed a clause that it should be lawful for every Resident Magistrate to send any man in his district to prison for six months with hard labour. When the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) said that if the people were to be expected to observe the law they should be told exactly what the law was, the Home Secretary said "Hear, hear!" as if he agreed in that opinion; but when he rose to speak later on he contended that intimidation was of such a Protean character that it was utterly impossible for the Committee to define it. How, then, could the poor Irish people know what it was? It would be impossible for any man to say a word about his neighbour without running the risk of six months' imprisonment. If the magistrates in Ireland were like those in England, and had sympathy with the people and with public rights, and would not strain the law against the people, they might be trusted; but it was very well known that there were magistrates in Ireland who would go into Court prejudiced against the people, and the paid magistrates of the Government were always desirous of obtaining convictions. Anyone who had ever attended Petty Sessions Courts in Ireland had seen how the unpaid magistrates were often inclined to let the accused people go away; but the Resident Magistrates nearly always insisted on a conviction. The magistrates under this Act would feel bound to justify the confidence which the Government reposed in them, and to procure as many convictions as possible. That would create disaffection. Hon. Gentlemen often said they wished to bring about a state of things in Ireland under which the people would respect the law; but how could they expect to get that respect when the law was to depend on the magistrates who administered it? Everybody knew it would depend on the class of magistrates who were appointed; yet, at the same time, the people were expected to have respect for the law which they knew would be turned into an engine of oppression against them by the men set over them. He, of course, supported the Amendment of his hon. Friend, which went very far indeed. He was convinced that under that Amendment the magistrates would be able to put down every offence that ought to be put down. He was convinced that under at least one or two of the sub-sections of the Amendment magistrates who were opposed to the people could go very far to oppress them; still, as the Amendment would, to some extent, define the offences, and inform the people what would not bring them under the Act, he should support the Amendment.

DR. COMMINS said, he was inclined to support the Amendment on the principle of choosing the least of two evils, although, in itself, he thought it would be a considerable evil. With regard to the first section, the decision whether a document was legal or illegal was generally one of the most difficult tasks that the Superior Courts had to perform; and, consequently, it would be a question almost beyond the capacity of the Justices who would have to administer the Act. Then, with regard to public proclamations by bell to place persons under ban, there were plenty of people who might very properly and justly be placed under a ban—persons whom every moralist in the pulpit would place under a ban. Under the second section of the Amendment, no person in the world could denounce the instigators of vice and immorality, and no clergyman could exercise what everybody expected him to exercise—namely, full power of condemning vice. Then, again, with regard to holding people up to public odium, that would be liable to the same objection; but the fourth section he could support, and although the other sections were open to many objections, the Amendment was far superior to the clause itself. He should desire to look at this matter from the point of view of a lawyer, and a more severe condemnation had not been pronounced on the clause than by the Attorney General. When asked to define the offences which this clause proposed to create, he simply said, "Intimidation being a general term, it could not be defined." He (Dr. Commins) would not go into the logic of that statement, but there did not exist a general term in our language which did not admit of a definition; and the Attorney General must have forgotten all his logic when he laid down that proposition. Probably the Attorney General meant the offences could not be defined; but there, again, there was no offence known to the English law—say, from assault, which was probably the smallest of all kinds, up to treason or murder—which was not already defined in the most rigid way, and the definition of which did not form a guide to the Judges whenever appeals were made or cases were reserved. Therefore, by the words of the Attorney General himself, this clause was condemned. Suppose intimidation could not be exactly defined; suppose intimidation was a kind of loose term; or that the offence was composed of a number of acts, even a thing that could not be logically defined might be described; and even where description might be at fault, it could be pretty well met by an enumeration of instances, as inductive logicians were in the habit of saying. In the 4th clause there was no definition at all. It merely said that any condition of what everybody would understand to be intimidation, according to the ordinary meaning of the word in a dictionary, ought to include a number of things. That was neither description, enumeration, nor definition, but only made confusion worse confounded; because, in addition to the indefinite meaning that might be attached to the word intimidation, it included a number of things, the very nature of which might give rise to a dispute. Here was the gravest condemnation of the indefinite character of the clause pronounced by the Attorney General when he said it was incapable of definition. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) said that was exactly what he wanted. That was an extraordinary declaration to make, but it was practically what he meant—that the clause should be left indefinite. Surely, in this country, with our centuries of liberty, and our Acts, and our system of regulating conduct by law, we knew what was the difference between having people subject to arbitrary power and subject to law. The object of law was to restrain arbitrary power, and if he was to take the object of this Act from the right hon. and learned Member, it was to go contrary to all the traditions of English law and liberty for the purpose of establishing arbitrary power in the hands of men who were hostile to those whom they might have to try, and who would be strongly tempted to abuse that power. He could not conceive anything more iniquitous than that a person should be brought under the lash of the law for an offence which he never contemplated, which he was unconscious of doing, against which the law had not warned him beforehand, and which no human ingenuity could have discovered to exist. The whole scope of this section tended to the establishment of arbitrary power; to give to magistrates the power of convicting for offences which the law did not define or describe. It had been said that the clause would be interpreted by the Act of 1875, but that was not so. Section 7 of the Conspiracy Act of 1875 actually evaded, and effectually evaded, the very evil that this Amendment was directed against. That section provided that—

Mr. Leamy

“Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing wrongfully, and without legal authority, uses violence or intimidates such other person.”

Under that Act there must be a corpus delicti. That was one of the first principles of the Criminal Law. No person could be convicted of an offence until it was proved that the offence was committed. There must be a corpus delicti. In this Bill there was no corpus delicti. There need be no person whatever against whom an act of intimidation was intended. In other words, there need be no corpus delicti, and there need be no offence. That was like convicting a man for the murder of a man who was still alive. That had happened in England. This Bill would punish people for intimidation without any intimidation having taken place, and without the necessity for any person to come and say that he was intimidated, or to show that an act of intimidation was intended against any particular person or persons. That would leave it entirely in the power of the magistrates to convict anybody whatever of an act of intimidation. Then it would be open to Irish criticism that the Court of Queen's Bench, which was supposed to see that the law was properly administered, would have no power to interfere with such convictions. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) said he could not understand why the Court of Queen's Bench refused to interfere in cases of that kind; but if the hon. Member had been learned in the law, he would have understood that there was in the law a principle by which Courts never interfered, under any circumstances, to overrule the discretion of magistrates. It was an especial rule in the law that where discretion was given by the law to inferior magistrates it was assumed to have been exercised correctly, and no Court would overrule that discretion. Therefore, the Court of Queen's Bench was not only within its rights, but was acting within laws prescribed by the Act of Edward III. in not interfering with the discretion of magistrates. Neither could that Court interfere with the magistrates in committing people to six months' hard labour upon what they might find to be an act of intimidation, but which nobody else could find to be such an act. Upon these grounds he considered the clause without modification, without either enumeration or description of what "Boycotting" was, or what was to be an act of intimidation, would simply establish by law arbitrary power to be placed, not in the hands of an Emperor or a Loris Melikoff, or men of such high position and character as would furnish a guarantee that they would exercise the power in a judicious way, but in the hands of men who had the strongest temptation to use that power for the persecution of the people. Therefore, although he considered the Amendment imperfect, he should support it on the whole.

[Seventh Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he wished to appeal to the Committee with regard to this Amendment. He did not think that it had received very strong support from even the Benches opposite; but, at all events, the Committee was in a position to decide upon it. The hon. Member opposite (Dr. Commins) urged that there should be a definition of intimidation in the Bill; but the Amendment provided no definition. Lower down, however, there was a proposal to define intimidation, and that could be discussed when it was reached. The Amendment did not give what the hon. Member desired, and nobody but himself had the courage to attempt it. All that the Amendment touched was the question of the method by which intimidation was not to be carried out. The fault of that was that if half-a-dozen methods were included, there might be a dozen methods behind which were left out. It was generally admitted by the Committee that intimidation ought not to be allowed, and he would give an instance of the practice. A blacksmith, having shod a horse for a policeman, might be "Boycotted" by everybody else in the village, and in that way he would be ruined.

MR. O'DONNELL asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman could give an instance of a blacksmith who had rendered himself unpopular to a whole village; and, if so, what the Government proposed to do with the whole village?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the people who persecuted the blacksmith would be proceeded against, and he should like to be able to deal with those who incited the people of the village.

Dr. Commins

Those were the persons against whom the Bill was specially directed. If he could catch the person who advised the whole village not to deal with the blacksmith who had shod the horse for the policeman, that was the man he should like to deal with, and that was the sort of man against whom this clause was directed. It was those who incited men to wrong others against whom this Bill was principally directed, and it was quite plain that if the Committee consented to include two, three, or four methods of ruining other people they would leave many other methods outside the Bill.

MR. DILLON said, he thought this Amendment really touched the whole question. He would give an illustration of the subject which had come within his own experience. A certain lawyer had made himself exceptionally obnoxious to the people by putting himself forward as the agent for cruel evictions; and he (Mr. Dillon), speaking at a large meeting in the country, recommended the people to withdraw their patronage from that individual, and he was informed that he had now left the country. Should he, for giving that advice, come within the Act?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, as the Home Secretary could not define intimidation under this Act, he would put two cases, and ask whether they would come under the general definition of intimidation. It was admitted that there were a great many instances in which landlords had charged such rents that the tenants were unable to live and thrive under them. Supposing that the tenants of such a landlord were to agree that they would rather throw up their holdings than pay the rent, and further agreed that, if any one of their number should refuse to throw up his holding, they would decline to hold any further social intercourse with him; would these people be rendered liable to penalties under the Act? There was another case which would come home to the Home Secretary and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It was the habit of the Bar in England and in Ireland to refuse to hold any social intercourse, and to refuse to hold any brief with any man who advertised that he was prepared to take under one guinea for his opinion. He would like to know whether that was not "Boycotting," according to the explanation of it that the Home Secretary himself had given. Perhaps the Home Secretary would tell them, a poor tenant joining with others to prevent unfair rents being refused, and to refuse to hold social intercourse with anyone who would not join with him, was to be subject to six months' imprisonment, and whether if a barrister, or an assembly, or an association of barristers, called, he believed, "the Mess Circuit," were to declare that he or they would absolutely round on anyone of the mess who advertised he was prepared to take half a sovereign for his opinion, which, very likely, was not worth twopence, they would be subject to six months' imprisonment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) that not one of the cases he has mentioned has anything to do with the Amendment. We are now upon a distinct Amendment, and we must keep to it.

MR. METGE said, he would not have ventured to address the Committee had it not been for some observations which had fallen from the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman objected to these words being introduced, and said they had not come to the part of the clause where a definition of intimidation could be entertained.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not mean to say that. What he said was, they had not come to any Amendment which professed to be a definition of intimidation until they came to the Amendment of the hon. Member who last spoke.

MR. METGE said, he understood the present Amendment to be in the direction of the manner in which they wished to limit the construction of the clause. The Committee must remember that only a few nights ago the Attorney General for Ireland said, in reply to a question which was addressed to him, that nobody in the world had any control of the magistrates in Ireland, and he afterwards qualified his answer by saying "except the Queen's Bench." They knew that in the majority of cases the control of the Queen's Bench was entirely delusive. The Home Secretary had said, in answer to a question of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), that in case of extreme "Boycotting"—in the case, for instance, of a blacksmith to whom the whole village refused to give work—he would hold the man who originally incited the people of the district to "Boycott" the man, he would hold him to be the man against whom they ought to proceed. He (Mr. Metge) would say that such a man could be proceeded against under any of the subsections which the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) wished to introduce in the clause. No one seemed to think that the sub-sections of the hon. Member were not wide enough. What the Irish Members felt, and what he himself felt very strongly, was that there should be some distinct definition of the crime of intimidation. He did not wish to defend extreme "Boycotting;" but he certainly would like to know how far the people of Ireland were justified in using what he must say was the only weapon they had with which to defend themselves in the agitation which now existed in Ireland. Certainly, his political career had been short; but he had never said a single word, in or out of Ireland, in favour of "Boycotting." He had never done so, because he felt it would be a dangerous weapon; yet he felt it was the only weapon with which the tenant farmers of Ireland could maintain their position in the war they were waging with the landlord class, backed up, as that class was, by the police and all the moral force of opinion in the House of Commons and in England. He had asked himself the question—"Are the Government really in earnest in their desire to put down crime in Ireland?" Did the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) imagine for one moment that by passing measures of this sort they could put down a crime with which the whole people of Ireland had a certain sympathy with? No one could deny that that sympathy existed. The way to meet the difficulty was not to debate what intimidation was, and what use could be made of "Boycotting," but to lay down a distinct line within which the people of Ireland could proceed.

MR. BARRY said, he rose to emphasize the point raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. Metge). The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, in replying, a few moments ago, to the ties of no mean order. These hon. and learned Members were of opinion that any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, &c., would include every case of exclusive dealing apart from the circumstances. Were the Government, in the face of such opinion, going to create a crime which would revolt the common sense of the people? If so, to what extent did they expect their law would be obeyed? They had been told during this debate—and it had almost become a truism—that if the laws of a country were to be obeyed they must “square” with the moral sense of the people of the country, and all legislation would be in vain unless it proceeded in that direction. If exclusive dealing could never be made a crime in the eyes of the Irish people, the Government would find that the effect of making it so, in a legislative manner, would be to bring the law into contempt. They were told by the Home Secretary that the English people had been treated in the same way. That had been disputed; and there could be no doubt that the Act of 1875 rather seemed to define, or to give some direction to the people as to the crimes which they must avoid in order to escape punishment. It must be well known to every Member of the Government that no such clause as this could possibly be applied to English or Scotch legislation. The people would not have it, and no Government dare introduce it. In the present instance the Government were relying upon the anti-Irish feeling in the country, and somewhat upon their own popularity—both of which, he was bound to say, if they continued in their present courses, they would soon use up—to create a crime in Ireland which would never be regarded in England as a crime, and which would never be regarded in Ireland as a crime. When the clause was understood in England—and it was becoming more understood day by day—he was persuaded the common sense of the people would revolt. The common fairness of the English people would shrink from inflicting such a law on the Irish nation. Again, it was stated by a Member of the Government—he believed by the Home Secretary—that they wanted to put nothing more on the Irish people than had been put on the English people. Upon that statement an influential Member on the Irish side of the House immediately challenged the Home Secretary by saying they would be content if the same rights were given to the people of Ireland as were now enjoyed by Trades Unionists in England. If the professions of the right hon. and learned Gentleman were sincere, he would accept the challenge, and make the two laws agree. Surely a man ought to know the law which he had to obey; at any rate, he ought to be able to find out what it was. It was quite true that the definition of intimidation was to be left in the hands of the Resident Magistrate; and it was equally true that the Irishman had no faith or confidence in the fairness and honesty of the men who had to try him. Now, as to exclusive dealing, unaccompanied by violence, or any threat of violence; because he took it that was what they were arguing about. He ventured to say there was more “Boycotting” in that sense in England than in Ireland. [Mr. Alderman LAWRENCE: No, no!] The hon. Member for the City of London said “No, no!” but that did not alter the fact. Any hon. Member who had lived in rural districts of England must know that in many districts people lived in an atmosphere of “Boycotting,” in the sense he had described—namely, “Boycotting” unaccompanied by violence or any threat of violence. He had known Sunday school treats from which children of Dissenters had been “Boycotted,” and he knew of many instances in which tradesmen had been “Boycotted” because they did not vote at elections for certain sides. He knew that at elections in which he had taken a part there had been published and circulated throughout the district a printed list of all the tradesmen who had voted for the opposite side. All these things were “Boycotting” in the sense he had described; and how could it ever be put down? Let him put a case to the Committee. Suppose such a scene as that enacted at Ballina were to take place here. There would be a public meeting held to express indignation at the action of the police; yet the people who met would not be in terror of being cast into prison for six months with hard labour. The people of Ireland, however, under this Bill, could not assemble to criticize the acts of the police, as such acts ought to be criticized, without fear of imprisonment. Suppose an eviction of a more than ordinarily severe character had taken place, and suppose the men who could not look upon this sentence of death—as an eviction had been described by the Prime Minister himself—with perfect coolness, were to describe it in the same terms as the Prime Minister described it, what would happen? They would be subject to the penalty of this clause. In fact, after the passing of this Act, that House would be the only place where Irish grievances could be ventilated; and when there were about 80 or 90 Home Rulers returned that would not be a very bright outlook.

[Seventh Night.]

Mr. Jesse Collings

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that the hon. Member is discussing the whole clause, and not the particular Amendment before the Committee.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said, he was trying to show the necessity for a proper definition of what would constitute intimidation; and he was pointing out that such a definition was necessary in the case of a man who spoke about evictions in a manner in which, he believed, most men in the House—at any rate, those on the Liberal Benches—would speak of them if they occurred in England. The examples he had given were, to his mind, sufficient to show that the Government should assent to the request of the Irish Members, as embodied in the Amendment. He would not, however, refer to evictions further; but he would ask what would be the effect of the clause without some amendment? The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) might put some of his points in a very rough and, perhaps, an exaggerated manner; but the Committee had nothing to do with that; they had simply to ask them whether what he stated was true or not? What did the hon. Member say would be the effect of the clause if it passed without the Amendment, or some such Amendment, as that now before the Committee? He said the people, having no protection from the law, would seek to protect themselves; and outrage would be the direct consequence of the clause as it now stood. If that be true, it was obviously the duty of the Government to afford such protection to the people as would prevent a resort to outrage as a means of gaining their ends. He trusted the Government would make some concession on this point. Up to now they had made no sign that they intended to make the slightest concession; and, that being so, he did not know how they could blame the Irish Members for the delay which had taken place in the prosecution of the measure, or how they could expect the Irish Members to permit such a clause, unamended by some such Amendment as the present, to pass without the most strenuous endeavour on their part to prevent its enactment. Such a clause would not be permitted to apply to England, Scotland, or Wales; and he was inclined to think that as soon as the English people thoroughly understood its meaning—and he was happy to say they were fast comprehending it—they would protest against it, especially when it was proposed by a Liberal Government.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, he listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings) with great regret. The hon. Gentleman had completely mistaken English Liberal opinion when he said that English Liberals would turn against the clause and against the Bill the more they understood their meaning. He had listened most attentively to the debate on this clause, and he believed that he had never heard more finespun definitions evolved with regard to anything than had been evolved in the course of this discussion. Let them look at the clause in the light of common sense, and it would be in the light of common sense that it would be administered by the magistrates upon whom the duty devolved. He maintained that in the definitions which were embodied in the 1st and 2nd sub-sections of the clause would be found everything that was necessary in order to arrive at what really came within the four corners of the process called "Boycotting." It had been said other definitions were wanted. They could not have an elaborate definition of a process which was so subtle, so insidious, and so ingenious. How could they cope with such a process except by a definition which was not specific? What he wanted to impress on the Government was, that the further they lost themselves in elaborate definitions, the less they would be able to meet the system of "Boycotting," which was the invention of the authors of the Land League. The Land League Leaders wanted, by some means or other, to preserve to themselves the practice of "Boycotting," and that was what he held it was the duty of the Government to resist. If there was any justification for a Bill like the present, it was that it should give the authorities in Ireland the power to meet with the specific danger which now existed in that country. He trusted the Government would not be induced to give way by such appeals as that just addressed to them by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), who, in this matter, did not represent the true Liberal, or even the true Radical, feeling of the country.

[Seventh Night.]

MR. R. T. REID said, the attempt of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was, by certain sub-sections, to define the offence of intimidation. If the offence of intimidation was defined, the effect would be that the definition would be used, or might be used, by the persons against whom the clause was directed for the purpose of inventing modes of intimidation not included in the clause. He would ask any hon. Gentleman to consider whether the term "intimidation" was capable of exhaustive definition by any human being? In ordinary legal phraseology, such terms as fraud were not defined, and were never sought to be defined, for the very reason that if they kindly gave a fraudulent person a definition of the term fraud, he would immediately invent some method by which he could commit the offence without bringing himself within the words of the definition. He could not think for a moment that when the hon. Member for the City of Cork reflected, he would desire to insist upon his Amendment, which could not be an exhaustive definition of intimidation. He would tell the hon. Member that it was the opinion of many Gentlemen who desired to repress intimidation, and to include "Boycotting" in intimidation, that the words of the section were too wide, and would strike at some things which were not offences. They, however, did not think the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was the best that could be made to avoid the evil. The best way to meet the evil would be to adopt an Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey). It was felt that by that, or some similar provision, it would be possible to prevent anything that was bond fide or honestly done coming within the purview of the clause.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Reid) that it was impossible to define intimidation. It was precisely because it was impossible to define the term intimidation, and terms of that kind, that the English law had provided the protection of trial by jury for anybody charged with the offence. The Irish people were denied that protection by this Bill, and that was why he and his hon. Friends were urging the Government to assent to some limitation of the terms of an Act which the magistrates and police were to administer. The Home Secretary had informed the Committee that the great object of the clause was to put down "Boycotting." It appeared to him that there had been a good deal of nonsense talked about "Boycotting;" there had been far more twaddle talked about "Boycotting" than about anything else. He was in favour of "Boycotting." He believed that "Boycotting" was a natural, proper, and necessary remedy under certain circumstances, and he believed the people of Ireland were perfectly justified in having recourse to that weapon. But there was "Boycotting" and "Boycotting." The "Boycotting" which he justified was not the "Boycotting" which had been described by the Home Secretary or by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. Those right hon. Gentlemen had described the abuse of "Boycotting," and he would be anxious, as he believed every Member who sat around him would be anxious, to prevent "Boycotting" being used in the manner which had been so described. What was "Boycotting?" It was a social penalty for a social offence. If a man in this country committed a murder, or committed fraud, or committed perjury, or committed any disgraceful act which was a crime in the eye of the law, he was punished accordingly. The offender was "Boycotted" pretty effectually, for in some cases he was sentenced to solitary confinement. There were, however, offences outside any legal definition which worked as much injury as any of the crimes known to the law, and in Ireland those offences were committed with impunity by men whom the Government—soldiers, police magistrates, and Chief Secretary, with their suspecting power—were only too ready to assist. What could the people do to defend themselves against these offenders if they were prohibited from using the natural weapon of “Boycotting?” A man who deceived his fellows by first of all joining an organization, or urged other men to join an organization, and take up a certain attitude against their oppressors, and then renounced his promises, was a traitor, and deserved the term of traitor. A man who went to bid for a farm—[“Oh, oh!”] Yes; he did not say one thing in Ireland and another thing in that House, and what he had said elsewhere he was prepared to say here. A man who went behind the back of his neighbour and bid for his farm, although he might have promised the organization to which they both belonged that he would take a totally different course, was a knave and a scoundrel. Such a man ought to meet with his deserts; he had been guilty of a social offence, and deserved a social penalty. If he knew such a man, and he had a flour store or a meal store, or a butcher’s shop, he was justified in refusing—and he would refuse—to have anything to do with him, and if the man came to his store for food, he would refuse to serve him. He maintained that no law could compel him to serve a man against his will. It mattered nothing to him that other butchers, or bakers, or grocers in the same district did the same as he did. It might be that the man could not get food in the district—so much worse for the man—it was no reason that he should serve him. If the fellow chose to be a traitor to his neighbours, let him go elsewhere. But while he maintained the right of communities to adopt measures of that kind, he was perfectly free to confess that the man who used personal violence, or threats of personal violence, against the offender, or against anyone belonging to him, or against his property, was acting in a totally different way; he was abusing “Boycotting,” and ought to be punished. He did not propose to screen a man who abused “Boycotting;” but he maintained that a reasonable and proper use of a natural and necessary weapon ought not to bring a man within the purview of this law. The Home Secretary told them he meant to put down “Boycotting” of every description, and he brought in this clause to effect that object. But would he effect that object? Not a bit. The Home Secretary knew perfectly well that no Act of Parliament could put down “Boycotting.” If “Boycotting” was a natural outcome of the public sentiment of a district, they might pass a hundred Acts of Parliament, and they would never put it down. It went over a district searching in every part like the breeze; public opinion was formed gradually and imperceptibly, like the dawn of the morn, and they could not catch it in any part. They could not, by Act of Parliament or by police regulations, prevent it; and though they might attach great importance to the clause, in the hope of putting down “Boycotting,” they would miserably fail. They would enable the magistrates and the police, and the landlord classes, whose creatures the Government were, to trample upon the people of Ireland; they would enable the authorities to terrorize most vexatiously over the people amongst whom they were stationed; they would give the power of a tyrannical search into every department of life, and to scrutinize every action, however innocent; they would enable them to interpret every look, and every word, and every action of every man, woman, and child as intimidation. It was this tyranny that the hon. Member for the City of Cork wished to guard against. He proposed to do that by defining what the offences were which should be considered to fall under a fair interpretation of the clause. It did appear to him that the definition or explanation which his hon. Friend proposed to insert were sufficiently comprehensive. The hon. Gentleman, however, was prepared to go further, and to accept any further explanation or modification which the Government might choose to propose. His (Mr. Arthur O’Connor’s) principal objection to the proposal was, that it still left the people without that protection which was afforded by the English law to an English offender under like circumstances; in England they were so anxious to protect the man who was charged with an undefined offence, that they guaranteed to him the protection of trial by jury. Years ago, when an offence was committed which would come under this clause, the House of Lords consulted the Judges as to whether the meaning of a threatening letter should be decided by the Judge or by the jury—it was on the occasion of the House of Lords' Committee on Fox's Bill. The Judges gave it as their unanimous opinion that the matter should be left to the Judge, and not to the jury; but Fox's Bill provided, in a special clause, that it should be left to the jury to decide the meaning of a threatening letter. If the British were so anxious to secure these safeguards for offences in their own country, why did they refuse the Irish people the same protection? They told the Irish people that they were anxious the same laws should prevail in Ireland as in England, and the Attorney General told them the other day that this clause was drawn on the lines and in the spirit of the English law. It was an entire departure from the spirit and lines of the English law; it created new offences, and it dealt with them in a much more summary, arbitrary, and cruel way than offences of a like character were dealt with in England. These were the objections he had to the clause as it stood, and it seemed to him that the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a very moderate one.

[Seventh Night.]

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, no one could deny that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was within his right in making the proposal which had now for some considerable time been under discussion by the Committee; but he thought they must feel that the merits of that proposal had been now canvassed very fully, and that they, after all, were as likely to be able to come to a decision upon that particular proposal at this moment as they would be after any number of hours of further discussion. The real truth was, they were not discussing the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. Upon that almost everything had been said that was likely to be said, and for a long time it had been merely taken as a point of departure. They were engaged in discussing the merits of the whole clause, and the advisability of dealing with the offence of "Boycotting." The natural feelings of vexation which must be felt at the waste of time by a long discussion in trivial points would be very much aggravated if it was felt that an opportunity was taken, and an excuse was made, upon each and every small point which was raised in this way to discuss and re-discuss so large a question as that which was now before the Committee—he meant the question of stopping "Boycotting" altogether. Such speeches as those of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor), and of other hon. Gentlemen near him, were in direct opposition to that which had been declared to be the will of a very large majority of the Committee—namely, that effective measures should be taken to put down the offence of "Boycotting." Not only was that the feeling of a vast majority of the Committee, but it was unmistakably the feeling of the people of this country. They were not encouraged by what they heard, day by day, from Ireland; they were not encouraged to think that the reign of terror was at an end, so that they were likely to be able to dispense with exceptional legislation. Neither the accounts of crime committed, nor the failures of justice in cases where crime was brought before the tribunals in the ordinary way, encouraged them to believe that they could dispense with such legislation. Arguments which were founded upon an objection to exceptional legislation were arguments which men must take with this qualification—that the Committee had decided that they would adopt exceptional legislation, and that it was not enough to be told that this or the other point was contrary to the ordinary spirit of our laws, because they knew they were passing an exceptional Act in view of an exceptional state of circumstances. It was not right that the speeches that were made by hon. Gentlemen, in apology and praise of what was called the excellent system of "Boycotting," should be allowed to go unchallenged; it was not right that hon. Gentlemen should be allowed to take up the time of the Committee with such speeches when they were endeavouring to deal with such a question as the present. They knew perfectly well that the Government had undertaken this matter very much against their own natural inclination. ["No!"] Well, he assumed that a Liberal Government disliked anything in the nature of exceptional law, or what was called coercion; but, whether that be so or not, he thought the general feeling would be that they would not have undertaken such a matter as this, laying aside, as they had been obliged to do, a great deal of other Business which they felt to be important and they were anxious to proceed with, if they had not been strongly convinced, in the responsible position they occupied, that a measure of this kind was necessary for the maintenance of peace in Ireland. He earnestly trusted the Committee would support the Government in carrying through the measure they had proposed, allowing, of course, a fair and full discussion of all proposals of a bond fide character, but disallowing time to be wasted by discussions, which all tended to the same point, and which, in point of fact, were all directed against that which the Committee had already decided upon—namely, to put down the offence of “Boycotting.”

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought the Committee was very much indebted to the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) for the speech he had delivered, because that speech showed how irreconcilable was the difference between the House of Commons and the hon. Members who advocated and justified “Boycotting.” He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) took it that this clause was, in reality, a clause which, if carried in a proper and workable form, would prove the safeguard of the poor people of Ireland, who were suffering terrible tyranny from this very system of “Boycotting.” He took it that the House of Commons, and the people of England and Scotland, and the respectable people of Ireland, were determined that “Boycotting” should be put down and rooted out from the face of the earth. “Boycotting,” as it had been practised in Ireland—and he had said it before—indicated to his mind a condition of morality in that country, and on the part of those who adopted it, totally different from that which obtained amongst people who knew the real meaning of liberty. It seemed to him that many hon. Members who had talked loudly of liberty knew nothing of it, other than liberty to carry out their own laws, and to determine who should and who should not obey them. The hon. Member for Queen's County had said there were abuses of “Boycotting,” and that he himself advocated a beneficial use of it. Well, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should like to ask the hon. Member who was to be the judge of what was an abuse? The only Judge in this country, or any country where the law was obeyed, was the law itself; and the very way in which the liberties of this country had been maintained had been by altering the law to suit the particular circumstances of the moment. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and other hon. Members had frequently spoken of what they called the “English” Trades Union Act. There was no such thing as the “English” Trades Union Act. The “English” Trades Union Act was the “Irish” Trades Union Act. It applied equally to Ireland as to England, and it defined exactly in the same way for that country as for this the offence of intimidation. He had always held that if that Act had been put in force at the commencement of “Boycotting,” things would never have come to the pass to which they had arrived. But that Act had not been put in force, and the consequence was that the ingenuity of those who avowed the system had devised new forms of “Boycotting” which were calculated to carry out their own views, but which had resulted, at the same time, in destroying freedom of contract and freedom of nearly every other kind in Ireland. He knew tradespeople in Ireland who had been ruined for no other reason than because they had paid their rents; and he had received from Ireland the most pitiable and heartrending accounts of the condition of these men and their families, owing to that practice which the hon. Member had described as so praiseworthy. As for the poor tenants, hon. Members knew that there had been numbers of them who had been not merely ruined in their circumstances, but had been mutilated and even murdered under that system. “Boycotting,” to be effectual, must be enforced, as they knew, by penalties. [“No, no!”] The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) said “No;” but he maintained the contrary. The first penalty, as had been said, was social ostracism; but when social ostracism did not answer, what followed? An hon. Member had spoken of “the dawn of the morning” when “Boycotting” commenced; and his reply was, whenever it had commenced, it was in the dead of the night that it finished and its terrible penalties were inflicted. His intention, in the best interests, as he believed, of the county he represented and the people to whom he belonged, was to support the Government in making this an effectual clause; and here he wished to point out a great inconsistency on the part of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, who, a short time ago, professed himself ready to accept what he repeatedly called the "English" Act—but which they knew was not exclusively an English Act—and its definitions. The hon. Member, then, was willing to accept "intimidation," leaving it without definition.

An hon. MEMBER: A prisoner can claim a jury.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that was a practical example of the evil of referring to another Act of Parliament, when hon. Members did not know anything about the penalties in that Act. They were not enforced by juries at all; they were imposed by—

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The 9th clause enables a man to claim a jury.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the great majority of the penalties were imposed summarily by the magistrates.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: They are not of necessity.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was not sure that he was right upon the point. But it was perfectly clear that in Ireland, if the Act was to be made workable at all, the cases must come, not before a jury, but a Court of Summary Jurisdiction; and what he would endeavour to do would be to make that Court of Summary Jurisdiction satisfactory. He would not intrust the provisions of this Act to ordinary magistrates sitting in all parts of Ireland; he had all along protested against the idea of intrusting these functions to the ordinary magistrates, and he would go any length to improve the status and qualification of the stipendiary magistrates who were to enforce the clause. It was a monstrous thing that a man who was not a lawyer—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now dealing with the 19th clause, which is not before the Committee.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was discussing the actual terms of the 19th clause, it was true; but, in doing that, he was only following the example set him by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, who had made considerable observation upon that section. But he would pass away from that subject, and would say that the hon. Member for the City of Cork should, in the spirit of his declaration, accept the word "intimidation," and then follow with the series of offences which he thought ought to be punished, as was done in the Trades Union Act, which was applicable to both countries. But what the hon. Member proposed to do now was something that would limit the meaning of the word "intimidation," and that would, of course, enable hon. Members who approved of "Boycotting" to invent new methods of carrying out the principle which they thought so desirable. Do not let the Committee forget that they had had frequent declarations from the other side of the House that it was the intention of hon. Members to drive a carriage and four through this Bill when it became an Act. They knew every effort would be made to defeat the operation of the measure and to render it nugatory, and this would succeed unless the House of Commons took good care that the determination of the people of this country was carried out; that "Boycotting" should cease to exist in Ireland.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he hoped he should not imitate the example of the Leader of the Opposition, who, after having been absent from the debate a large part of the evening, had proceeded to give the Committee a lengthened lecture, not a single word of which had referred to the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork now under discussion. The hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had stated that he was in favour of the clause passing the House as amended, as it put the law for preventing that objectionable intimidation in a good and workable form. Now, he (Mr. O'Donnell) was not in favour of the exact wording of the whole of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork; but he was in favour of the clause being so amended as to make it more definite; or, in the words of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, more workable. He entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the County of Galway in saying that all kinds of violence, whether they went the length of mutilation and murder or not, should be rendered as impossible as any amount of ingenuity at the disposal of both sides of the House could make them; and, though the hon. Member for the county of Galway said that "Boycotting" could not be enforced without penalties, he (Mr. O'Donnell) held that the Committee ought to pass such a law which would entirely prevent the continued subsistence of all that part of "Boycotting" which depended upon penalties. Let no "Boycotting" subsist except that which consisted of opinion and not of violence. With these limits, the proposal of the Government would be admirable; without them, they could only be described, in the words of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), as consisting of an expression of anti-Irish hate which was too prevalent in England at the present moment. There was no question that the hon. Member for Ipswich was right; that this Bill would be regarded, if this unamended clause was accepted, as, above all things, a monument of anti-Irish prejudice, and that it represented nothing but the baser instincts of the English nature. He (Mr. O'Donnell) had been pleading, a short time ago, for a more exact limitation and expression, and, in fact, for a more workable form of the clause; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had only replied to him with some jocosse evasions. He had asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman what was he to do in the case of an individual in any community, say, in a village, becoming intensely unpopular, and the whole of the community "Boycotting" him? How could any provision of this Bill—how could the clause under discussion, in the slightest degree, deal with that situation? "But," said the Home Secretary, "we should take care to deal with the incitors to the 'Boycotting' of that individual." The Committee must know, however, that there was such a thing as "Boycotting" without incitement, and that was the most universal form of "Boycotting" in Ireland. He would tell the Home Secretary of one kind of "Boycotting" that would become universal when this Bill passed into law. The instant a summary magistrate—a coercionist magistrate—put the coercionist provisions of this Bill into operation, in order to protect some individual in the community, that individual would be a ruined man. He (Mr. O'Donnell) was perfectly certain of this—that if there could be one way more than another in which the Government could insure the ruin of the business of any man in Ireland, it would be by putting in force the provisions of this law for his protection. That would not be the case if the Government were to amend this clause, so as to make law and morality coincident—so as to make the provisions of the law find an echo in conscience and human nature. For instance, if they restricted "intimidation" to "bond fide intimidation" by violence and brutality, the Government would be able to put their law in operation by the conscience of the community; but if they wished to introduce into the Bill words to make it depend upon the arbitrary will of a magistrate to say that a man should be imprisoned for six months on a charge of intimidation, unless the sentence was ratified by the conscience of the community as well as the judgment of the Court, from that moment the man they sought to protect was a ruined man, as far as his business was concerned, whether he were a blacksmith, a grocer, a small trader, or a large trader. If they did not accept the reasonable Amendments of the Irish Party, and bring their Bill in a line with conscience and morality, then their attempts, by the exercise of gross tyranny, to protect particular individuals would only result in the complete ruin and "Boycotting" of those individuals. He was certain he could speak for the opinion of large districts in Ireland, and he was sure that there was not an Irish Member on those Benches who would not tell the Government the more severe they made their law the less efficient it would be, and the more indiscriminate they made this provision the more sure were they of failure; and that unless they accepted Amendments—he did not defend the exact words of the Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork—but unless they accepted reasonable Amendments, distinguishing those combinations which were necessary for the protection of popular interests and that brutality which they all detested, the man they wished to protect would be a ruined man. The very fact that a man, deemed innocent and honourable by the rest of the community, was working out his terrible term of six months' hard labour, without trial by a common jury, would be enough to excite all the neighbourhood to "Boycotting" more effectually than if all the organs of the Land League had been preaching it up for months. Therefore, if the Home Secretary would condescend to take notice of the observations of so infinitely an inferior being as himself, he would ask him to remember this, and to recall the statement in 12 months' time—that he would see in every case, or in 99 out of 100 cases, in which this tyrannical clause was brought into operation for the protection of an individual, that, instead of protecting, he would only have ruined that man.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he wished to make a personal explanation. He had been too ready a short time ago to apologize to the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) on the subject of the Trades Union Act, for he found that he had been quite right in all he had said. The penalties under the Trades Union Act were without appeal if they were under a fine of £20. When the penalty was £20, or imprisonment without the option of a fine, an appeal was allowed. If, then, a man was fined £5 or £10, he would have to suffer suitable imprisonment without appeal, unless he paid it. The prisoner could only appeal to a jury in the more important cases; and in practice the majority of the cases were undoubtedly settled in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction.

MR. O'KELLY said, the hon. Member for the County of Galway forgot that men who were convicted in England had been convicted by juries of their countrymen—[MR. MITCHELL HENRY: No, no!]
—at any rate, by magistrates who were in sympathy with the people of the country, and were not the representatives, as in Ireland, of a class. The men who would be trying these cases in Ireland would be men most willing to convict—men who would strain the law against the prisoners. Instead of using the law to effect justice, they would use it as a method of vengeance, not so much against men guilty of any offence, as against men who might have made themselves obnoxious in their districts for political reasons. If the Government honestly wished to put down crime, what objection could there be to their defining what the crime was which they wished to put down? What did they want with an Act which practically left the magistrates the judges of the crime—not merely judges of the effects, but judges as to whether the crime had been committed—and who would magnify in their own minds perfectly innocent acts into crimes? What the Irish Members wanted was that these crimes, whatever they might be, should be put down in black and white in this Act, so that every man might know what the law was. If the Act passed in its present shape no man would know what intimidation meant, what the limits of the law were, and whether certain action was within the law or outside it. As a matter of justice, and as a protection to the subject, it ought to be the desire of this Committee, and of those who administered justice in Ireland, that the law should be so defined that every man should know what it was, and would not have to be brought before a tribunal that would be regarded with suspicion by the general community, and tried for an offence that would exist principally in the imagination of the men who tried the cases. If the Government simply wished to exact justice, if they wished simply to protect the peace of the country and the freedom of each individual, he, for one, should be just as anxious that the law should be passed for the complete protection of each individual in the country as anyone in this House could be; but what he objected to was, that they were proposing to pass a law so wide, so undefined, that no man would know whether he was committing a crime or not, that no man would know whether the simplest word of criticism he might speak of his neighbour, or of an obnoxious person in his district, might not, in the imagination of a local magistrate, be constituted into a crime. Even the hon. Member for the county of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) would admit that the magistracy of Ireland was not regarded with confidence by the people; and now, after the passing of this Act had conferred upon them extraordinary and exceptional powers, that magistracy would be regarded with more suspicion than ever. It was necessary, then, in the interests of peace and justice, that the people should be convinced that this Act was administered with the strictest justice and the strictest respect for the law. If they left it in its present condition, that opinion and that belief would not exist in Ireland; and, so far from its ever conducing to the establishment of peace and order, it would come into Ireland as a firebrand to increase the detestation and the suspicion with which the vast majority of the Irish people regarded the English laws—and so far from leading to the suppression of serious crime, it would have a tendency to increase it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would appeal to the Committee to come to a division. They had been for three hours discussing the Amendment put down by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, but in which, he was bound to say, that hon. Member did not seem to have taken a very deep personal interest; in fact, the Amendment had been moved by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and he was not aware that the hon. Member for the City of Cork had said a single word in support of it. It had been supported by several hon. Gentlemen who described themselves as supporters and friends of "Boycotting;" but these Gentlemen, he ventured to say, were hardly likely to recommend the Amendment to the majority of the Committee, as the great majority were not in favour of "Boycotting." The hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Arthur O'Connor) had said he was all for "Boycotting," and the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) had said very much the same thing, and had pointed out all the forms of "Boycotting" that would be adopted when this Bill was passed. Surely, that could not be an argument for an Amendment to define the particular shape and form in which "Boycotting" should be illegal. He (Sir William Harcourt) ventured to point out to the Committee that the subjects which naturally arose on this Amendment had been exhausted over and over again in this discussion. The point before them was not whether they ought to have some clause against "Boycotting," because that question hon. Members would have an opportunity of discussing when the clause was put; but the question they had to determine was, whether, assuming, as they did assume, that this clause would be passed, that was a proper way to define the offence of "Boycotting." If they were to have nothing like a bond fide discussion on the matter, they ought now to be allowed to come to a decision.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that if this clause merely aimed at the suppression of that kind of "Boycotting" that was practised against Captain Boycott, no man on the Conservative side of the House would support the clause more strenuously than he should; but he thought it went a little further, and that they really did require some such Amendment as that proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork to be taken into consideration at this stage. It must not be assumed that those hon. Members on either side of the House who supported the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, or who might vote for this Amendment, in the least degree supported the principle of "Boycotting." But "Boycotting" was a very loose sort of phrase, and was capable of a thousand definitions or explanations. He wished, however, that the Committee would confine itself to the question before it. What they wanted was to have the offence so specifically pointed out that the people would know it. If it could be shown that the clause, as it stood as proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, would be effective in putting a stop to "Boycotting," he would support it without amendment; but he did not think it was sufficiently comprehensive, and rather justified the demand on their part.

MR. BYRNE said, that, up to the present time, he had not intruded himself on the House; he had not said one word since the Bill had been in Committee. He, however, felt it to be his duty to support the Amendment, and to express his abhorrence for the manner in which these clauses were worded. He was surprised that Her Majesty's Government had thought it their duty to use such language in the Bill, especially as they were a Government representing a free country. He should have thought that the people of any civilized country would have been astonished, and that every Member of this House would have been astonished, to find such language used—to find it said in a Bill of this kind that any act or word spoken in any manner should give power to the officers of the law to look up a man for six months without the option of a trial by jury. Hon. Members might wonder why the Irish Representatives were contesting the Bill, and sticking so pertinaciously, clause by clause, to their attempts to get it modified in some degree; but he thought they would not be so astonished if they had had as much experience of the tribunals under which these offences would be tried as the Irish Members. He had some knowledge of the tribunals in England and Ireland, and he could not disguise from himself this fact, that whatever degree of fair play was given to criminals in England, fair play under all circumstances could not be obtained from the same tribunals in Ireland; and, with the permission of the Committee, he would give one or two short illustrations to show how the law was administered by the stipendiary magistrates and others in Ireland. It was well known that in Ireland the stipendiary magistrate went through a county, visiting the petty sessional towns here and there from time to time. In course of time he visited every petty sessional district in his county, and it was well known that whatever opinion was expressed or entertained by the Resident Magistrates was acted on by the stipendiary magistrate. There was one offence which was committed in England as well as in Ireland, but which occurred in Ireland, he was sorry to say, much oftener than it should—namely, the simple crime of drunkenness—

THE CHAIRMAN: I beg to remind the hon. Member that the subject he is now referring to is not in the least germane to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. BYRNE said, that before the right hon. Gentleman ruled him out of Order, he would ask his permission to give one or two illustrations. He trusted that the Chairman would be fair enough to give him this opportunity.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is giving illustrations of the action of magistrates in cases of drunkenness, and that, I would remind him, is not the subject before the Committee.

MR. BYRNE said, he was mentioning decisions where men were brought forward for being drunk in order to show how irregular was the dispensation of justice.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member, I say, is out of Order, and he cannot discuss those subjects.

MR. BYRNE said, that being the case, he would refer to another matter—namely, as to whether the law was properly administered in Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman would allow him, he would give an illustration taken from the Registration Courts. [Cries of "Question!" and "Name!"] He thought it would be fairer to the Chairman to give him a distinct statement of what he intended to say, and he now proposed to deal generally with the subject. He objected to this clause, because, when the Act came before the tribunals in Ireland, he feared that persons unfortunate enough to be brought before the Resident Magistrate would not have the same fair play, and the same justice meted out to them, as they would if they were in England. If they were certain that the law, especially Criminal Law, would be administered in Ireland by Resident Magistrates and other officials in as fair a manner as it was in England, they would not be so ready to fight this clause, the language of which was most extreme. With regard to what had been discussed so fully this evening—namely, "Boycotting," he altogether denied that it was an Irish institution or an Irish offence. The first time his attention was drawn to "Boycotting" was in an English newspaper, where, after an advertisement for some individual who was wanted to perform certain services, these words were added—"No Irish need apply." That was the first illustration of "Boycotting" he had ever noticed. But they need not go far to find that "Boycotting" was practised by almost all the Professions, even the learned Professions, and even the Clubs in London practised it. It was well known that not only in one, but in many Clubs in London was "Boycotting" practised; and as to the Professions, he had heard of cases where one doctor refused to meet another doctor in consultation because he had not a sufficient number of letters after his name.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to deal with the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. REDMOND said, that on the point of Order might he be allowed to submit that the hon. Member was only illustrating the practice of "Boycotting," and that similar illustrations had been allowed to be given by other Members.

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and I ask the hon. Member to keep to that Amendment.

Mr. Byrne

MR. BYRNE said, he was always ready to submit to the ruling of the Chairman, and he was speaking literally to the point. He could not advocate the Amendment without, in the strongest language, condemning the original text of the clause. If they were to improve that clause, he must comment both on the advantages of the Amendment and the disadvantages of the clause; therefore, he would ask the Chairman, as he had asked him before, to allow him to illustrate his argument as hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House had been permitted to do. When he said that he himself had never advocated "Boycotting," he was entitled to some little respect and consideration on the subject. Although he had never advocated "Boycotting," considering the circumstances of the country, he agreed with some hon. Members that there was no other course left open to the Irish people but to defend themselves when there was no one else to defend them. He might say, in passing, that the Government themselves practised "Boycotting." They "Boycotted" the Irish Members and the Irish people. There was not a single Irish Member in the Cabinet, and all the magistrates of Ireland were either land agents, bailiffs, or persons appointed from the landlord class. London was a place where "Boycotting" was carried out to perfection; and if the Bill were to pass as at present worded, he ventured to say that no one in Ireland would be able to speak to his neighbour, or anyone else. In point of fact, a third party must never be mentioned, because if one person were to speak to another about a third person's crops, or his tillage, or advise the people to pay rent, some official or policeman would be able to bring him before the magistrates and have him tried without a jury. One of two things must happen if the Bill passed in its present form—either the people, rather than fall into the traps prepared for them, must leave Ireland; or they must avail themselves of those disorderly practices he had never approved of, and never would approve of, and take the law into their own hands. He would ask hon. Members to be just to his country, and not to legislate for it in hot haste, not to legislate for it in the panic and passion which possessed them at the present moment. If they did so, as certain as they sowed the wind would they reap the whirlwind. They had just passed a clause doing away with trial by jury; but he would venture to say to the Executive that it was not short of juries they were, but short of witnesses. If public speaking was put a stop to in Ireland, if a man was not allowed to speak to his neighbour in the most legitimate manner, if a shopkeeper was obliged to serve every one in his town or village that a policeman said he must serve, the people of Ireland would find the means, as other people had found the means, of evading the oppressive laws. If a policeman in Ireland was to be able to say to a shopkeeper—"If you refuse to sell a loaf of bread, or a stone of flour, to such and such a person, I will prosecute you," he (Mr. Byrne) did not see why those shopkeepers should not follow the example set them in London, and adopt the co-operative system, turning their shops into co-operative stores, and selling only to members. They could then have what members they pleased, and sell to whom they pleased. The Irish people were now fully aware that they had rights, and they would, under all circumstances, find the means of maintaining those rights. Do not let Parliament make this Act too stringent—let them make it so that it would apply only to evil-doers. For his own part, he did not care how much they punished evil-doers; but do not let them arouse the temper of the whole Island simply because they wanted to prosecute a few men.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he did not intend to keep the Committee very long; but he had not taken any part for the last few nights in the debate, and he felt inclined to say a few words on this Amendment and clause. The Amendment, to his mind, seemed to endeavour to lay down some definition of a certain class of offences. They had heard a great deal in the course of the discussion about the desire of the Government, as nearly as they could, to act on the lines of the Act of 1875; but in this clause the Government not only did not keep to the principle of that Act, but in one or two instances they went directly in opposition to it. What were the principles of the Act of 1875? One great principle of that measure was that it placed the employer and the workman exactly on the same level as to these laws. The other great principle was that it declared no act to be illegal when done by a combination of men which was not illegal when done by a single man acting on his own account. Those would be allowed to be the material principles of the Act of 1875; and he would ask the Committee whether the present clause did not go directly against these principles? It did not place the two classes on an equality before the law. The Irish landlord corresponded with the employer in the English Act, and the Irish tenant corresponded with the workman. The Bill before the Committee made that an offence when committed by one class which would not be an offence if committed by the other, and it made a thing illegal when done by a single man which was not illegal when done by a combination of men. This was a grave defect in the clause, and, added to that, was the serious defect that it did not define the new offences. In some parts the clause had a vague and shadowy meaning that might cover almost every word, or deed, or look. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was an honest endeavour to improve the clause by, at least, setting up some definition of the offence; but it hardly seemed to him to be the business of the Irish Members to supply definitions. It was the duty of the Government to do it, and it was only when they would not that someone else had to come forward and do their work for them. It seemed to him most monstrous to wish to retain in the clause words like these—

[Seventh Night.]

“In this Act the word ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

There was hardly anything which a person might do which could not be included under that clause—a sullen look, a significant glance. Take the offence of “Boycotting.” No matter how stringent they made the clause, in order to put a stop to exclusive dealing, they would never be able to prevent it. A man might simply announce that he was himself determined not to deal with a particular tradesman; he might give no advice to others, but the hint might go round, and exclusive dealing might be established as effective and general as any other form of that practice. He held that the clause was most objectionable, and that the Irish Members were bound to oppose it.

Mr. PARNELL said, the reception this Amendment had met with at the hands of the Government represented the true spirit which underlay their action in regard to the clause. Nothing, he thought, could be fairer than the proposition he had made in asking that some definition of intimidation should be given. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had, practically, a choice of two courses so far as the Irish Members were concerned. He could either adopt the construction of the Trades Union Act—the Conspiracy Act of 1875—which stated that intimidation was to be of a personal character, or else define the intimidation which he wished to provide against. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, would do neither the one nor the other. He insisted upon retaining these very wide and sweeping provisions, which could only have the effect of placing it in the absolute power of the stipendiary magistrates throughout the country to deal as they pleased with any movement or organization for any purpose whatever which might be set on foot in Ireland. They had had a definition of what the Government desired to put down. They had been told that the Government desired to put a stop to notices of a threatening and illegal character, to put down the “Boycotting” of persons by having them followed through the town by a bellman. They had offered the Government that. They had been told that the Government wished to prevent the holding up of persons to public odium. They offered the Government that. They had been told the Government wanted to prevent violence being used against any person. They offered the Government that. And they said, moreover—“If you desire any other definition of intimidation, place it on the Paper, and we will be most happy to consider it in the fairest possible manner, and yield to it if we possibly can; but we object to a clause which gives such enormously wide and vague powers as this.” The Irish Members contended that these powers were unprecedented in the history of the government of any country, and that no Government ever before sought from any legislation such powers for the purpose of putting a stop, not to intimidation, but to combination. They had in India a Government of an autocratic kind, a Government in which the people were absolutely deprived of any representation whatever, and there had been a land question in India, just as there had been a land question in Ireland; and yet, even in India, where they did not require the assent of any Representative Assembly to their legislation, they had never ventured, with so many millions of people under their control, constituting a power and a danger far greater than the Irish people—they had never asked, against these teeming millions in India, the power they were now asking against the few insignificant millions in Ireland. They had shown, by the demand they made, an absence of all trust and confidence in themselves, and a desire to repress and trample on the Irish people, which would assuredly react upon themselves. They had cast to the winds all desire to be pacific, to trust to the honour of the people, and they had determined to rely upon brute force and the exertions of a section of men who were hated and detested, and that with good reason, by the great majority of the people of Ireland. It appeared to him to be useless to appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might have his own reasons for the attitude and the course he had taken, but he (Mr. Parnell) believed that the result of his action would be that the Cabinet, of which he was a Member, would be dragged to destruction; and the Government might thank themselves if this and other results which he had ventured to predict should come to pass. They might thank themselves for retaining amongst their number a right hon. and learned Gentleman, who, if he had any Liberal instincts at all, had only the instincts of the official and the man who desired to retain his seat at any price. To the right hon. and learned Gentleman, by the attitude he took up last Session in reference to this whole matter, were attributable, quite as much as to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, the misfortunes that had come on Ireland and the Government of Ireland during the last 12 months. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman knew the real state of things in Ireland and in America—and he had stated that he did know—he had deceived the House. If he did not know, he had no right to speak about it. It appeared that he had not, even in 12 months, got rid of his scare about O'Donovan Rossa; and he said he was constantly reading columns and columns of seditious literature in the American newspapers. He (Mr. Parnell) could only say he wished the right hon. and learned Gentleman would read instead the Irish-American newspapers. Instead of finding them full of sedition, he would find them even more moderate than the Irish newspapers at home. Surely, it was not too much to hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would allow himself to be instructed, even at the last moment, and would take some trouble to inform himself as to what was the opinion of the Irish people at home and abroad, and that, having so informed himself, he would become a true repeater of that opinion. It was one of the most lamentable things that the Irish people had to face—that on an occasion like the present, when they were seeking to introduce reasonable Amendments, the Government would make no concession to the popular voice of Ireland.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. MACLIVER said, he rose to Order. He apprehended that the Committee would feel that the hon. Member was travelling very wide of the clause now under discussion. The Chairman, he thought, might very fairly call on the hon. Gentleman to address himself to the subject before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN: I was very much relieved to find that the hon. Gentleman was coming to the clause.

MR. PARNELL continuing, said, he thought that what he had said previously was a fair and proper introduction to what he should have to say now. He said it was most unfortunate that when Irish Members were asking the Committee to agree to the insertion of an Amendment to a Bill of this character, which would allow the Government in Ireland to treat the people as reasonable beings, as people of some self-control, and entitled to some confidence, and not as brute beasts, they had to contend with the crass ignorance of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. They had been very fair in placing these definitions before the Committee. They were put forward for the purpose of inviting expressions of opinion; and although they had not been met specifically, the conduct of the Government had been sufficient to show their hand. He could see no hope for Ireland, and no hope for the Government, or success for their policy of conciliation, so long as Ministers continued to reject every reasonable Amendment which Irish Members asked them to accept in reference to this Bill. He could see nothing but disaster for Ireland and this country, for he conceived the Government were doing the lowest and dirtiest work that had ever been done with regard to Ireland.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member for the City of Cork must believe that the House had a very short memory. He would read a portion of a speech delivered by the hon. Member last year, in which he described the state of Ireland as being totally exceptional, and alien from the condition of any other part of Her Majesty's Dominions. But he now rose and expected the House to treat Ireland as if it were similar in its condition to Yorkshire. That was totally unreasonable, and he would prove it by the hon. Member's own words. On the 3rd June, 1881, the hon. Member said—

MR. BORLASE rose to Order. He asked whether the speech of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was relevant to the debate?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not yet heard the speech.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he trusted that as the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been permitted to conclude his speech, a similar indulgence would be extended to himself, for it was a rule of that House that an hon. Member had a right to answer any speech that had been permitted by the authority of the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had pointed out to the hon. Member for the City of Cork that his speech was rather wide of the Amendment. He trusted the hon. Member for North Warwickshire would speak to the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should certainly speak to the Amendment, and he claimed nothing more than the right of speaking on the topics which the hon. Member for the City of Cork had been permitted to enter upon. He said that when that hon. Member asked the House to extend to Ireland the same principles of government as were involved in the Act of 1875 with respect to disturbances in trade, he should first prove that the condition of Ireland was similar to the condition of Yorkshire. That was, in his opinion, but a reasonable proposition, and he therefore desired to quote the description given by the hon. Member last year of the condition of Ireland. The words of the hon. Member were that—

“There had never yet been open rebellion in Ireland which was taken up by more than a small section of the population. In 1798, only three counties were up, and it taxed all England's resources to put them down. He believed if, at the present moment, any revolutionary party made a determined appeal to the Irish people every county would join in a rebellion against English rule.”—[3 Hansard, col. xii. 96.]

MR. BORLASE said, he rose to make another appeal to the Chairman as to whether this speech was relevant to the question before the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he could not see the slightest relation to the question before the Committee in the speech of the hon. Member.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would not oppose his opinion to that of the Chairman. They had been for a day and a-half debating this clause; and the difference between the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the great body of the Committee was that he claimed that the same principles should be applied to the government of Ireland that were applied in 1875 to the government of Yorkshire. He thought he had read enough of the speech of the hon. Member to show that the condition of Yorkshire during the strike and during the great disturbances there was totally different from the description given by him of the condition of Ireland in June last. At a time like the present, when this important Bill was before the Committee, it was simply absurd to compare the state of Ireland with the state of Yorkshire. Seeing that the Amendments proposed struck at the very principle of the clause, and tended to render it totally inefficient under the circumstances of Ireland to which it was to be applied, he said that the opposition directed against the clause was really opposition to the Bill itself, which, by repeated and enormous majorities, had received the sanction of the House. He would give the Committee, very shortly, the specific which the hon. Member suggested as an alternative to the coercive legislation which he had done so much to render necessary. He (Mr. Newdegate) had adverted before to the speech of Archbishop Croke, and he would now furnish the House with the observations of the hon. Member on that subject. He said—

“The Government would do well to try the advice of Archbishop Croke, and see what would happen if they withdrew their troops and police from Tipperary for a single month; he felt sure that the priests would be responsible for the peace and order of the county, and there would be an entire cessation of outrages.” —[Ibid. 97.]

MR. MACLIVER rose to Order. He appealed to the Chair as to whether it was not time that this remarkable speech should come to an end?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire that he was again travelling beyond the question. He had spoken for some time towards the Amendment, but was now altogether outside it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had endeavoured to speak on this subject within the ordinary rules of debate. He asked hon. Members if they approved the specific of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, because it was clear that the Amendment before the Committee and every Amendment he had proposed were strictly in accordance with the spirit announced by him on the 3rd of June last year. The opposition of the hon. Member was against the Bill itself, and that alone was the meaning of the present Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he thought the condition of demoralization at which the Committee had been reduced did not argue well for the disposal of the remaining clauses of the Bill. The hon. Member for the City of Cork attributed to the Home Secretary a profound degree of ignorance upon the question under discussion, and he went on to speak also of the general attitude of Her Majesty's Government. Now, he did not want to say anything disrespectful of Her Majesty's Ministers; but he was bound to say that the position at which the Committee had arrived, to use the most moderate language, was due to the imbecility of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. HENEAGE asked if it was in Order to use the term imbecility toward any Member of the House?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the expression was not altogether un-Parliamentary.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had used language neither un-Parliamentary nor irrational. What was the position of Her Majesty's Government? They said they were willing to limit and define the clause; nevertheless, they did not bring forward any limitations or definitions, from which it was clear that they had come before the House when their minds were not made up. Ministers were generally absent when these questions came up, and the Home Secretary, in consequence, became master of all he surveyed. But the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was conspicuous not merely by his absence, but still more so by his silence on every part of the Bill whenever a question of importance was being discussed. Now, he put a fair challenge to Her Majesty's Ministers. They said they were in favour of the limitation of this clause, and in favour of having a definition in the clause, but, at the same time, they objected to the words proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. Well, let them produce words of their own, and not keep the Committee any longer in ignorance of their intentions in this matter. He thought it was time for the Prime Minister to take the Bill out of the hands of the Home Secretary, whose incompetency to deal with it had already been abundantly proved, and for the right hon. Gentleman himself, or one of his Colleagues, to come forward and state the Government intentions. If they were to be left to the mercy of the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for the University of Dublin, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Cork had better retire altogether, because it appeared that all the Amendments emanating from Radical and Irish Members had been put forward in vain. Not a single definition had yet been given by the Home Secretary; and, therefore, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government not to take refuge in melancholy silence, but to say whether he would agree to an Amendment necessary for securing the confidence of the people of Ireland.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 247: Majority 211.—(Div. List, No. 118.)

Mr. HEALY proposed, in line 16, to leave out the word "any," and insert the word "such." The hon. Member pointed out that the clause provided "that every person who should, wrongfully or without legal authority, incite any person;" and he proposed to substitute "such" for "any" in that case. Somebody must be intimidated, somebody must make a speech or commit an action; and it seemed to him necessary, for the grammatical sense of the clause, to make that more clear by introducing the word "such."

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 16, leave out "any," and insert "such."
—(Mr. Healy.)

Question, "That the word 'any' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Mr. BRYCE said, he was very sensible of the difficulty which any Member would have in bringing an Amendment before the Committee at that time of the night, especially after such an exhaustive discussion as had taken place; but he would not detain the House long in stating the case for the proposal he had to make. The Committee was now at not only one of the most difficult parts of the Bill, but one of the most knotty points in the whole field of law. It was because he despaired of finding any definition of "intimidation" which had any chance of being accepted by the Committee that he proposed to do without a definition altogether. He did not bring forward his Amendment in the interest of any particular section in the House, and he did not know what view would be taken by Irish Members. He brought it forward in the interest of the Committee itself, which saw before it a long and tedious list of Amendments to the definition in the clause, which must occupy a very considerable length of time. He thought that difficulty would be best met by leaving out the definition, or rather the attempt at a partial definition, proposed by the Government altogether. If they could not untie the knot, they had better cut it. As to the concession made by the Home Secretary to add certain words to the definition, he thought they would make no real difference at all.

It appeared to him that the proposed addition would only express a second time over what was already sufficiently expressed in Sub-sections a and b. He did not understand the Home Secretary to say that any substantial difference would be made by the words he proposed to add; in fact, the legal effect of the clause would be precisely the same. He entirely agreed that everything in the definition was governed by Sub-sections a and b; but even so, the definition went much beyond the natural and ordinary meaning of the word "intimidation." That was illustrated by the fact admitted by the Home Secretary, that he would make unlawful things which were perfectly lawful when done by trades unions. The right hon. and learned Gentleman admitted that these words would make the acts of trades unions unlawful; but he also argued that the Act of 1875 would protect trades unions, and, therefore, it would not apply to such cases. Surely it was very singular that Acts which were admittedly legal when done by trades unions in England should become, under this clause, punishable in Ireland with a penalty of six months' imprisonment when done by others than trade unionists. What cause could be assigned for such favour being given to trades unions, which were not very long ago held to be dangerous associations? Any words would come under this definition which caused fear to any person or injury to his business. Any person who uttered a word, or did any act, which was calculated to put a person in fear of injury to his business, or living, would come within the Act; and it was easy to imagine an immense number of words which might be spoken, or things which might be done, which would put a person in such fear, and therefore come under this clause and yet which would not be, in any fair or natural sense, offences deserving punishment. Not long ago, a proposition was made in this country by a society of philanthropic ladies that customers should not deal with shopkeepers who did not supply counter seats for their assistants. If, however, any lady went into a shop, say, in Dublin, where seats were not provided for the assistants, and, finding that the young women who acted as shop-assistants were suffering from fatigue, declared she would not deal with that shop, because seats were not provided, she would come under this clause. Now, was it desirable to bring under the terms of this Act words which would be far from culpable, and might be dictated by the highest motives, though they undoubtedly threatened an injury to the shopkeeper in his business? Anybody could imagine a large number of similar cases which would come under this clause, but which nobody would think of condemning or desire to punish. It might be said that a reasonable interpretation must be allowed, and that it was not fair to argue upon extreme cases. He admitted that; but if they had such confidence in the magistrates and the Court to which appeal lay, as to hold that they would not press this definition strictly, why should they not be trusted a little further, and left to put a proper meaning on the term "intimidation" without having this elaborate and difficult, yet incomplete definition? He was aware there were objections to that; but it seemed to him that if the Judges were trusted to interpret the word "intimidation" with the partial and unsatisfactory definition in the clause, they might be intrusted to interpret it without any definition. The words in this clause, in fact, carried the word "intimidation" far beyond its natural sense, which meant what put a man in serious terror—such terror as would be too much for a man of firm mind. That, however, was not the meaning which would be attached to the word as defined in this clause. It was here extended to fear which would not necessarily affect a man of firm mind—that was, it was given an extension which the Courts had never yet given it. It was admitted that the principle of the English Act ought to be followed. Section 7 of that Act contained the words—"Any person who uses violence towards or intimidates such other person." The word "intimidates" had been found amply sufficient under that Act, and he did not see why it should not be sufficient under this measure. Why was it necessary to incur a difficulty which might be avoided by omitting the definition? He quite agreed that "Boycotting" must be stopped, and he had given the best proof of his holding that view by voting against the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell). To put down the really pernicious forms of "Boycotting," including the extremest cases of exclusive dealing, they had better proceed by adopting the language of common sense, without any definition at all. No doubt, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) would say that they could not abandon the definition; and any attempt to amend the definition would be, no doubt, resisted by those hon. and learned Gentlemen who represented that a perfectly harmless and, indeed, nominal change proposed by the Home Secretary, some time ago, would involve a serious danger. He might be told that the magistrates were unfit to administer the Bill, and that a definition was, therefore, necessary; but the answer was that there was to be a power of appealing to another Court, by which any wrong done would be corrected. He submitted that the simplest way out of this difficulty would be by abandoning this imperfect definition altogether.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 24, to leave out from the word "Act," to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in this Act the expression 'intimidation'' stand part of the Clause."

DR. COMMINS said, he cordially supported the Amendment, because he believed that this portion of the Bill would do a great deal more harm than good, no matter from what point of view it was regarded. Looking at the Bill as one which was necessary, and which ought to be framed so as to meet the evils it was designed to meet, this clause went a great deal further than was necessary. No warning could be given to people; no active advice could be given of the most innocent kind which would not fall within this definition of "intimidation." "Any word calculated to put any person in fear of injury to his property, or business, or means of living," were the words of the clause. Supposing a person was going out in a boat, and someone else advised him not to do so, because the boat was rotten, that person would come within the four corners of this definition; or, if a man advised another not to go out without an overcoat, because there was likely to be rain, when he might get wet and catch a cold, he would also come within the Act. No word of advice or warning could be given to guard a person from danger, which might not be construed as coming within this definition. There were still worse faults in the clause. Attention had already been called to the fact that the framers of this Bill seemed to delight in "running amuck" against all the most cherished principles of English jurisprudence. One of the most cherished principles of jurisprudence in every civilized country was that no act could be criminal unless the intent with which that act was done was criminal itself. That was one of the oldest maxims; but here was a definition deliberately repealing that, and, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Dublin University (Mr. Plunket) had said, insidiously repealing it. Why was the word "calculated" substituted for "intended?" Because it was intended to make acts criminal where there was no criminal intent. The word "view" was used instead of the word "intent" for the same purpose—namely, to make an act criminal in which there was no criminal intention on the part of the doer. That was such an innovation on the principles of our jurisprudence that he could only characterize as atrocious. It would lay snares for the people, and no person who acted with a philanthropic spirit could escape this Act. This clause was designed to do away with one of the greatest principles of law, which was to protect persons who were guiltless of criminal intent; and it was so wide as to embrace and catch every act of warning and advice, however innocent might be the intention, and however much it might be for the benefit of the parties to whom it was addressed.

[Seventh Night.]

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought the hon. Member might have spared a good deal of his indignation upon the deliberate proposal of the Government, if he had attended to his (Sir William Harcourt's) statement, that the Government intended to omit "intent" for the expressed purpose of providing that the intention of the act should be criminal. With reference to the Amendment now proposed, the Committee had already discussed the question whether or not the definition should be omitted. He quite admitted that if "intimidation" was to be interpreted only by professional men, any exposition of "intimidation" would be superfluous, not because, in his opinion, there was anything in this clause which ought not to be there, but because he believed that to the professional mind the word "intimidation" would convey everything that was in the clause. Therefore, the mere question was, whether or not it was better to have this exposition of "intimidation" or not? He believed that a Judge would find that "intimidation" would contain everything contained in the latter part of the clause; but he was satisfied that this part of the clause could not be dispensed with. First of all, it was not merely constructive, but, as had already been pointed out, there must be some indication given to the people of Ireland as to what responsibility was upon them. The ordinary people of Ireland might not understand, as a Judge would understand, that the word "intimidation" included actions which involved an injury to a man, or a loss of business or means of living. If they did not understand that, they would not understand how the word "intimidation" was intended to strike at "Boycotting;" and he considered the value of this section of the clause was, that it made it clear and intelligible to every man in Ireland that the clause was intended to strike at "Boycotting." That was the whole question, and he did not think it introduced anything not already contained in the word "intimidation," which was useless for public purposes.

MR. LEAMY said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman might, from his point of view, have very good reason for objecting to any Amendment made on that side of the House in favour of limiting the offence of intimidation. The proposition of the hon. Member opposite would enable any intelligent man in Ireland to know what intimidation was, and he (Mr. Leamy) thought it was the duty of Parliament in this matter to so word the clause that the magistrates who had to administer the law would be able to say what was intimidation and what was not. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that this paragraph would be an indication to the people of Ireland of what intimidation was, and that it would explain to them what they must not do. It appeared to him (Mr. Leamy) that if they left that paragraph in, any man in Ireland would see he could hardly do anything or say anything without being brought within the purview of the clause. Suppose one tradesman was in the habit of dealing with another, and he said to him—"If you do not deal with me for bread, I shall not deal with you for grocery; and not only will I cease to deal with you, but I will endeavour to get other men not to deal with you." If a man were to make a remark of that kind, under this Act he would be liable to a charge of intimidation. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) who had just spoken, yesterday evening pointed out that if a number of tradesmen in a town agreed to close their shops and give a holiday to their assistants on a certain occasion, and that one man refused to act as the others did, and a number of his customers went there and said—"If you refuse to give a holiday like the rest, we shall not any longer deal with you." The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket), commenting on that case, said it was an extreme one, and that it was a thing that could hardly occur; that it was an illustration not worth considering. Now, he (Mr. Leamy) wished to put a question. He was perfectly certain that if the Lord Lieutenant were to come to a town in Ireland, and if a number of people agreed to close their shops, and to illuminate their premises in honour of the visit of the Lord Lieutenant, and if a certain number said—"We will not close our shops; we will not illuminate;" and if the others were to go to these shopkeepers who refused to close, and say—"If you do not close and illuminate your premises, we shall not deal with you," he was sure that in such a case the magistrates would not hold a man guilty under this Bill. But, if the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) went down to an Irish town, and a number of shopkeepers were to say—"We shall not close our shops, and we shall not illuminate in honour of Mr. Parnell's visit," and if a number of people said to those men—"If you do not illuminate we shall 'Boycott' you, or, in other words, we shall not deal with you," he was perfectly certain that, as persons using a threat, they would be sent to prison under this Bill. That was the way this Bill would be worked out. From the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own point of view, there was good reason for saying—"I shall accept no definition of intimidation which will tie the hands of the magistrates in dealing with cases of 'Boycotting;'" but that was not the proposition of the hon. Member opposite. The hon. Member opposite was quite willing that a man guilty of intimidation should be sent to gaol; but what he wanted was that words so vague and of so extravagant a character should not be put in the clause, which would prohibit mere criticism upon any man's conduct in Ireland. That was the reason why he (Mr. Leamy) supported the Amendment. He felt perfectly convinced and satisfied that they were giving the magistrates a power they ought not to have. In his opinion, it was proposed to give them too large a discretion; and he thought that by accepting this Amendment they would certainly enable magistrates to deal with all cases of "Boycotting."

Mr. PUGH said, one could not but feel that the clause, as it stood at present, was too wide. He was not going to discuss the question of what the precise meaning of intimidation might be; but he agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that it was desirable, having regard to the want of knowledge on the part of the people of Ireland on the subject, and having regard to the possible lack of professional learning on the part of those who had to administer the law—it was desirable to lay down some rules for guidance in this matter. If that was so, it appeared to him that the rules should be as correct as they could frame them. They ought not to be so wide as to include as offences things which no one in his senses would consider offences. Many illustrations were put to the Committee on this subject, and he would venture to put one more, which he thought would come home to hon. Members. He would ask the Committee, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself would have been safe, supposing that at the time of the last General Election a law of this kind had been in force in England? They all read the many eloquent speeches made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman at that time, and he (Mr. Pugh) had not the slightest hesitation in saying that a great number of electors were restrained from voting for the Conservative candidates, because they believed the speeches of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and because they felt that if they did vote for Conservative candidates, they would not only risk their own means of living, but the prosperity of the country. He did not think that there was any doubt that a great many people voted for the Liberal Party owing to such a fear on their part. They felt that if they returned Conservatives to this House the prosperity of the country would be imperilled, and thereby their own means of living would be imperilled. He would not discuss whether that was the right view or not; but he had no doubt that was the reason why many people at that time voted for the Liberal candidates. Now, under the clause of this Bill, as it stood, if it applied to England, anyone who used arguments of that kind would be guilty of intimidation. The words were so very wide that any word, or any gesture, or any act, would be sufficient to cause the imprisonment of a man. He did not think that that was right; but, at the same time, he could not vote for the Amendment, because he agreed with what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had said—namely, that it was desirable that some guide should be laid down. What he would venture to suggest was this—to leave out the words “word spoken or act done,” and insert the words—“Conduct which, having due regard to the circumstances of the case, shall be deemed to have been intimidation, and.”

So that the clause would read—

“Calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself,” &c.

His reason for that suggestion was, that he wished, if possible, to point out to the magistrates in Ireland that no isolated word, and no isolated act, would be sufficient to bring men within this section; that they must have regard to his conduct or to the circumstances under which he spoke or acted. The word conduct was a word with which they were all familiar. They continually heard of riotous conduct and disorderly conduct, and it was by conduct that men must be judged. He thought they might fairly make a man's conduct the test of whether he was to be found guilty or not. Under these circumstances, he should have to vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member; but he trusted that his suggestion, or some other suggestion, would find favour with the Government, so as to limit the very wide application of this clause as it at present stood.

MR. SYNAN said, that the word “includes” would enable a magistrate to go outside the definition of the clause altogether, and say that intimidation might comprehend other matters than those mentioned in the definition. Then the definition included innocent things, except so far as they were qualified by the words proposed to be inserted by the Government, making it the “intent” to put a person in fear; and in consenting to the insertion of these words they were admitting the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Sussex. He confessed he was rather inclined to vote for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce). He thought it would make the case stronger for the accused, and it would give less power to the magistrates to go outside the terms “wrongfully and without legal authority.”

MR. BRYCE said, before they divided, he trusted the Committee would allow him to say one word in explanation. He accepted, with pleasure, the remarks of the Home Secretary, but must repeat that his object in desiring to strike out the words at the end of the clause was that he firmly believed they would be misunderstood, and used in a manner which the Government did not intend.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he confessed he was not present when the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken moved his Amendment, and when the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was informing the Committee as to the sense in which this portion of the clause would be understood in Ireland. He was extremely sorry that he and a large number of Irish Members were not present when the right hon. and learned Gentleman was giving that very valuable information, because, in his opinion, there would be nothing more interesting than to hear from the Home Secretary how the words would be understood in Ireland. As an Irish Representative, he believed that these five lines would be exactly understood in the same sense as if that part of the clause ended at the word “done;” and if in that Act, the expression “intimidation” included any word spoken or act done. All the rest of the clause might be left out, because any word spoken or act done might, at the whim of a magistrate, be held to be intimidation. If the Home Secretary thought that the clause would be taken in any other sense, he was quite mistaken; and the only effect of passing the clause, which would literally forbid every expression of free sentiment and every expression of opinion with regard to the conduct of any man, no matter how vile that conduct might be—the only effect of this clause would be to make “Boycotting” a natural virtue in Ireland. If this clause became law he would not give much for the popularity of any man who was not a pronounced and conscientious “Boycotter.”

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he did not think that anyone could accuse the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets of a desire to exclude from the operation of the clause the offence of “Boycotting.” They had the statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary and of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General that even without this definition the word intimidation itself would cover everything that was intended; and if he (Mr. Horace Davey) might express an opinion, he should say that it would cover everything which was intended to be included in the definition. His hon. Friend who had proposed this Amendment did carry a certain number of hon. Members on that side of the House with him when he said that the definition was apt to be misunderstood, and that it was apt to have a larger interpretation given to it than was intended by the Government. The magistrates or the Judges who would have to administer the Act must be credited with judicial discretion and with common sense, and, that being so, they must be trusted to interpret this Act in a rational way. That being so, it occurred to him that if an Act were placed in their hands which told them that if any person, wrongfully and without legal authority, used intimidation against certain persons, and committed an offence under that Act, he could not suppose for a moment that they would not include the offence of “Boycotting” under the term intimidation. Undoubtedly, there was an extreme difficulty in arriving at a definition which was satisfactory from every point of view to include the offence of “Boycotting,” and to exclude which everybody, so far as he understood the feeling of the Committee, wished to be included. He confessed that, after much consideration, he must vote for the Amendment, not because he disagreed with the definition as the Committee understood it, but because he thought that the terms of the definition would be misunderstood by the country, and because the definition would go beyond what was intended by the Government, and, at the same time, was not necessary for the purposes of the clause. If he understood hon. Members opposite, they were also of opinion that the word intimidation itself would, in fact, give a stronger and wider authority to the magistrates than if the definition remained as at present. He was not of that opinion, but he thought it would give a discretion to the magistrates to say in any case what was intimidation.

MR. O'KELLY said, that, in view of the lateness of the hour, he begged to move that the Chairman do now report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. This was one of the most important clauses of the Bill, so far as the Irish Members were concerned, and he did not think that the Committee had full opportunity of discussing it in all its bearings at the present time. The Irish Representatives had devoted much time to the work of the Committee, and he thought that they had now arrived at such a time when the Government ought to assent to the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.” — (Mr. O'Kelly.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Amendment before the Committee at the present moment was not whether the definition should be adopted by the Committee in the terms which it was framed; but it was whether there should be any definition, and for that purpose the Question put from the Chair only embraced the adoption of the very first word of the subsection. Now, he did not submit that the question whether there should be a definition or not had been sufficiently discussed. It had been considered essential to a very great extent during the evening, and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, who had introduced the subject in a clear manner to the Committee, had fully stated his views, and was perfectly prepared to divide upon the subject. He (Mr. Gladstone) was very anxious that the Committee should have the fullest opportunity of considering the terms of the definition; but as to whether there should be one or not, he thought the Committee were quite determined. He hoped they would be permitted to go to a division now, and after that they would immediately consent to report Progress.

[Seventh Night.]

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets did explain his views in the most clear and lucid manner; but he addressed them to a Committee one-third of which was asleep. ["No, no!"] Well, it might be one-fifth of the Committee; but, at any rate, there was a considerable proportion of hon. Members present at the time who were either asleep or not paying the slightest attention to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member. ["No, no!"] Well, that was a matter of opinion, and those were the observations he had to make with regard to the matter. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury dealt rather unfairly with the Committee. The question before the Committee was whether or not they should really define this clause in the Bill. If they accepted two words of the clause, they pledged themselves partly to the clause, and he and his hon. Friends wished to get rid of the clause altogether. It was very unreasonable on the part of the Prime Minister, and still more unreasonable on the part of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, to ask them to divide on so important a question at this early stage of the discussion. He hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. O'Kelly) would press his Motion to report Progress to a division.

MR. BRYCE said, he ventured to make a strong appeal to the hon. Member who moved to report Progress, to allow the Committee to divide now. He submitted to hon. Members opposite that if they wished to have any Amendments moved from the Liberal side of the House, which they might desire to support, they certainly offered no encouragement to Liberal Members to move them. They would make it very difficult for English Members to propose Amendments of any kind if their Amendments were found to be laid hold of for protracting discussion to an inordinate length. He (Mr. Bryce) was satisfied with the discussion on his Amendments, and he did not think that much more now remained to be said in the matter. He was satisfied with the attention his own remarks had received, and he did very earnestly appeal to the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) to allow the Committee to come to a division at the present moment.

DR. OOMMINS said, that there were two Amendments, one in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), and the other in the name of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), proposing to do exactly the same thing as the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets; so that, to say the least of it, it was hardly complimentary for the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) to say that all had been said on the subject that could be said. He believed that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk would be able to add a good deal to what had been said on the subject, and he also believed that the hon. Member for Wexford would be able to address many very pertinent observations to the Committee. He certainly thought his hon. Friend was justified in moving at this hour to report Progress.

MR. REDMOND said, he trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bryce) would not proceed to a division, and his reason for saying that was that this Amendment, although it might have been discussed sufficiently to satisfy the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, it had not been discussed sufficiently to satisfy the hon. Members who were mostly interested, and who sat with him (Mr. Redmond) on those Benches. He should be very sorry that any action taken by Irish Members should have the effect of preventing hon. Members such as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets from taking part in the discussion of this Bill, and from endeavouring to mitigate its severity as much as possible; but it was impossible to forget that the efforts of such men as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets to mitigate the severity of this Bill met with not one particle more of success than the efforts of hon. Members from Ireland. He and his hon. Friends welcomed any efforts to mitigate the severities of the Bill; but he confessed that when these efforts were made and uniformly rejected by the Committee, appeals like that made by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets could not have very much weight with them. The Amendment raised the whole important question of the definition of intimidation, and he did not think they would be justified in allowing it to be discussed to-night. For these reasons, he sincerely trusted his hon. Friend beside him (Mr. O'Kelly) would proceed to a division on his Motion to report Progress.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he would venture to remark that, although this Amendment had been discussed sufficiently to satisfy the section of English Liberals who hoped to obtain the votes of the Irish electors in their constituencies—

MR. BULWER rose to Order. He wished to ask whether the hon. Member was in Order in imputing such motives to hon. Members?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think it is not a proper thing to impute such motives to hon. Members in the discharge of their duties in this House.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that he was referring to the class of intimidation going on between Representatives and represented. He was simply referring to the desire of hon. Members to consolidate the votes of their constituents, and that was precisely one of the motives which influenced every Member of the House. With regard to the discussion of the clause, he was sorry to say a very large proportion of it was passed in the Committee when there were comparatively few persons present; and, considering the enormous importance of the question involved—an importance which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would be ready to conceive in Bulgaria or in Egypt, he thought there ought not to be any attempt to hurry the discussion upon a matter changing the whole social and political condition of Ireland. He had no doubt a short discussion conducted under more favourable circumstances would conclude the debate on this particular clause. He was certain, for his own part, that the passing of this clause would complete the disrepute into which the British connection had fallen in Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 183: Majority 159.—(Div. List, No. 119.)

Original Question again proposed.

MR. PARNELL said, he now moved that the Chairman do leave the Chair. On an important Amendment of this character, which the Government, through the mouth of the Attorney General for England, practically agreed to—or, at any rate, according to the opinion of everyone on that (the Opposition) side of the House below the Gangway—but upon which, owing to directions received from the Front Opposition Bench, they had been obliged to change their action, the Committee, he considered, required more time for consideration. The sense of the Committee ought not to be taken upon the Amendment until there had been ample opportunity afforded for discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not think it would be much use to prolong the contest. He regretted that such a disregard for the feelings of the large majority of the Committee—as shown by the division they had just taken—was shown by hon. Members opposite; but if they were determined to persist in the line they were adopting, if the Motion that the Chairman do leave the Chair were withdrawn, he would not resist the Motion for reporting Progress.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

CORN RETURNS (No. 2) BILL.—[BILL 193.]

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. John Holms.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that though the hour was very late (1.5 A.M.), he proposed to ask the House to read the Bill a second time, because he understood it to be the wish of hon. Members on both sides of the House who were interested in the subject that the preliminary stages should be taken with as little delay as possible, so that they could go into Committee on the measure and have the details—upon which there was likely to be some difference of opinion—discussed. He would not trouble the House with any lengthened remarks, but would state, in as few words as possible, the object of the Bill. There had been some considerable agitation with regard to the settlement of tithe-rent charges, it having, in the first place, been objected, on behalf of the agriculturists, that the great settlement of 1836 was not a fair and satisfactory one, and ought to be amended. He had to point out that this was not a Bill to do any such thing as that. Any attempt to alter the Act of 1836 would be a serious matter, and could not be undertaken in a measure of this kind, or at this period of the Session. The Bill, therefore, would leave untouched the settlement of 1836; but it would deal with another objection of agriculturists, which was that the machinery for carrying out the Act of 1836, and by which corn averages were determined, was incorrect, and required to be amended. That objection he considered well founded, and the scope of the Bill was directed to its removal. The two principal clauses of the Bill were these. In the first place, there was one dealing with the towns where returns had to be made. The old Act fixed certain towns by name where these returns should be made; but, in the natural course of events, it had happened that towns that at one period were undoubtedly great market towns were now of no importance in that respect; and it, therefore, appeared desirable that the Board of Trade should have power to change the towns from time to time, and, if necessary, increase their number. The other provision was for converting corn sold by weight into corn sold by bushel. At the present time, there was a great deal of variation in the weighing of corn, and it was said that the system did not give a fair result. The Bill proposed that there should be a fixed scale of conversion; but the Government were not pledged to the scale, which had been settled after a conference with the parties interested in the matter. If it should turn out that it was unjust either way they would not insist on it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

Mr. Chamberlain

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the Bill, because, as the right hon. Gentleman had very truly said, there was practically no difference of opinion between the two sides of the House as to its principle—that was to say, it was agreed that it was desirable that the proposed reform should be carried out. The Bill did not propose to raise the whole question of the tithe-rent charge settlement, and he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had expressed a decided opinion against any such disturbance, as that settlement had been arrived at after great and careful consideration, and should not be disturbed. The right hon. Gentleman had said the object of the Bill was rather to re-adjust the machinery by which the tithe-rent charge was collected; and if in any way by this Bill that machinery could be improved, and if any grievances which were alleged to exist could be rectified, he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) was sure the right hon. Gentleman would find hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House quite ready to co-operate with him in removing those grievances. He only rose on this occasion to make a suggestion which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not object to. This Bill, or a similar Bill to this, was brought in during last Session of Parliament, and for a long time remained on the Paper and could not be brought forward, owing to a blocking Notice placed on the Paper with regard to it. He (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had a Notice down to refer it to a Select Committee after the second reading, because it had seemed to him that the matters it dealt with were technical, and somewhat of detail, which could be better discussed upstairs. The present Bill, he thought, was one which, if referred to a Select Committee, might be disposed of in a very few Sittings; and he could not, therefore, help hoping that the right hon. Gentleman would accede to his proposal to refer it to a Select Committee. He did not think that such a course would delay the measure. On the contrary, he believed it would tend very much to its expedition. He would, therefore, now give Notice that, after the second reading, and on the Order for going into Committee, he would move that the Order be discharged, and the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

COLONEL BARNE said, he also had a Bill on this subject, and he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, if he acceded to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to refer his own Bill to a Select Committee, he would object to also including his (Colonel Barne's) measure in the reference? He might point out that the right hon. Gentleman's Bill did not go far enough, and would not satisfy the taxpayers. The right hon. Gentleman must know that his (Colonel Barne's) Bill was greatly preferred to his own by Chambers of Commerce throughout the country. ["No!"] Well, they had reported—or a great majority of them had reported—in favour of his Bill, and against that of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought he was correct in stating that the majority of the Chambers had reported in favour of his Bill. At all events, the Central Chamber of Agriculture in London had recommended that both Bills should be referred to a Select Committee. He would not now go into the objections he entertained to the shortcomings of the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. The hour was very late, and he would, therefore, do no more than urge the right hon. Gentleman to refer his (Colonel Barne's) Bill as well as his own to a Select Committee.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH said, that, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman behind him (Colonel Barne) very truly said, his Bill had some elements of popularity in it that could not be found in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. At the same time, it contained a great deal of difficult and technical matter, and he should be sorry to see a chance of the passing of a much-needed reform prejudiced by their being required to enter upon large and deep considerations affecting tithe-rent charges. He was anxious that something should be done, and that speedily; and he believed the only chance of their having anything done was by enabling the Government to pass this Bill. After that, if anything could be done in the direction of the hon. and gallant Member's Bill, he (Mr. Solater-Booth) should be very glad to take part in a discussion with that view. He should have no objection to the measure being referred to a Select Committee, if the right hon. Gentleman thought it right so to refer it; but he would not advocate such a course, as he considered that any Bill, to have a chance of passing this Session, should be in the hands of the Government.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, that the two Bills were based on entirely different principles; therefore, he thought it would be impossible to refer them to the same Select Committee. Though the right hon. Gentleman had said that his measure did not affect the great settlement of tithe-rent charge arrived at in 1836, it dealt, however, with an important section of the Act. The bushel upon which the corn returns were based was a measure of capacity; the present Bill defined that measure by a certain weight. If, instead of 62 lbs. to the bushel, 60 lbs. were the weight required, it would make a difference of about £5 per cent to the owners of tithe-rent charge. The true difficulty was to ascertain what was the usual weight which went to the bushel in the calculations of 1836. He was informed, on credible authority, that the weights defined in this Bill would, in fact, reduce tithe-rent charge £5 per cent. If this were the case, £200,000 would be taken from the pockets of the tithe-owners, and placed in the pockets of the landowners. ["Divide!"] Hon. Gentlemen were impatient; but it was important that the persons interested in this matter should know the point which, above all others, affected them.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that all he could say was that, if it appeared to be the general sense of the House that the measure should be referred to a Select Committee, he would not offer opposition to the reference. At the same time, it should be pointed out that the end of the Session was approaching, and that the Bill could hardly be sent to a Select Committee without raising the great tithe question that he was anxious to avoid raising at this period of the Session. The Bill of the hon. and gallant Member would, undoubtedly, raise the question of the settlement of 1836 in a definite way. His (Mr. Chamberlain's) position was this. As far as he was concerned, he should recommend the House not to refer the measure to a Select Committee; but, if there was a general desire that that reference should take place on the part of the Government he would not offer opposition.

MR. DUCKHAM said, as Vice Chairman of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, he had never heard any preference expressed for the Bill of the hon. and gallant Member opposite; on the contrary, when the subject was before that body, the general feeling was certainly strongly in favour of the Bill now before the House.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he should move, on Monday next, that the Speaker leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Monday next, resolve itself into the Committee on the Bill."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(Mr. John Talbot.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill committed for Monday next.

MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY

BILL.—[Lords.].—[BILL 191.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he regretted the necessity of asking the House to read this Bill a second time at so late an hour (1.35 A.M.). But he apprehended that the Motion he was about to make would not meet with any opposition on the part of hon. Members, inasmuch as the Bill was nearly identical with that which, two years ago, was settled by a Select Committee, and subsequently received the sanction of Lord Cairns. Having regard to that, and to the fact that the principle of the Bill had been over and over again discussed in that House, he trusted hon. Members would agree to the second reading, in which case they might be assured that the Committee stage of the measure would not be taken except at a time when its clauses could be fully considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Osborne Morgan.)

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he hoped the Bill would not then be pressed to a second reading. He need hardly say that it was a measure of enormous importance, and one which might be said to alter the state of every one of Her Majesty's subjects. Moreover, the Bill had only been circulated yesterday morning, and neither he nor several of his hon. Friends had any idea that it would come on at so short a Notice, and that they would be asked to give it a second reading at once. It was said that the Bill was identical with one which had been prepared by a Select Committee; but he must point out that the Bill so prepared had never been before the House. He felt bound to say that it would be almost indecent to pass the Bill through the important stage of second reading at that hour of the morning (1.40); and, in order to give further time for its consideration, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Duckham

MR. RICHARD POWER said, he did not often agree with the views of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy; but on the present occasion he felt it his duty to second the Motion just made. It was impossible to overrate the importance of the changes proposed in some of the clauses of this Bill. For instance, in Clause 14, he found that a husband was to be liable for the debts and wrongs of his wife contracted and committed before marriage—a provision that did not commend itself to his judgment, inasmuch as he thought it was quite sufficient for a man to be liable for those which arose after marriage. Clause 17 was also objectionable, for it provided that all questions between husband and wife were to be decided in a summary way. Again, with regard to Clause 22, which was to enact that a married woman should be liable, through the parish, for the maintenance of her husband, he had to remark that, bad as the existing law was, this was worse. Then Clause 23 provided that a married woman was to be liable, through the parish, for the maintenance of her children. This was worse again. Considering the lateness of the hour, and the bad law which the right hon. and learned Gentleman sought to introduce, he should support the Motion for the adjournment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN pointed out that the clauses which had been referred to did little more than declare the existing law.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

MOTIONS.

POLICE BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

Mr. HIBBERT said, in rising to move the introduction of the Bill standing in his name, he felt it his duty, even at that late hour, to offer a few words of explanation to the House. He was afraid this was unavoidable, for the Bill had been for a very long time under consideration, and often deferred. The measure, which dealt with great interests, he might say, had resulted from the Committee appointed by his right hon. Friend opposite, in 1877. It was very much owing to the interest which the Report of that Committee had created that Her Majesty's Government now found themselves enabled to lay a measure dealing with the question of Police Superannuation upon the Table of the House. The Committee, in their Report, went very fully into the subject, and he might point out to his right hon. Friend opposite that the recommendations in that Report, which were embodied in the Bill, were seven in number, all of them constituting very important amendments of the law, and certainly adding, as they would do, very much to the advantages now enjoyed by the police of the country. In the first place, he might say that the greatest dissatisfaction existed with respect to the uncertainty of the claim for pensions to police constables. Under the present law, a constable who entered the Service at 21 years of age was not enabled to obtain his pension before he reached the age of 60, unless he obtained a certificate of incapacity in mind or body from the Chief Constable of the Force. That was felt to be a very serious hardship by the Constabulary. The Committee, after considering this question, recommended that there should be a certain number of years during which the police constable should serve, and at the end of that time that he should be able to claim his pension as a right. They recommended the term of 25 years, and the Government had adopted it in the Bill, so that for the future every police constable who served for 25 years in the force would be enabled to claim his pension. Then an important alteration was proposed in the direction of giving pensions to widows. Under the present law, the widow of a police constable was only allowed to receive a gratuity even if her husband were killed in the execution of his duty, and might himself have been entitled to a pension. The Government had adopted the recommendation of the Committee, and it was proposed that instead of giving a gratuity, the widow should be entitled to claim a pension according to the scale which would be found in the Bill. Moreover, the Government also proposed to make an allowance for each child up to the age of 15. The Committee had also considered the great difficulty and great abuses which existed under the system of certificates; and Her Majesty's Government proposed that in future all these certificates would be required to bear the name of a competent medical man, in addition to that of the Chief Constable of the Force in which the constable served. The next point he wished to allude to was that of length of service. According to the present law, a constable could not count past service upon entering a new force unless he had passed seven years in the first force in which he served. Now, Her Majesty's Government proposed, if a constable changed his force, with the consent of the Chief Constable of that Force, that he should be entitled to claim the whole period passed in the first force. Police constables would, therefore, be placed in a better position in this respect also. There was one point in which they had not carried out the recommendation of the Committee, and that had relation to the Superannuation Fund. The Committee recommended that pensions should be a direct charge on the rates, and that the Superannuation Fund should be transferred to the police funds in counties, and the borough rates in boroughs. But owing to the great alteration which had taken place during the last seven years with regard to the solvency of the fund, and the large amount of money paid to the fund, the Government had decided that it would be fairer to the ratepayers and the Constabulary that the fund should be continued. He might observe that the fund had increased in amount since 1874, when this question was considered, from a total capital of £865,000 to a capital of £1,145,000—the increment being £279,000. Now, in order to strengthen this fund, the Government proposed to grant additional fees in aid of it. Under the present Licensing Act only one-half of the fines in connection with licences were paid over to the Superannuation Fund; but it was now proposed that the whole of those fines should be paid over. Again, the fund was to have the benefit of all fines for assaults on constables, which had been hitherto paid over to the county and borough rates, and, amongst other items, hawkers' and chimney-sweepers' licence fees were also to be paid to the fund. In addition, there would be paid over to the fund the fees for serving writs and summonses in counties. In the case of boroughs these had always been paid over; but it was now the intention of the Government to place the counties and boroughs, so far as this matter was concerned, on the same footing. They trusted, with all these additional means of strength, that before many years were over all the pension funds would be found in a solvent state. In the majority of cases the funds were so solvent, although in some places they were not; and in the case of the Metropolis the whole of the fund had gone. But upon the principle they proposed to adopt of investing 2½ per cent of the pay every year, it was expected that this question of pensions would be adjusted more to the satisfaction of the ratepayers than by making the pensions a direct charge upon the rates. He asked the House, in considering this Bill, to look upon it as affecting the interests of a body of men who were well worthy of their consideration, inasmuch as they were indebted to them so much for their comfort and safety every day of their lives. On those grounds he trusted that the splendid body of men composing the Constabulary Force in England would find that Parliament, in considering their claims and grievances, was willing to make such changes in the law as would make their future condition much more satisfactory than it was at present. He was unable, from want of more complete information, to speak with regard to Scotland; but in the case of England a system of pensions had been in existence for 40 years. In Scotland he believed the system to be entirely new, and it would be for Scotch Members to consider whether they would support the proposals of the Government. For the reasons he had given, he asked the House to consent to the introduction of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision respecting the pensions, allowances, and gratuities of Police Constables in Great Britain and their widows and children; and to make other provisions respecting the Police of Great Britain."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he must express his gratification that Her Majesty's Government should have taken up this subject, which had long been deferred; and he trusted to find in the provisions of the measure sketched out by the hon. Gentleman opposite that the claims of the police were fairly dealt with.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that having been in communication with various members of the Police Force, and being alive to the great interest taken by the Force in the question of superannuation, he ventured to promise the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill the thanks of that body for the introduction of measures calculated to improve the position of the Force with regard to superannuation. There might be some matters of difference still remaining; but the men would now feel that the point for which they had been struggling for years—the indefeasible right of every constable to a fixed pension—had been acknowledged. For his own part, he trusted Her Majesty's Government would take the earliest opportunities of pressing the Bill forward in order that it might pass into law this Session.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. HIBBERT, Secretary Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, and The LORD ADVOCATE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 197.]

Mr. Hibbert

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JAMES STEWART, Bill to amend the Law of Scotland in relation to Trusts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JAMES STEWART, Mr. MACKINTOSH, and Mr. CRUM.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 198.]

CONVEYANCING AND SETTLED LAND BILLS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Conveyancing and Settled Land Bills do consist of Twenty-one Members:—The Committee was accordingly nominated of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Sir RICHARD CROSS, The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, Sir GABRIEL GOLDNEY, Mr. DAVEY, Mr. MACNAGHTEN, Mr. HINDE PALMER, Mr. GREGORY, Mr. WILLIAM FOWLER, Sir HARDINGE GIFFARD, Mr. HENRY H. FOWLER, Mr. LEWIS FRAY, Mr. BRODRICK, Mr. PATRICK MARTIN, Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE, Sir HENRY SELWYN-IBBETSON, Mr. COMPTON LAWRENCE, Mr. WHITLEY, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. MELDON, and Dr. COMMINS:—With power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

House adjourned at Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 9th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Judgments (Inferior Courts) * (110); Tramways Provisional Orders * (125); Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 2) * (126).

Committee—Report—Arklow Harbour * (98).

CRIME AND OUTRAGE (IRELAND)—MURDER OF MR. W. BOURKE AND ESCORT—THREE FARMERS SHOT AND MAIMED.—QUESTIONS.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE: My Lords, I do not see the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal in his place; but as some alarming accounts have recently come from my unhappy country, I wished to ask the Government, Whether they can give your Lordships some further information of the outrages which have taken place? It is reported that there have been two murders, of Mr. Bourke and a soldier who was protecting him, at Castle Taylor, Grand Gate, Ardrahan, Galway County; and three farmers have been shot in the legs—Michael Brown, at Rathglass, six miles from Ballina; Henry East, at Ballafarna, Roscommon County; and Cornelius Hickey, of Castleisland; thus, no less than five persons have been shot, and two of them are reported to be dead. I wish to ask the Government, Whether they have any further information to give to the House; whether any arrests have been made; and, whether the Government attribute, or whether they think there is any relation between these murders and outrages and the Whitsuntide addresses of their hon. Friends, both out-of-doors and in "another place?"

EARL GRANVILLE: I came into the House with my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal, and I thought he was here; but he told me he had only just received Notice of the Question from the noble Lord, and that he had communicated with the Irish Office, but had not yet received any details.

Afterwards—

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE: Perhaps the noble Lord will now answer the Questions which I, a short time ago, put to the Government.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL): I am sorry I was not in my place at the time; but as I received the information only at the last moment, I had sent to the Irish Office to see whether any further details had arrived. I am sorry to say I can give your Lordships no, or little, further information with respect to these dreadful crimes in Ireland. It appears that Mr. Bourke and his escort, a soldier, were fired at from behind a wall, which was loop-holed for the purpose. This is the only news in addition to what has appeared in the papers. Death is believed to have been instantaneous in each case. It seems that three arrests have been made in respect to the murders of Mr. Bourke and his escort. The three other cases to which the noble Lord has referred are additional, and they are cases of maiming by firing at the legs, apparently for the purpose of maiming as distinguished from killing the victims. In one of these cases arrests have been made, but none in the other two at this moment.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET AT ALEXANDRIA.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have not been able to give him Notice, as I have only just been informed of the circumstances. It is rumoured in London that the Fleet, or a large portion of it, has been withdrawn from Alexandria. If it has, or if it has not, it would be well, I think, that the fact should be published; and I shall be glad if the noble Earl will state whether it is so or not?

EARL GRANVILLE: As a matter of fact, I am entirely in ignorance that any portion of the Fleet has been removed. Indeed, I am quite sure that it is not the case.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, that those of their Lordships who were acquainted with Ireland, especially those of them who had seen the state of things on the spot within the last few months, he might say the last two years, must know how responsible were the duties cast upon the Royal Irish Constabulary. From the time the present Government succeeded to Office, the life of the members of the Force had been one long round of duties of the most disagreeable and delicate character. They had to patrol by night, and were liable to be called upon to march long distances into every part of the country, and, in fact, had to perform some of the most unpleasant duties that could possibly fall to the lot of any body of men. By common consent those duties had been discharged with rare fidelity and forbearance. The present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Earl Spencer), in reply to a Question put to him last year, took occasion to refer, in terms of the highest encomium, to the manner in which the duties of the Constabulary had been discharged. He could tell their Lordships that the duties—the exceptional duties—which had been imposed upon the Force had not only been conducive to a great strain upon the physical qualities of the men, but had also interfered in a very serious manner with them, and entailed upon them very serious pecuniary loss. Both officers and men had been despatched on various occasions long distances from their homes, and to places in which, from the peculiar character of the service in which they were employed, it was extremely difficult for them to obtain provisions except at fabulous prices. In consequence of this in the early part of the Session some efforts were made to acknowledge the extra services which had been rendered by the Force, and to place them in a somewhat better position in more than one particular. He remembered hearing the question put to one of the County Inspectors—when a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary was on duty? The reply was very much to the point—“Sir, a member of the Royal Irish Constabulary is never off duty. He is liable to be called on at a moment’s notice to go in any direction, and to remain there any length of time.” When the Budget was introduced a Vote was included to compensate the Constabulary for the extra services they had rendered, and the extra expense to which the men had been put. That, probably, was not a subject which fell within the jurisdiction of their Lordships’ House; but, on a Question being put, the official answer given was that the whole of that sum was to be distributed amongst the men, and that none of it was to go to the officers of the Force. Upon its being asked what was going to be done for the officers, the reply—which he could not help thinking was a very unsatisfactory reply—was that a Bill, at some uncertain date, was to be brought in dealing with the whole subject. He wanted to know definitely when that Bill was to be introduced, and he also wanted to know what would be the general provisions of the Bill? So far as the men were concerned, he believed they were content with what would be a substantial remuneration for their services; but he hoped that in any measure which might be introduced the provisions of the Act of 1866, which now regulated the constitution of the Force, would be amended so far as to restore the old privileges with regard to pensions. The Act of 1866 cut down very materially the pensions allowed to retiring members of the Force. He could not help thinking that it was exceedingly improper that men in the Service who received any injury in the discharge of their duty should not have a pension which would enable them to live in respectability and comfort, without having to appeal to the charity of the public; and he hoped if any Bill was introduced this matter would not be lost sight of. But what he especially wished to ask was what it was proposed to do for the officers of the Force, and, if it were impossible to make a statement on the subject at present, when they were to know what would be done? The officers of the Force were left in a very bad position. They had shared to the full all the labour which had fallen to the lot of their men, while there was attached to them a peculiar amount of responsibility, the strain caused by which could be properly judged of only by those who had seen what the duties were which they were called upon to perform. If a hasty act was committed, or the slightest want of judgment shown, and anything serious followed, the coroners' juries, in three out of the four Provinces of Ireland, were certain to find a verdict of murder against them. They had been told officially they had no claim to any part of the remuneration to be awarded by Parliament to the Force. He asked, therefore, what the officers were to have? He supposed he might be told that they were to rely upon promotion, and that brought him to the second part of his Question, what chance was there of promotion? He wished to know whether it was necessary that the highest appointments in the Royal Irish Constabulary should always be given to distinguished military officers? He had ascertained the number of Inspectors General who had been appointed to the Royal Irish Constabulary since the year 1856. The number was seven, and only one of those, Sir Henry Brownrigg, was appointed from the Force. Coming lower down, the number of Deputy Inspectors appointed was 12, and of those only one was appointed from the Force. In the grade immediately below that a very large proportion—more than a moiety—of military men had been appointed to those positions. It was also rumoured that the next vacancy, which could not be long before it occurred, in the command of the Constabulary Depot at Phoenix Park, was to be filled by a military man. One of the great complaints with regard to the Irish Constabulary was that its military organization rendered it extremely ill-adapted for the detection of crime. He did not himself bring forward any such charge against the military officers; but it was a charge which was frequently made by strong supporters of Her Majesty's Government, and also by those journals which took Her Majesty's Government under their especial protection. He wanted to know how it was possible that the Force could be otherwise than military in its character, if it was necessarily officered by distinguished men taken from the ranks of the Army? It was hard to complain of their not detecting crime, if they were not trained up to that duty, but to duties entirely dissimilar. He never yet heard, with regard to Sir Henry Brownrigg, that any complaints of want of discipline or any other matter had been made; and he ventured to think that the experiment might be tried of appointing men from the Force with great benefit to the country, and certainly with great encouragement to members of the Force itself. In another department also, that of the Resident Magistracy, the officers of the Constabulary might do valuable service. Within the last two years one gentleman, Mr. Henry Blake, had been appointed a Resident Magistrate; that gentleman had been selected for special service, and from the way he was spoken of he did not think the experiment had been repented of. He had no doubt that at the present time there were plenty of men who would be willing to accept Sub-Inspectorships, which seemed to be a small fortune to a man who had nothing. But a young man of 18 or 20 years of age did not, as a rule, look forward to making provision for himself when he became a married man; and it was only when he married and found what little chance he had of promotion that he found how inadequate his pay was to meet the expense of a wife and family. Then a man began to feel a very bitter sense of disappointment, which militated very seriously against the real efficiency of the Force. Severe as the duties of the members of the Royal Irish Constabulary were, he did not think that the events of the last few days—he might say the events of the last few hours—gave any hope that their duties were likely to be lighter; and when the peace of Ireland depended upon the courage and conduct of these men, it would not be wise to stint them in regard to remuneration or prospects of promotion. He trusted that that would not be the course which would be adopted by Her Majesty's Government, and that he should not be told that the Government believed such a course to be unjust as well as impolitic. He begged to ask, When the Bill dealing with the position of officers in the Royal Irish Constabulary is to be introduced; and whether it is intended that the highest commands in that Force are to be invariably held by military men?

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL): I will answer first the last Question of the noble Viscount—namely, with respect to the higher offices of the Royal Irish Constabulary Force. It appears by the information which has been furnished to me that those appointments are not so exclusively filled by gentlemen having been officers in the Army as the noble Viscount seems to think, because it appears that three Assistant Inspectors General were officers in the Force, and were raised to that rank. Of course, in the case of the newly-appointed Inspector General, Colonel Bruce, that was not an appointment from the Army, as he was promoted from the post of Deputy Inspector General. I am also able to tell the noble Viscount that I am informed by my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant that there is no intention whatever of laying down any rule that the superior appointments in the Force shall be limited to candidates coming from the ranks of the Army. With respect to the earlier part of his Question, I am not able to tell the noble Viscount the exact provisions of the Bill which will shortly be introduced on the subject of the pay and allowances of the Royal Irish Constabulary. But the delay which has taken place has been mainly caused by the fact that it was necessary to reconsider the scheme which had been adopted and recommended by the Departmental Committee which inquired into the matter, for the purpose of giving further and better consideration to the claims of the officers of the Force. That is the cause of the delay. The question is now under careful consideration. The Treasury have to be consulted; but we are in hopes that within a very short time a Bill dealing with the whole question, and including the case of the officers of the Force, will be presented to Parliament.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — WILLES- DEN SCHOOL BOARD.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON, who had on the Paper a Notice to call attention to the Letter from the Education Department of the 23rd May 1882 ordering the establishment of a board school for the Willesden district, wished to explain that he intended to postpone the matter till Tuesday next at the request of the noble Lord (the Lord Privy Seal), as he had not had time to inquire into the facts. He did so with regret, and wished that the consultation between the noble Lord and the Inspector had been held before the Order, which could not now be cancelled, had been issued. The case was one which well deserved the attention of Her Majesty's Government and the House.

Viscount Midleton

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRIVY SEAL) said, he felt obliged to the noble Earl for postponing the Question at his request. He had done his best to obtain full and satisfactory information, but had not quite succeeded during that day; and, therefore, he was unable to give a satisfactory reply to the noble Earl. He was not at the Council Office at the time when the Order was made, and, therefore, he had no opportunity of knowing personally what took place.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I should like to ask the noble Earl the Leader of the House, whether there is any intention on the part of the Government to fill up the Office of Lord President of the Council?

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply, said, that the Office was not vacant; but if it had been, and his noble Friend near him or any other persons had been appointed to it, he could not have had any personal knowledge of this Order, as it was settled by his noble Friend (Earl Spencer).

ROYAL MILITARY ACADEMY, WOOLWICH.]

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO asked Her Majesty's Government, If any inquiry has been instituted, and report made, in relation to certain statements contained in a pamphlet written by Professor Bloxam, affecting the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich; and, if so, whether the report will be laid upon the Table? The noble Lord observed, that, though some of the statements made in the pamphlet had been impugned as exaggerations, they rested on the authority of a gentleman of unquestioned character and position. A gentleman who ventured to expose the failings and shortcomings of an institution, as Professor Bloxam had done, stood in a very unpleasant position. Nevertheless, in his opinion, Professor Bloxam deserved the highest credit for what he had done. Taking the Profession generally, he thought their Lordships would be of opinion that the lives of military men and the associations by which they were surrounded did not invest them with those qualities of knowledge and experience which were necessary and essential for the ruling of a great educational establishment. The Woolwich Academy had, moreover, the additional disadvantage that the appointment of Governor was only held for a period of five years. Naturally, therefore, the post must be filled by men of different temperaments and different views. If there were a Governor who was lax in his mode of watching over this educational establishment, the inevitable consequence was that the next Governor who was appointed must resort to a more stringent discipline. The result was disturbance, spasmodic resentment, and a smouldering irritation in the establishment. In his opinion, an institution like the Woolwich Military Academy might be conducted more successfully under a civilian head with military assistants.

THE EARL OF MORLEY deemed it unnecessary to detain the House by prolonging remarks on a subject which was disposed of the other day. Without going, however, into the details which the noble Lord had brought forward, he would tell him at once, in answer to his Question, that in accordance with what he stated on a previous occasion, the Secretary of State had called for a Report on the allegations contained in Professor Bloxam's pamphlet. That Report was not of such a kind that it could be presented to Parliament. It affected matters of discipline, and it would be extremely inconvenient to present it to Parliament. But the Report dealt in detail with all the points brought forward by Professor Bloxam, and the Secretary of State considered that those allegations were satisfactorily dealt with, and that it was not necessary to proceed any further in the matter. He might mention that, after the close of the Correspondence referred to in his pamphlet, Dr. Bloxam had a long interview with the Governor; therefore, he had had a more ample opportunity of stating his view on the question of discipline than he could have had in Correspondence. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that the question was an important one; and, no doubt, if any good result could have been brought about by publishing the result of the investigation, the Secretary of State would have been willing to strain the official custom of considering the result of such inquiries private; but no possible good could result from publication in the present instance. He could assure the noble Lord that the question had been carefully investigated in all points, and that the answers given to Professor Bloxam's allegations were satisfactory. There were, he admitted, some isolated cases of insubordination; but he did not think these were sufficient to establish anything approaching to a general accusation of indiscipline against the Institution. The question of discipline and instruction in these Institutions was one which occupied the serious attention of those who were responsible for the administration of the Army. At the present time, there was no desire to conceal any matter which ought to be attended to; but in regard to this case, he believed that Professor Bloxam, of whom he did not wish to say anything severe, had made statements which, in some instances, were quite unfounded, and in other instances, were exaggerated generalizations from isolated acts. An investigation, though not of a public character, would be made into the general subject of the education of candidates for the Army.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 9th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—PRIVATE BILL (by Order)—Third Reading—Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway, and passed.

PUBLIC BILLS—Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.F. [Eighth Night].

Committee—Report—Vagrancy * [62-199].

Report—Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order * [144]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [165]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3) * [172]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2) * [145]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4) * [159]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6) *

[166]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7)* [167]; Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* [168]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* [174]; Local Government Provisional Order (No. 10)* [181]; Land Drainage Provisional Order* [164].

Third Reading—Interments (Felo de se)* [98], and passed.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

REGENT'S CANAL, CITY, AND DOCKS RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. MONK, in rising to move the rejection of the Bill, said, he had to present a Petition from the Executive Council of the Associated Chambers of Commerce against this Bill. The Petitioners called attention to the Resolution arrived at by the Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons in 1872; and they also expressed the same opinion as that which was expressed by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) on the second reading of the Bill, when his right hon. Friend stated that the conclusions he had arrived at were entirely in accordance with the views of Parliament, and of those engaged in the commerce of the country—namely, that the amalgamation of Canals with Railway Companies ought to be discouraged; that the control of the Canals ought not to be invested in the Railway Companies; and that, at all events, every precaution should be taken for securing the independence and maintenance of the inland water navigation of the country. He (Mr. Monk) regarded this as the most important Private Bill which had been brought before the House during the present Session; and if any apology were needed for the course he was now taking in calling attention to the measure at this late stage of the Bill, it would be found in the fact that, on the second reading, his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade proposed that it should not be referred to an ordinary Committee of four Members, but to an exceptional Committee—a Hybrid Committee, consisting of nine Members, five of whom were to be appointed by the Committee of Selection. The suggestion of the President of the Board of Trade was adopted. The Bill was referred to a Hybrid Committee, and the House now had before it the Report of that Committee. It would be his duty briefly to call the attention of the House to that Report, and especially to the meagreness of the explanations which it gave. This was a Bill for incorporating the Regent's Canal, City, and Docks Railway Company. That was the ground of Part II. of the Bill, and to that he made no objection. But it went on to provide for the transfer to the newly-created Railway Company of the undertaking called the Regent's Canal Company. That provision was contained, he thought, in Parts III. and IV. of the Bill, and to that provision he most decidedly objected. The Bill had certain other objects in view; but the main object was the transfer of, perhaps, the most important water navigation in the Kingdom to a Railway Company; and, as he had already stated, it was contrary to the recommendations of various Select Committees, of that House, and decidedly antagonistic to the recommendations of the Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament in 1872. The President of the Board of Trade, whom he regretted not to see in his place, sent a special Report to the Committee—the Hybrid Committee appointed by the House to inquire into the merits of the Bill. The Select Committee reported simply that they had passed the Preamble of the Bill; and they went on to state that there were no other circumstances of which, in the opinion of the Committee, it was desirable that the House should be informed, and that they had examined the allegations contained in the Preamble of the Bill, and amended the same to make it consistent with the provisions of the Bill as passed by the Committee, and found the same, as amended, to be true, and had gone through the Bill and made Amendments thereunto. It would be seen that the Report contained no reference whatever to the extraordinary circumstances under which the Bill was referred to a Select Committee. So far as he was able to see, the Report of the Board of Trade was entirely ignored. It was very possible that certain of the recommendations of the Board of Trade had been inserted in some of the clauses of the Bill, and that the requirements of the Board of Trade had, to a certain extent, been safeguarded by the Committee; but nothing whatever was said as to the wisdom of the course now proposed to be taken in transferring this Canal Company to a Railway Company. It was in consequence of the extraordinary nature of this Bill that it was referred to a Special Committee, and on turning to the proceedings, which were placed in the hands of hon. Members a day or two ago, he found that the Committee divided as to the propriety of passing the Preamble of the Bill, and upon that division he found that the Ayes were 4 and the Noes 4 also; whereupon the Chairman declared himself in favour of the Ayes. The minority were composed of the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel), the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire (Mr. Rathbone), the hon. Member for East Essex (Mr. Round), and the hon. Member for South Warwickshire (Mr. Gilbert Leigh). Now, those were Members of considerable experience in the House, and he thought their opinions were entitled to very great weight. He therefore hoped they should hear either from his hon. Friend the Member for Herefordshire (Sir Joseph Bailey), who was Chairman of the Committee, or from some other Member of it, why it was that they had not reported in reference to the subject-matter which was referred to them—namely, whether it was expedient that the policy recommended by all the Committees which had sat in the House of Commons, and by the Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons, in 1872, should in this instance be departed from. He found that there were no less than 76 Petitions presented against the Bill, and, as far as he was aware, there was not a single Petition in favour of it. His objection—or rather the objection of the Association on behalf of whom he had the honour to speak—was that the transference of this Canal Company into the hands of a Railway Company would place it in the power of the Railway Company to starve the navigation so transferred. It would matter very little what clause they inserted in the Bill for the protection of the navigation, because the Bill would enable the Railway Company to divert the traffic which came from the other Canals in the country into the Regent's Canal system to its own system of railway, instead of to the water communication which formed the general source of the Canal traffic of the country. He would remind the House that the Regent's Canal Company was reported to be in a very flourishing condition. It was altogether a different case from that of other navigations, which had not been able to pay their own expenses, and which had, unfortunately, fallen into the hands of the great Railway Companies. This, so far as he understood, was a paying concern, earning no less than the net sum of £60,000 a-year. Whether that was the actual figure or not, the Company were, at all events, in very flourishing circumstances, and, therefore, there was not the same necessity for transferring it to a Company which might arise in the case of an impoverished Company. He thought it was a national policy to keep the inland navigation open; but it seemed here that the whole question endeavoured to be solved was the best means of dividing good dividends among the proprietors. He believed that the Regent's Canal had branches to the London Docks, and that it there collected a great portion of the traffic which passed over the other Canals of the country. If that were so, it was surely most unwise for the House to depart from the policy it had so frequently recommended, and which certainly seemed to him to be the most desirable one to follow, of keeping the water navigation free and open, especially in a case where the Canal was a perfect solvent concern. He looked upon this Bill as, perhaps, the first, but, at all events, a most vital step towards closing the water navigation of the country. If Parliament consented to pass this Bill, he did not see how they could refuse to transfer any Canal whatever into the hands of a Railway Company which was able to give an undertaking that it would keep open the waterway. He might, further, remind the House that a Committee had now been sitting upstairs for nearly two Sessions, presided over by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Evelyn Ashley), in order to inquire, among other things, into this very question. That Committee had taken evidence with regard to Canals and with regard to their connection with the railways. He (Mr. Monk) had the honour of being a Member of that Committee; and he believed that they were prepared to report—that they would report very shortly—and that probably they would make some such recommendation as that which was made by the Joint Committee of 1872. There was still another reason. His hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) moved, a few nights ago, for a Select Committee upon Canals. That Committee was granted; and he saw that the names of the Members to be appointed upon it were now upon the Order Book of the House. At a time when his hon. Friend was ready with a Committee to inquire into the connection between Railways and Canals, and to point out to the House the best means of keeping open the navigation of the country, was that a moment when the House ought to place it in the power of any Railway Company, if not to close, at all events, to interfere most prejudicially with the great water communication like that of the Regent's Canal? With these observations, he should move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months, and he did so as a protest against any further absorption of Canals by Railway Companies. He hoped that the House would hear from some Members of the Committee what were the grounds upon which they had adopted this most exceptional course; and he trusted that some weight would be given to the opinion of the minority in the Committee, who were certainly entitled to great weight in the estimation of that House. He begged to move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Monk.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY regretted that the hon. Member for Gloucester should have felt it his duty to move that the Bill be read a third time that day six months; and as to the reason adduced by the hon. Member, among others, that a Committee was now sitting upon the general question upstairs, he ventured to say upon that point that it was an objection which should have been raised on the second reading of the Bill, and not upon the third reading. The Bill had already been referred to a Select Committee. That Committee had sat upon it for every working day for a month; it had examined some 60 or 70 witnesses, and had put something like 10,000 questions; and the House could well understand that an investigation of so protracted a character could not have been entered into without very great expense to the promoters. He thought that Parliament ought not to put the gentlemen who had embarked in this great undertaking to the expense of making a similar application a second time. With regard to the general subject, he admitted that the question was a very large one; but he would only detain the House by commenting upon the topics introduced by his hon. Friend in opposing the Bill. His hon. Friend had dealt, to a certain extent, with the traffic of the Canal. Now, of the traffic, 70 per cent was local traffic, and only 30 per cent consisted of traffic derived from other canals. Of that 70 per cent, two-thirds, or one-half the entire Canal traffic, came from the London Docks, and consisted of goods distributed to various wharves for the supply of the Metropolis. The Canal Company was not at the present time a Carrying Company, but it was a Toll-Taking Company; and it had no power of diverting any traffic from the Canal to the railway which was proposed to be constructed. But there were provisions inserted in the Bill for the purpose of keeping the Canal open for navigation, and to keep down the tolls at the moderate rate at which they now existed. The Committee were assisted in their investigation by a Report from the Board of Trade. That Report recited at some length the recommendations of the Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons in 1872. The Report had been referred to by his hon. Friend, and it said—

"The plan proposed in this Bill is, upon the face of it, at variance with this recommendation; and the burden lies upon the promoters of showing that there are special circumstances in this case which take it out of the general rules and principles laid down by the Joint Committee."

The Report, at the end, made three suggestions, which he would deal with by-and-bye. What he wished to do at the present moment was to show that there were special circumstances which took this Canal out of the scope of the General Report of the Committee of 1872. The circumstances were—the importance of the line of railway proposed to be made, and the special advantages of the route which it gave. Now, with regard to the advantages of the route, he would say this. Owing to the Canal having been made a very long time ago—for it was constructed under an Act passed in the year 1812—it had been a sort of barrier running through the middle of London for a great number of years; and, owing to the peculiarity of its position, the railway could be built on the north bank of it with less severance of property than by other routes through the Metropolis. It avoided all the complications of gas mains, sewers, and water-pipes, which constituted some of the great difficulties of Metropolitan improvements. It further avoided all severance of roads, and it was a remarkable fact that throughout the whole length of the proposed railway, running on the banks of the Canal for nearly 20 miles through the heart of London, it would only alter the level of one road, the alteration being only seven inches above the existing thoroughfare. Another important point was that if a railway were allowed to be constructed upon this route it could be carried out with less displacement to population than by taking any other route. Moreover, it was a daylight route; and that was a matter which anyone who had travelled by underground railway would know was one of very great importance. Beyond these reasons for taking the Canal, there was this fact—that by selecting this route there would be a saving in the cost of construction of from £2,500,000 to £3,000,000. These, he thought, were very important reasons; and if it could be shown that the railway was one of great importance to the public, they were reasons which ought to take the present Bill entirely out of the recommendations of the Joint Committee of 1872. There were also great advantages afforded by this railway in a public point of view. It proposed to join the Great Western Railway, the Great Northern Railway, and the Midland Railway with the Docks and the City of London. It would be of great advantage to steamships enabling them to coal at the Port of London; and it would perform all the objects of a Metropolitan Railway, as well as being a great convenience to the vast population in the neighbourhood through which it passed. To show the enormous amount of traffic which was likely to pass over such a line, he might state that the North of London Tramway Company proved to the Committee in evidence that in that neighbourhood they were employing from 2,400 to 2,500 horses, and that they carried a moving population of 34,000,000 annually. Beyond this, General Herbert appeared before the Committee on behalf of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and showed that the proposed line was of very great importance, in a military point of view, from the facilities it would afford for the embarking of troops and stores at the Port of London. These facts would show that the proposed route was an extremely advantageous one, and, consequently, that the railway itself would be of great importance to the Metropolis. The Report of the Board of Trade ended by making three suggestions to the Committee. First of all, that if it was passed into law it would be necessary to provide that the least possible interference with the traffic of the Canal should be protected during the construction of the railway. Upon this point the Committee had inserted a provision in the Bill—

Mr. Monk

“That no part of the waterway shall be closed, nor shall the free navigation, or the use of any part thereof, be interrupted for a longer period at any one time than ten days, nor shall such interruption occur more than twice in any one year, one occasion to be at Whitsuntide, and in such case the Company shall give ample notice to all parties concerned.”

As at the present moment it was necessary to clear the Canal annually at Whitsuntide for repairs, it would be obvious that there would be no very great additional amount of obstruction. Then they had provided that, whereas by the Canal Companies' Act they were only obliged to keep the Canal open 12 hours a-day, henceforth it should be kept open during the whole 24 hours, except on Sunday. They had also provided that any Canal Company, wharfinger, carrier, or trader should recover damages for any special damage sustained by them by the closing of the Canal at any other than the stipulated time, or by any other act, neglect, or default of the Company. The second recommendation of the Board of Trade was to provide that ample provision be made for the rights of all those who now used the Canal, both with regard to rates and convenience of traffic. Upon that heading the Committee had inserted in the Bill a provision that ample security should be given to the Grand Junction Canal Company against accident by loss of water in the Paddington Long Level by fine, gate, or otherwise. It was also provided that the tolls should not exceed those actually taken during the last 12 months, except with the permission of the Board of Trade. The Committee had also inserted a clause to enable other Canal Companies to secure through rates over this Canal, and against excessive tolls at Limehouse Docks, which formed the entrance to the Canal. It was further provided that, where it was necessary to widen or narrow the Canal in consequence of the construction of the railway, both sides should be retained by walls, giving a waterway equivalent to that at present provided. There were other conveniences provided in connection with the use of the Canal for the purpose of traffic, with which he would not trouble the House. The third suggestion of the Board of Trade was a very important one. It was this—

“Still more important will it be to consider whether power should not be given to the Grand Junction Canal and other Canal Companies, at some future time and on terms to be arranged by arbitration, to purchase the Canal undertaking.”

To meet this suggestion the Committee had provided—

“That power should be given to the Grand Junction Canal Company and other Canal Companies, at any future time after the construction of the railway and on terms to be arranged by arbitration, to purchase the Canal undertaking, including Limehouse Dock.”

He hoped he had shown to the House—first, that this route possessed special advantages; and, secondly, that the railway, when constructed, would be of immense advantage to the public, and that for these reasons it ought to be removed from the action of the Joint Committee of 1872. He hoped, further, that he had shown to his hon. Friend who moved the rejection of the Bill that the Committee had taken every possible care to secure the use of the Canal to all persons who could be now engaged in conducting the traffic over it.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he would not detain the House for more than a few moments; but having taken considerable interest in this question, he felt himself called upon to make a few observations in regard to the Bill as it had left the Select Committee. He fully agreed with the views expressed by his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), who opposed the Bill at this stage, and he thought the course his hon. Friend had taken was justified by the exceptional nature of the Bill. The hon. Baronet who had just addressed the House was Chairman of the Committee, and a most able and impartial Chairman too. The hon. Baronet stated that a great number of questions were asked by the Committee, and that a great number of days were occupied in considering its merits. Now, his (Mr. A. Peel's) opinion as to the great issue involved in the Bill was, that it was nothing more nor less than the competition of Canals with Railways; and nothing which passed in the Committee had impaired, in the slightest degree, the necessity of upholding that principle, or would, in his humble judgment, warrant the House in giving up the recommendation of the Joint Committee of 1872. The long and short of the question was this—they were placing the key of a vast system of Canal traffic in the hands of a Railway Company, and if they consented to place the key of the door in the hands of a Railway Company, he knew on which side of the door the Canals and those who were interested in maintaining water communication would be left. And it must not be forgotten that, at this present moment, a Committee had been appointed to inquire into the whole question of Canals, and their relation to the Railway interest. Of that Committee his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) was to be the Chairman, and he trusted the House would not stultify itself by sending that question to a Select Committee for inquiry, and, at the same time, by this Bill, handing over practically one-third of the whole system of Canal navigation to a Railway Company. He certainly hoped that if this Bill was to pass the House, it would leave the House with a protest hanging around its neck, and if his hon. Friend thought fit to divide the House he should certainly go with him into the Lobby. He believed, as the hon. Baronet the Member for Hereford (Sir Joseph Bailey) had truly said, that the intention of the Bill was to provide a new and cheap Metropolitan route; but he knew no reason why, if it was the intention of the promoters of the Bill to provide a Metropolitan route, that they should take the whole of this Canal into their possession. As it was, the Canal itself was handed over. There was no reason why the promoters should not have asked to run a line along the banks of the Canal, leaving the Canal to occupy its present independent position. The promoters, however, had not done so; but they proposed to absorb the Canal into their own system. In point of fact, the whole of this Canal was placed in such a position that hereafter the Regent's Canal and its feeders would be at the absolute mercy and control of the Railway Company. Under these circumstances, he would support the Amendment.

Sir Joseph Bailey

SIR SYDNEY WATERLOW said, he was surprised that his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), with the great experience he possessed of the Business of that House, should raise this question on the third reading of the Bill. It was, in reality, a question of the principle of the Bill, and that question was settled, after a full debate of the House, upon the second reading. The House then determined that the Bill should go to a Committee. It was thought that as there was a great principle at issue it ought to go to a Select Committee. That Committee had been sitting for a long time; it had taken a considerable amount of evidence, and it had passed the Bill, which now came down to the House for a third reading, and he hoped the House would consent to read it a third time. It was not a question between Railways and Canals, but there were other and more important questions involved. This was the case of a Canal running through a very thickly-inhabited district, and the time had now come when it ought to be considered whether Canals, running through thickly-populated towns, should be encouraged or not, especially when, in its place, it was proposed to construct a railway which would carry 100 times as many people and goods; and there was one even more strong reason which he had ventured to put before the House when the second reading of the Bill was under discussion. During the past 10 years the population of London had enormously increased, and Parliament had been considering various methods for enabling the working classes, whose work brought them into London, but who were obliged to live outside, to get from their work to their homes. One of the great problems of the day was, how to get the working people out of the centre of London to their homes. A private Company now came forward and said—"We can make 13 miles of railway running to the North and North-West of London, and we can take people by that railway from your Docks and the City to the outer districts." Why should this offer be refused? Unless Parliament sanctioned some such means of enabling the working population to get in and out of London, the difficulties that they had now to contend with would be increased year by year. If only for this reason, he hoped the House would read the Bill a third time, so that there might be another cheap and rapid route provided for the convenience of the working classes.

MR. D. JENKINS wished to say a word in regard to the bearing of the question upon the Grand Junction and other Canals. A very large portion of the goods brought from the inland Canals did not reach the Regent's Canal at all. The great bulk of the goods bought by inland water traffic passed into the Thames at Brentford, and out of a revenue of £60,000 a-year, which was said to be the net income derived by the Canal Company at present, a large portion was earned by Dock dues at Limehouse Docks, which were not affected by this scheme. It had been said, in regard to the description of goods carried by means of this Canal, that 70 per cent consisted of goods connected with local traffic, which could not possibly be carried by railway, such as bricks and goods of a very low value. With regard to the scheme as a Metropolitan improvement, he believed that it would be of immense advantage to the large population situated in the North of London. What was the case now? If a man wished to go to the North of London from the extreme East he had to make two or three changes of carriages, and, considering the time occupied and the extra expense, that alone was a matter deserving consideration. Then, again, as regarded the coal traffic from South Wales and the Midland districts, it had to pass over two or three lines of railway at a great additional expense. For these reasons, he thought, on the whole, considering the great amount of traffic from day to day, that the House ought to pass the third reading of this Bill. So far as the water was concerned, it would be improved by the Bill, because the Canal would be deepened and rendered more safe for the navigation than it was at present. In point of fact, a much larger amount of traffic could be left over it than was possible at the present moment. He trusted that the House would consent to read the Bill a third time.

MR. WATNEY said, he desired to call attention to a remark made by the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel), which he thought might mislead the House. The hon. Member had told them that it was proposed to lay a railway by the side of the Canal, and that the Canal was to be kept open all the year, with the exception of a certain number of days at Whitsuntide. It was proposed, even then, to leave the Canal in such a position that two barges could pass at the same time. Now, the largest traffic on that part of the Canal amounted to about 81 barges a-day, and by leaving room for two to pass the Committee had taken care that the roadway of the Canal should always be kept open. He thought there could not be a suspicion that this railway would be hostile to the Canal traffic. It was impossible to put the inland Canal traffic in the power of any Railway Company, because the Grand Junction Canal had an opening into the Thames by way of Brentford, and three-fourths of the inland traffic went in that direction. There was satisfactory evidence brought before the Committee that only 30,000 tons a-year of traffic came from the inland system to this Canal; and as they had taken precautions for keeping the Canal open in a better state than it now was, no power possessed by any Railway Company could very materially interfere with it; and it should also be borne in mind that the Associated Canal Companies could at any time purchase the Canal if they thought proper. He therefore hoped the House would not hesitate to affirm the principle they had laid down by reading the Bill a third time, but that they would pass the third reading now, and he felt sure that by so doing they would not only help the general traffic of London, but, at the same time, assist the ordinary traffic of the Canal.

MR. ANDERSON said, he wished the House to remember that this was not the Report of an ordinary Private Bill Committee that they were asked to affirm, but the Report of a Hybrid Committee. It was all very well for the Chairman of the Committee to come forward and make explanations now; but what he complained of was that the Committee themselves had not presented a Report sufficiently ample to guide the House upon the matter. The adoption of the Preamble of the Bill was a vote in which the Committee was equally divided, and it was only decided by the casting vote of the Chairman of the Committee. As he had said, it was a Hybrid Committee. The object of sending the Bill to a Hybrid Committee was that the interests of the public, which would not be watched over by those who had a locus standi before a Private Bill Committee, might be in a Hybrid Committee better protected; and a Hybrid Committee ought to have reported to the House, in order that the House might be certain whether those public interests had been duly protected in this instance or not. He knew very well that if a Canal got into the hands of a Railway Company, especially a Canal through which a great deal of outside traffic passed to the London Docks, that the public interest would be placed in very great jeopardy indeed. Under these circumstances, he should support the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester.

BARON DE FERRIERES said, he had been requested by the Ross Dock and Railway Company to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). The Bill involved a very serious question for the Canals of the West of England. All those Canals concentrated at Paddington, and they there came into communication with the Regent's Canal. Hitherto it had been possible for them to pass their traffic at once to the London Docks; but if this Bill passed they would be placed at the mercy of the Railway Company. He knew that it was very easy to pass a clause in a Private Bill; but, as a matter of practice, it was just as easy to nullify such a clause in its operation, and instead of a Railway Company being compelled to keep open a Canal, in the course of a few years, if this Bill passed, it would be found that the Canal Companies in the West of England were unable to communicate with the Docks in the East of London. He therefore thought that those who opposed this Bill were justified in departing from the usual custom of the House; and he entertained a strong hope that the Bill would not be allowed to pass in its present shape. If the Railway Company wished to construct a new line in this direction, let it avail itself of the usual course, and bring in a Bill for the purchase of the land and the construction of the line. The only explanation given to the House by the Chairman of the Committee for granting this concession to a Railway Company was that it would save the Company a sum of £2,500,000; and for the sake of effecting that saving the whole of the Canal traffic of the West of England was to be sacrificed. He trusted that the House would divide against the unjustifiable mode of action proposed by the Bill.

MR. ROBERTSON said, he intended to be very brief in his remarks, as he knew the House did not regard with much favour a protracted debate upon a Private Bill. All he wished to call the attention of the House to was that this was not the absorption of a Canal by a Railway Company. It might be so according to the letter, but it was certainly not according to the spirit. This was a case of an existing Canal which had already a railway constructed along a portion of its banks, and it was now desired to utilize the whole of the property not only as a Canal, but as a railway. By sanctioning the construction of the railway the Canal would not be destroyed; but it would be converted into a better Canal for the purpose of traffic than it was now. He spoke from facts that were proved before the Committee, and from facts within his own knowledge; and he altogether repudiated the assertion that the passing of this Bill would involve the destruction or even the slightest injury to the Regent's Canal. The question, however, was whether the House in this case was to be governed by its ordinary Rules, or to establish a new precedent in the interest of special constituencies either in the West of England, Warwickshire, or any other part of the country. With regard to the resolution of the Chambers of Commerce represented by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), he certainly could have no great feeling in its favour when he found that it was a general resolution respecting Canals generally, and calling upon the House to pursue a certain course in regard to them. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) said that the public were not represented before the Committee. He evidently was ignorant of the fact that 76 Petitions were presented against the Bill, and that the Committee sat for 20 days upon it. He had never seen so many counsel assembled, and, so far as he was able to judge, every interest was represented and fully inquired into. Then, in regard to the Report, all the special recommendations of the Board of Trade were given effect to in the Report of the Committee. The hon. Member for Glasgow said they made no special Report; that was altogether a mistake. They not only made a special Report, but they reported that they had inserted clauses in the Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Board of Trade. Under these circumstances, he would ask the House, in justice to those who had obtained a decision of a Committee upstairs, not to be tempted to enter into an analysis of the composition of the majority by whom the Preamble was passed, but to adopt the recommendations which were arrived at. If they were to enter into an analysis of this kind, where were they to stop? Were they to inquire into the character of the Chairman? If so, the character of the hon. Member for Herefordshire (Sir Joseph Bailey) was above all suspicion, and were his views to have no effect at all? He contended that this was too late to discuss the general merits of the Bill. The House had assented to its principle on the second reading, and had referred the consideration of its details to a Committee upstairs; and they were bound now to support the decision their own Committee had arrived at. He hoped the House would adhere in this case to the ordinary practice and custom, and would allow the Bill to be read a third time.

SIR JOHN R. MOWBRAY said, he knew that important Business was about to be brought before the House, and the value of the time which was now at the disposal of the House; and he would, therefore, not occupy the attention of the House for more than a few moments. He thought, however, that the House ought to consider that a grave question was raised when they were asked to reject a Bill which the Committee and the House had sanctioned. He had heard the statement of the hon. Baronet who presided over the Committee (Sir Joseph Bailey), and also that of the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel), who admitted that a more able Chairman could not have been appointed, although he advocated the other side of the question. The whole of these matters had been fully investigated. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) said the Committee was a Hybrid Committee. No doubt, it was a Hybrid Committee, but that made the decision of the Committee of greater importance. The Bill was not submitted to an ordinary Committee of four Members, but to a Committee of nine, five of whom were added by the Committee of Selection. The hon. Member said that the Bill was passed by the casting vote of the Chairman. It was not passed by the casting vote of the Chairman; but the fact was that, when the numbers were equal, the Chairman voted in the majority. Therefore, the majority was five against four. Then, what was the result? The result was, that they were having the whole matter argued out again on the floor of the House by the advocates of both sides of the question. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Baron De Ferrieres) came forward, and without any experience of the investigations of a Select Committee—for he believed the hon. Member had never sat on a Select Committee in his life—came forward now and asked the House to constitute him a Court of Appeal, and on his representation to throw out the result of an inquiry by a Committee which had sat for 16 days, and had inquired most carefully into the whole of the questions submitted to them. If the House would only consider the labour and difficulty the Committee of Selection had in getting hon. Members to undertake the onerous duty of serving upon Select Committees, he thought they would see the necessity of supporting the Committee when they had arrived at a conclusion. If the Committee had exercised their discretion wrongly, there was still a Court of Review in "another place." He called upon the House not to reject the Bill on an ex parte statement, either from the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Baron De Ferrieres), or the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), or the hon. Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel), or from hon. Members who were interested in the West of England; but to sustain the decision arrived at after careful inquiry by an able and impartial Committee.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he wished simply to bear his humble testimony to that which had been so well expressed by his hon. Friend opposite in deprecating most earnestly this new practice. The House was sought to be seduced into putting great questions of legislation regarding traffic and property literally to a "Whip" on both sides of the dispute as a Court of Appeal. Was this a time to ask the House that they should subject themselves even to a suspicion of such a mode of dealing with public interests? There had been the greatest difficulty in getting the House to agree to a decision on the second reading of the Bill, and it was at his instance that it was referred to a Hybrid Committee. His hon. Friend the Member for Warwick (Mr. A. Peel), than whom there was no sounder authority in the House, came down on that occasion and opposed the Bill on general grounds of public principle. His hon. Friend opposed its reference to an ordinary Select Committee; but, on the other hand, there were very strong representations made of public interests that required the Bill not to go to a Committee in the ordinary way. The House was in a state of doubt, when he (Mr. Torrens) humbly suggested, with the entire concurrence of the Government, who approved of the course taken, that there should be an appeal to that peculiar tribunal called a Hybrid Committee. The Committee of Selection were able to introduce a certain number of men of experience and ability to act along with the four Members usually appointed to inquire into a Private Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Warwick acquiesced in that course, and he believed that his hon. Friend was satisfied that there was reason and justice in that alternative. Well, then, having used that mode of arriving at an independent conclusion, were they now to throw over all that the Committee had done? Were they to disregard all the evidence that had been taken? Were they to set aside their own decision on the second reading, and by merely appealing to votes in the Lobby, whipped up on behalf of the great Companies concerned, were they to say they were not really capable of giving an independent judgment themselves on the second reading? There was no doubt whatever that the public at large would regard with great doubt and misgiving such a course on the part of the House. He hoped he would not be misapprehended when he said he thought the present moment peculiarly unfitted for taking such a course, because, if he was not greatly misinformed, something of a similar kind had been done "elsewhere," and from somewhat similar reasons. If Parliament was to follow that course and set up that new system of a chance-medley tribunal, he believed they would soon lose the confidence of the country. Before he sat down he would mention one point which he thought the House did not thoroughly appreciate. It was said that the traffic of the Western Canals might be injured by the control that would be exercised by this Railway Company if it obtained dominion over the Regent's Canal. Now, the truth was this—the great bulk of the Western traffic went into the Thames at Brentford, and therefore there would be no injury to that traffic at all.

MR. CAINE remarked that this was a Bill to enable the Regent's Canal to acquire one of the most important waterways of the country. Now, he had sat upon a Select Committee of that House during the greater portion of the Session, and the whole of last Session, to inquire into the question of Railway Rates. Witness after witness had come forward to complain of the great evil inflicted upon the trade of the country by enabling Railway Companies to acquire waterways. On that ground he should vote against any measure brought into that House to enable a Railway Company to acquire the waterway of any Canal.

MR. LALOR said, he wished to warn the House against the great danger of allowing Railway Companies to monopolize the waterways of the country, and he would give a reason from what had occurred in his own country a few years ago. There was a Canal in Dublin which ran to the West of Ireland, and the line of the Great Western Railway ran by the side of the Canal down to Mullingar. A few years ago the Railway Company sought to obtain possession of the Canal from Dublin to Mullingar. It succeeded in doing so, and what had been the result? The Railway between Mullingar and Dublin had monopolized the whole carrying trade of the district of the whole of the West of Ireland from Dublin, and the Canal was left absolutely idle. And when he said that the railway had monopolized the whole trade of that great district, it was scarcely necessary that he should add that as there was no competition it had increased its carrying prices nearly double.

MR. HICKS said, that many remarks had fallen from hon. Members on both sides of the House as to the propriety of the question being entered into by the House. They had been told that the Committee was not a Private Committee, but a Hybrid Committee, and that the Report of the Committee was only carried by a majority of 1, and, further than that, there ought to be a full Report of their proceedings. Now, he would like to ask the House what was the use of having a Report of the proceedings of the Committee if they were not allowed to consider it? He was of opinion that the questions raised by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) affected the whole of the waterways of the country. The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Baron De Ferrieres) had stated with great force the way in which the handing over of the Canals to the Great Western Company would, in effect, place the whole of the Canal system of the West of England at the mercy of that Company. But in pointing out the effects which would result from such a course, the hon. Member had omitted to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the evil did not stop with the West of England, but that it would extend to the whole of the Canal system from London to Liverpool and Manchester, and also from London to Hull. In point of fact, the whole network of the Canal and water system of this country was to be handed over to one railway, in order to enable that railway to save a small sum in the cost of constructing a new line. He trusted the House would never consent to do that, but that, bearing in mind the great and serious complaints that were made by all the trading and commercial Associations in the Kingdom in reference to the way in which the railways treated traders in regard to differential rates, they would reject this proposal and decide upon keeping up the freedom of the water communication.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 220; Noes 74: Majority 146.—(Div. List, No. 120.)

Main Question put, and agreed to (Queen's Consent signified).

Bill read the third time, and passed.

QUESTIONS.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— PAY AND PROMOTION.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland: Whether the Government has as yet decided on the changes in pay and promotion of the Royal Irish Constabulary recommended by the Commission on the subject; when such decision will be announced; and, whether, having regard to the disappointment of the officers in the Force at being entirely excluded from the recent Grant of £180,000, he will take care to expedite the amelioration of their position, pursuant to the proposals of the Commission?

MR. TREVELYAN: On receipt of the Report of the Committee appointed by the late Lord Lieutenant, this subject received the prompt and careful attention of the Government, and a scheme based upon the recommendations of the Committee was prepared by my Predecessor (Mr. W. E. Forster) and submitted to the Treasury, and, in the main, approved. It was found, however, to require amendment in some important particulars, in the interests of the officers of the Force, and had to be referred back to the Committee on these points. The Government is most anxious to announce a final decision, which, however, as financial considerations are involved, will require the concurrence of the Treasury; but I will take care that the matter is expedited as far as possible.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIIONS IN CONNEMARA.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a statement made by Mr. Tuke, in a letter to the "Standard" of 5th June 1882, that, during a period of a few weeks' visit to Connemara, he knew of the eviction from a portion of that district of three hundred and fifty families; and, whether the above statement is accurate; and, if so, whether in any of the above cases notice of application to the Land Court had been given by the tenants; what were the number of such cases; and, whether he can give an explanation of the reason of such numerous evictions?

MR. MITCHELL HENRY also asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had received information to the effect that in the course of a few days processes would be issued against nearly 500 families in the same district to be evicted from their homes?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have seen Mr. Tuke's letter referred to in the Question of the noble Viscount. The total number of families evicted in Connemara during the last two months is 218. It is difficult to answer the portion of the Question relating to the applications to the Land Court, as it cannot be answered by the Land Commissioners without the names of the tenants being given. I have, however, in the time allowed me by the noble Viscount, been able to give the names in 163 of the cases; and I find that 14 out of these 163 tenants had served originating notices. In all the cases, the evictions were for non-payment of rent.

ARMY—ORGANIZATION OF THE CAVALRY.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he intends to introduce any changes in the organization of the Cavalry at an early date; and, if so, whether the recommendations of the recent Committee on this subject will be adhered to?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER (for Mr. CHILDERS): In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to remind him that the Secretary of State stated, in moving the Estimates, the several alternatives which might be adopted in improving the organization of the Cavalry, and that he hoped to make some proposition to Parliament next year. He sees no reason for anticipating that intention by adopting any of the proposals this Session. The matter is not very urgent, as was explained in the statement of the Secretary of State.

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE DERRY CITY BENCH.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the composition of the Derry City bench of magistrates; whether it is a fact that, while the Catholic inhabitants of the city number 18,000, and all other denominations only 12,000, there are only two Catholic magistrates upon the Bench; whether these two gentlemen, Mr. P. T. Rodgers and Mr. John O'Neill, since the 15th of May last, have refused to sit upon the Bench, in consequence of their opinions being systematically ignored and overridden by their Protestant colleagues, who for the most part attend only when party cases are to be tried; and, whether any steps will be taken to increase the confidence of the Catholic inhabitants in the administration of justice?

MR. MACARTNEY also asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the record of the Londonderry Magisterial Court would not show that Mr. John O'Neill, a Roman Catholic magistrate, had not sat in that Court on four out of six days when Sessions were held; whether 75 per cent of the crime committed in Londonderry was not committed by Roman Catholics; whether, granting that there might be in that city 18,000 Roman Catholics, 19-20ths of the employers of labour were not Protestant, and mostly Liberals; and whether the majority of the Londonderry Bench were not Liberal Presbyterians and not Tories?

MR. TREVELYAN: If the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. Macartney) only wishes to state the counter view, it can hardly be expected that I am at the present moment prepared with the information asked. The Catholics of Derry number 16,000, and the Protestants 13,000. There are at present only two Catholic magistrates on the Bench. I am aware that in consequence of some difference of opinion on the Bench, there has been unwillingness on the part of the Catholic magistrates to sit, which I hope will not be permanent. I am sure the Lord Lieutenant will be quite prepared to remove any just cause of complaint, and to consider the claims of any eligible Roman Catholic gentlemen whose names may be submitted to him for appointment to the Commission of the Peace.

MR. REDMOND: Is the telegram to the effect that the Government have appointed a stipendiary Catholic magistrate correct?

MR. TREVELYAN: I cannot say.

MR. CALLAN: Is it the fact that the recommendation for appointments to the borough magistracy in Derry rests, not in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant, but in those of the Liberal Irish Executive?

[No answer was given to the Question.]

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—REMOVAL OF PLACARDS.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that the following placard has been torn down by the police in various places in Ireland:—

“Labour Question.

“The Labourers of this district are called upon to attend a preliminary meeting on at , to form a branch of the ‘Irish National Labour League.’ All persons wishing to further the cause of Irish industry will, by their presence, show their desire to forward the above much wanted movement.

“God save the People;”

and, whether, if so, the police acted in accordance with his instructions?

MR. TREVELYAN: The Inspector General of Constabulary informs me that possibly the police may in some cases have torn down some of these placards; but he thinks it unlikely that they have done so. If the placards were torn down in any instance, the local constabulary acted altogether on their own responsibility. A Circular is being prepared on the subject.

ARMY—COST OF SALUTES.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Financial Secretary to the War Office and the Secretary to the Admiralty, How much is expended annually by the Army and in the Navy on salutes?

SIR ARTHUR HAYTER: In reply to the Questions which my hon. and gallant Friend addresses to the Secretary to the Admiralty and myself, I have to say that if he will move for a Return of this expenditure during the last year it shall be given to him. The information will take some little time to collect. Perhaps my hon. and gallant Friend will speak to me as to the form of the Return, and I can, I think, give him one which will be satisfactory.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —
MESSRS. A. AND P. GALLAHER.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the case of the Messrs. Andrew and Patrick Gallaher, who are confined as suspects in Naas Gaol since last November, on the charge of intimidation, while many others, imprisoned at the same time, and on a similar charge, have been released; and, if there is any special reason for treating them with exceptional severity?

MR. TREVELYAN: The cases of Messrs. Andrew and Patrick Gallaher came before His Excellency on the 6th instant. He deemed it necessary to have further inquiries made, which is now being done.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—RESTRICTIONS AS TO CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DILLYWN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government or the authorities at the Cape have recently imposed any new restrictions on the Correspondence of Cetewayo or his liberty of action?

MR. R. N. FOWLER also asked when the Correspondence with regard to Cetewayo would be laid upon the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that neither Her Majesty's Government nor the authorities at the Cape had imposed any new restrictions on the correspondence of Cetewayo or on his liberty of action, except in one particular. About the middle of last month the Secretary of State sent instructions to Sir Hercules Robinson, the Governor of the Cape, begging him to take care that no messages were sent into Zululand by Cetewayo, unless with the knowledge and sanction of Sir Henry Bulwer, the Governor of Natal, and the Special Commissioner for Zulu Affairs. The Papers in question were in course of preparation, and would be laid upon the Table as soon as possible.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MISS M'CORMACK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware of the fact that, on Wednesday last, while a young lady named McCormack was walking in company with two respectable married ladies in the town of Kilmallock, the head constable came up and demanded Miss McCormack's name, telling her at the same time that she should leave the town; and, under what statute has a constable such power, and who directed him to take such summary proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The Head Constable in charge of Kilmallock district was aware that Miss M'Cormack was an active and prominent member of the Dublin Ladies' Land League, who for her proceedings in an adjoining county had recently been in prison because she refused to give security for her good behaviour. She was a stranger in Kilmallock, and the constable, seeing her going from house to house, accompanied by two other prominent members of the Ladies' Land League, seems to have been afraid she would be the cause of disturbance in the district, and warned her to leave. This he did as a constable charged with the general duty of keeping the peace of the district, and not under any special Statute.

MR. HEALY wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government approved of the conduct of the constable in the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): That is a Question which I would require some little time to consider; but having regard to the general condition of Ireland at present, I think that if any person who is charged with the duty of keeping the peace sees in his district anyone whom he considers liable to disturb the peace, he is hardly exceeding his duty by requesting that person to leave.

MR. O'SULLIVAN reminded the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he had forgotten to answer the latter part of the Question—namely, under what Statute had a constable such power, and who directed him to take such summary proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that the constable appeared to have been afraid that the peace of the district would be disturbed, and that was the reason he warned the lady. The constable was himself in charge of the district, and he did not appear to have received specific instructions in this case. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Under what Statute did he act?] Not under any Statute; but in the discharge of his general duty to preserve the peace.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Home Secretary, Whether, considering the fact that a constable could order a lady, a native of Ireland, out of the town that she was visiting, he thought it necessary to have an Aliens Clause in the Bill before Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): She was not ordered at all.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—THE ISLAND OF ARRAN.

MR. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Edward Slevin was arrested in Mayo on the 11th March 1881, and is still in Kilmainham Gaol, under the Protection Act; whether his case has been considered, and why he is not discharged; whether William Kennedy, of Oola, in the county of Limerick, was arrested on the 9th March 1881, is still in Kilmainham Gaol, and why he was not discharged when the Right honourable Member for Bradford ordered the discharge of all the Limerick suspects; whether Coleman Naughton, arrested in January last in the Island of Arran, is still in Kilmainham; whether he is unable to speak or understand English, and has suffered much in health; and, whether the Island of Arran has for a long time been in a perfectly peaceful state, and why Naughton is not released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Edward Slevin's release was ordered yesterday. William Kennedy some time ago voluntarily offered, if released, to go at once to America. His Excellency is prepared to order his release on these conditions; but he now declines to go, and he cannot at present be released with safety to his district. I answered the question about C. Naughton yesterday. His health has not suffered by the detention. The Lord Lieutenant is now making some further inquiries into his case; but I regret that the information I have leads me to conclude that the Island is not in the satisfactory state the hon. Member seems to think.

MR. DILLON asked whether the right hon. Member for Bradford did not state that he had ordered the release of all the Limerick "suspects?"

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that his statement referred to those who had been arrested since Mr. Clifford Lloyd had been in the county; but Kennedy was arrested many months before.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many persons reasonably suspected of inciting to the crime of murder have been recently released by the Lord Lieutenant; and, whether the persons whose lives were jeopardized by the suspects had any communication made to them before the release of the persons who had incited their murder?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has, in the course of the month, released only two persons who were in custody suspected of inciting to murder. In these cases His Excellency has satisfied himself, before ordering the release of a "suspect," that there were no reasonable grounds for apprehending danger, either to the persons whose lives had been previously endangered, or to any person in the district. His Excellency is unable to authorize me to enter into the question of the strength or weakness of the evidence of the cases, or to disclose the names of the persons with whom he has communicated on these matters.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER repeated the latter part of the Question.

MR. HEALY rose to a point of Order, and asked whether it was in accordance with the Rules of the House that a serious charge, one of murder or of manslaughter, should be insinuated by a Question?

MR. SPEAKER said, he was not prepared to accept the construction put upon the Question, although it did appear to be out of Order.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he could only repeat that he was not authorized to enter into details.

say that if he will move for a Return of this expenditure during the last year it shall be given to him. The information will take some little time to collect. Perhaps my hon. and gallant Friend will speak to me as to the form of the Return, and I can, I think, give him one which will be satisfactory.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 —
MESSRS. A. AND P. GALLAHER.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the case of the Messrs. Andrew and Patrick Gallaher, who are confined as suspects in Naas Gaol since last November, on the charge of intimidation, while many others, imprisoned at the same time, and on a similar charge, have been released; and, if there is any special reason for treating them with exceptional severity?

MR. TREVELYAN: The cases of Messrs. Andrew and Patrick Gallaher came before His Excellency on the 6th instant. He deemed it necessary to have further inquiries made, which is now being done.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—RESTRICTIONS AS TO CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. DILLYWN asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government or the authorities at the Cape have recently imposed any new restrictions on the Correspondence of Cetewayo or his liberty of action?

MR. R. N. FOWLER also asked when the Correspondence with regard to Cetewayo would be laid upon the Table?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY, in reply, said, that neither Her Majesty's Government nor the authorities at the Cape had imposed any new restrictions on the correspondence of Cetewayo or on his liberty of action, except in one particular. About the middle of last month the Secretary of State sent instructions to Sir Hercules Robinson, the Governor of the Cape, begging him to take care that no messages were sent into Zululand by Cetewayo, unless with the knowledge and sanction of Sir Henry Bulwer, the Governor of Natal, and the Special Commissioner for Zulu Affairs. The Papers in question were in course of preparation, and would be laid upon the Table as soon as possible.

LAW AND POLICE (IRELAND)—MISS M'CORMACK.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware of the fact that, on Wednesday last, while a young lady named McCormack was walking in company with two respectable married ladies in the town of Kilmallock, the head constable came up and demanded Miss McCormack's name, telling her at the same time that she should leave the town; and, under what statute has a constable such power, and who directed him to take such summary proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The Head Constable in charge of Kilmallock district was aware that Miss M'Cormack was an active and prominent member of the Dublin Ladies' Land League, who for her proceedings in an adjoining county had recently been in prison because she refused to give security for her good behaviour. She was a stranger in Kilmallock, and the constable, seeing her going from house to house, accompanied by two other prominent members of the Ladies' Land League, seems to have been afraid she would be the cause of disturbance in the district, and warned her to leave. This he did as a constable charged with the general duty of keeping the peace of the district, and not under any special Statute.

MR. HEALY wished to ask whether Her Majesty's Government approved of the conduct of the constable in the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): That is a Question which I would require some little time to consider; but having regard to the general condition of Ireland at present, I think that if any person who is charged with the duty of keeping the peace sees in his district anyone whom he considers liable to disturb the peace, he is hardly exceeding his duty by requesting that person to leave.

MR. O'SULLIVAN reminded the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he had forgotten to answer the latter part of the Question—namely, under what Statute had a constable such power, and who directed him to take such summary proceedings?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that the constable appeared to have been afraid that the peace of the district would be disturbed, and that was the reason he warned the lady. The constable was himself in charge of the district, and he did not appear to have received specific instructions in this case. [Several hon. MEMBERS: Under what Statute did he act?] Not under any Statute; but in the discharge of his general duty to preserve the peace.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Home Secretary, Whether, considering the fact that a constable could order a lady, a native of Ireland, out of the town that she was visiting, he thought it necessary to have an Aliens Clause in the Bill before Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): She was not ordered at all.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT—THE ISLAND OF ARRAN.

MR. DILLON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Edward Slevin was arrested in Mayo on the 11th March 1881, and is still in Kilmainham Gaol, under the Protection Act; whether his case has been considered, and why he is not discharged; whether William Kennedy, of Oola, in the county of Limerick, was arrested on the 9th March 1881, is still in Kilmainham Gaol, and why he was not discharged when the Right honourable Member for Bradford ordered the discharge of all the Limerick suspects; whether Coleman Naughton, arrested in January last in the Island of Arran, is still in Kilmainham; whether he is unable to speak or understand English, and has suffered much in health; and, whether the Island of Arran has for a long time been in a perfectly peaceful state, and why Naughton is not released?

MR. TREVELYAN: Edward Slevin's release was ordered yesterday. William Kennedy some time ago voluntarily offered, if released, to go at once to America. His Excellency is prepared to order his release on these conditions; but he now declines to go, and he cannot at present be released with safety to his district. I answered the question about C. Naughton yesterday. His health has not suffered by the detention. The Lord Lieutenant is now making some further inquiries into his case; but I regret that the information I have leads me to conclude that the Island is not in the satisfactory state the hon. Member seems to think.

MR. DILLON asked whether the right hon. Member for Bradford did not state that he had ordered the release of all the Limerick "suspects?"

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that his statement referred to those who had been arrested since Mr. Clifford Lloyd had been in the county; but Kennedy was arrested many months before.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, How many persons reasonably suspected of inciting to the crime of murder have been recently released by the Lord Lieutenant; and, whether the persons whose lives were jeopardized by the suspects had any communication made to them before the release of the persons who had incited their murder?

MR. TREVELYAN: His Excellency has, in the course of the month, released only two persons who were in custody suspected of inciting to murder. In these cases His Excellency has satisfied himself, before ordering the release of a "suspect," that there were no reasonable grounds for apprehending danger, either to the persons whose lives had been previously endangered, or to any person in the district. His Excellency is unable to authorize me to enter into the question of the strength or weakness of the evidence of the cases, or to disclose the names of the persons with whom he has communicated on these matters.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER repeated the latter part of the Question.

MR. HEALY rose to a point of Order, and asked whether it was in accordance with the Rules of the House that a serious charge, one of murder or of manslaughter, should be insinuated by a Question?

MR. SPEAKER said, he was not prepared to accept the construction put upon the Question, although it did appear to be out of Order.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that he could only repeat that he was not authorized to enter into details.

I have hastily extracted what I think will be novel and interesting to the House. One telegram says—

"Mr. Bourke came into Gort, where some land cases were for trial, accompanied in his trap only by a corporal of Royal Dragoons. Not one of the tenants appeared to meet the cases. The soldier had only come down the day before yesterday. Five men had looped the wall inside the garden and next the gate at Castle Taylor, and shot both as they passed. The soldier was trying to load when shot. Mr. Shaw Taylor was close by, heard the shots, and saw the men pick up the two rifles, and walk away."

Another telegram is as follows :—

"Double murder at Castle Taylor: Further particulars.—Mr. Bourke left home at 8.30 a.m. yesterday, with escort of one soldier, to attend Gort Land Sessions, to which he was summoned by tenants (not one of whom appeared). The assailants were in ambuscade at one of Castle Taylor gates. They escaped across fields, taking with them a Winchester repeating rifle and a Cavalry carbine from the murdered men. Were seen by Mr. Shaw Taylor, who was coming up the road, who says there were five or six men walking fast, not running, in extended order across the field; nearest, who presented gun at him, 60 or 80 yards distant. All carried guns, and one had two. Does not know any of them. Described them as well-dressed in frieze of the country, and low hats. Had heard five or six shots in rapid succession from direction where bodies were found. Death appears to have been instantaneous. Inquest at 1 p.m. to-day. Three arrests on suspicion."

I have next another telegram in almost identical terms. Then comes a series of telegrams in reference to another outrage, which there is reason to believe was not an agrarian murder in any sense, and which I need hardly read. [Cries of "Read!"]

"From Sub-Inspector Clones.—Altercation arose last evening between Edward M'Phillip and three brothers named M'Aviney. M'Phillip was knocked down. Immediately attended by doctors, life was extinct. Inquest will be held to-day. Three M'Avineys arrested."

The next telegram is—

"From Constable, at Ballyfarna.—Henry East, of Covatrench, wounded at 4 p.m. on the 8th instant by three men unknown, having received three revolver shots in the leg, breaking one. Motive, agrarian."

I gather from a non-official telegram that the case is likely to prove fatal. The next is—

"From Sub-Inspector, at Crossmalina.—Michael Browne, farmer, Rathglass, fired at and wounded by party of six men, near his own house, at 6 p.m. on the 8th instant. Revolver ball lodging in right leg; agrarian."

Mr. Trevelyan

I have also received the following telegram from Castleisland :—

"Cornelius Hickey, of Crinny, was fired at and received two revolver bullets in right leg, about 6 p.m. yesterday, when returning from Castleisland. Motive agrarian. Wound not considered dangerous. Four arrests."

Colonel Brackenbury sums up those outrages in the following telegram :—

"Besides murder of Mr. Bourke and soldier yesterday in Galway, the following outrages are reported :—Michael Browne, farmer, Rathglass, county Mayo; Henry East, of Covatrench, county Roscommon; Cornelius Hickey, of Crinny, county Kerry, all severely wounded in the legs by bullets fired from revolvers. All these four outrages took place between 3 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon. I invite your attention to the similarity of crimes over this wide area, and to its simultaneous commission."

It is against outrages of this kind that the Prevention of Crime Bill is directed—not the 4th clause, which we are considering, but the 9th clause.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS— STANDING ORDER 167.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Chairman of Committees, Whether he would allow a week to elapse between the Notice of Motion and his intended Amendment to Standing Order 167 and the discussion of that Amendment?

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that the House would remember that Order 167 was referred to a Select Committee, and that the Select Committee had reported upon it. He had thought it desirable to deal with the matter in a Bill; but the Government did not share his opinion. He had been in communication with the noble Lord who occupied a similar position to himself in "another place" on the subject, and in the event of his bringing forward his Motion he would willingly accede to the request of his hon. Friend.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS) — THE KHEDIVE.

LORD EUSTACE OECIL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of the very menacing attitude adopted by the military party in Egypt, according to the latest accounts, effective measures have been taken to protect the Khedive from personal violence?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that the Khedive, whose conduct has been perfectly straightforward and courageous, is entitled to the full support of ourselves, of Europe, and the Porte. Her Majesty's Government would be sorry to acknowledge the possibility of such an outrage as personal violence to His Highness, and, in point of fact, they do not apprehend such a danger.

AFFAIRS OF MALTA—NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. MACIVER asked the hon. Member for Glasgow, Whether he intended to proceed with his Notice of Motion relating to the Affairs of Malta, and whether he had any expectation of bringing it forward? He had received many communications from Malta on the subject, and he would be glad to have the terms of his hon. Friend's Notice of Motion.

MR. ANDERSON said, it would require a very sanguine temperament to believe that the House would get through Committee on the Prevention of Crime Bill by Friday next, which was the day he had secured for bringing on his Motion. He intended to bring it on, if he had the opportunity, the terms of the Motion being—

"That it is the opinion of this House that the long tried loyalty of the people of Malta to British rule deserves more consideration than it has received; that the several reports of Mr. Rowsell, Sir Penrose Julian, and Mr. Keenan, as well as the numerous signed Petitions of the people, prove that great changes in the civil administration of the island are urgently required, and that Her Majesty's Government ought to be doing more than they have been doing to carry out the needed reforms, and so to promote the prosperity and secure the contentment of the Maltese people."

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

MR. GORST asked Mr. Speaker, Whether the Government were in Order in putting down as the second Order of the Day the Committee on the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill? He believed that on Fridays, by a Standing Order, the first Order of the Day must be Committee of Supply. Although the House had passed a Resolution giving precedence to the Prevention of Crime Bill, he believed that no precedence was intended to be given to the Arrears of Rent Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, there was no doubt that the first Order of the Day on Fridays should be Committee of Supply, and that, a Resolution having been passed to give precedence to the Prevention of Crime Bill, the Order of Committee of Supply should have taken the second place.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th June.]

[EIGHTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 4 (Intimidation).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 3, line 24, to leave out all the words after the word "Act," to the end of the Clause.—(Mr. Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'In this Act the expression "'intimidation'" stand part of the Clause.'"

MR. DILLON said, that a much wider interpretation was given to the clause as it stood than the Government attributed to it. He proposed to quote a passage from one of the leading Metropolitan journals, in order to show the construction which was put upon the word "intimidation," as it was introduced by the Home Secretary; and he did so for the purpose of showing the absolute necessity of prolonging the discussion of the clause, in order that the Members of the Committee, and persons outside the House, might be satisfied as to the real object and intention of the clause, no definite understanding having yet been come to as to the exact meaning of the word. The extract was from a paper which represented a considerable amount of public opinion. It said—

"The Home Secretary's defence of the clause was ingenious. The latter part, he said, 'was only the interpretation put upon intimidation in the first part.' In other words, no person would be held to be guilty of intimidation unless he had placed compulsion upon others to take part in any riot or unlawful assembly or to resist the processes of the law in regard to eviction."

[Eighth Night.]

That was the opinion of The Standard as to what the Government meant by intimidation—namely, that nobody would be guilty of intimidation unless he put compulsion on somebody to take part in a riot or unlawful assembly. In arguing against the adoption of the Amendment yesterday, the Home Secretary and the Prime Minister repeated over and over again the statement that practically this clause was drawn in the same spirit as the Act of 1875. He had had the curiosity that day to look at the debate which took place when the Bill of 1875 was passing through the House, and he confessed that the discoveries he had made from perusing that debate had surprised him very considerably. He, first of all, discovered that the clause as it stood in the Act, and as it had been copied by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, was a clause which was not drawn by the House of Commons at all, but drawn up by the House of Commons, in substitution of the clause accepted by the House of Commons, and sent up to the other House by a small majority, under great pressure from the Government. It was drawn up by the Lord Chancellor, and was substituted for the clause which had been sent up by the House of Commons. On referring to the report of the debates which took place when the Bill was passing through Committee, he found that right hon. Gentlemen now sitting on the Treasury Bench were in Opposition, and that their views with regard to the crime of intimidation were of a totally different character—indeed, of a totally opposite character—from the views they expressed now. The right hon. and learned Gentleman who was now Home Secretary was not then in Office; and he found the right hon. and learned Gentleman strongly opposing the Intimidation Clause which was then being passed through the House. The right hon. and learned Gentleman made use of the following words. He said that:—

"He agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Limerick that great mischief might arise from the ambiguity of the clause. So far as it went beyond the existing law, it was altogether unnecessary."—[3 Hansard, 1883.]

Mr. Dillon

Those were the words of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary in 1875. Great mischief, the right hon. and learned Gentleman thought, might arise from the ambiguity of the clause, and yet the clause referred to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was nothing like so ambiguous as the clause now submitted to the Committee. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the clause was so ambiguous that it might give rise to very great mischief. It was moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), who had charge of the Bill, and it said that—

"Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do or abstain from doing, shall use violence to any person."

And the present Home Secretary then contended that the crime of intimidation, as defined by that clause of the Act of 1875, meant using or threatening violence in such a shape that a magistrate would be entitled to bind the man who resorted to it over to keep the peace; and that, he said, was too ambiguous, and that great mischief might hereafter arise from the adoption of such a definition. But he (Mr. Dillon) did not rest his argument alone on the authority of the Home Secretary. Going a little further into the debate, he met with another friend of Ireland, in the shape of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). What did that right hon. Gentleman say? He made two very remarkable statements, and he (Mr. Dillon) certainly wished that the right hon. Gentleman would stick to them. If he did, he would be assisting the Irish Members that day in resisting this Intimidation Clause. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking in favour of an Amendment proposed to a new clause, said—"This clause, drawn as it now is, would practically amount to this—that if a man looked crooked at the wife or children of a labouring man he might swear that he had been intimidated." Why did the right hon. Gentleman use that argument? He went on to explain it by saying—"Surely the prosecution should be left to the man who was threatened; a third party ought not to be brought in." Would the right hon. Gentleman up to-day and support his opinion expressions, they would confine themselves to the legal meaning of the word. He understood the Government that the acts done should be done with the intent of producing injury to person or loss of business. They had not got the word "intent" in the clause, and if they admitted the first line of the definition, how could they depend that the Government would put upon the Table a definition which should be the legal meaning of the word "intimidation?" Would the Government also accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and say that the clause should not apply to exclusive dealing? It appeared, that while Irish Members were anxious to secure themselves by limiting the definition, the Government were intent upon widening it. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets was clear in his opinion that the Government aimed at exclusive dealing under this definition, and it was that which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford was intended to meet. He said Irish Members were fairly entitled to some further information and assurance from the Government; and unless they satisfied them that the acts done meant acts done with the intention of producing fear or injury to the individual, it was clearly the duty of Irish Members to resist the definition until that assurance was given.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he thought the question the Committee had to consider was whether "Boycotting," or, as the hon. Member opposite termed it, "exclusive dealing," was to be efficiently dealt with or not. The first consideration which governed this was as to whether the ordinary law had or had not been found efficacious in dealing with it. The answer was, that it had not. For the last two years "Boycotting" had spread over a great extent of the country. Besides the ordinary law, there was the unwritten law of the Land League; and he maintained that that law, as expounded by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), had been utterly unable to deal with "Boycotting." The hon. Member for the City of Cork, speaking at Ennis, said, last year, that "Boycotting" ought to be confined to cases in which men took farms from which others had been evicted; and he would not do the hon. Member the injustice of saying that he then made a mental reservation. On the contrary, he believed that his views remained the same now as they were 12 months ago on the subject of "Boycotting." It was clear, then, that this unwritten law had been inefficacious in the matter of "Boycotting" also; for schoolmasters had been subject to this persecution for expressing an unfavourable opinion, and persons also for having, as it was said, spoken disrespectfully of the Land League—in short, men in Ireland had been "Boycotted" for every assignable reason; for reasons which the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), who went further than he did, condemned. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, with all his influence and power in Ireland, had been utterly unable to repress this practice. Both the ordinary law and this unwritten law having failed, the Government were compelled to come forward and ask for this legislation. Now, he submitted that, if this clause were passed, it would deal effectually with "Boycotting;" but there remained the consideration whether it would interfere gratuitously or unnecessarily with the liberty of any considerable portion of Her Majesty's subjects. He contended that it would not; and, in concluding his remarks, he could not better illustrate the position of things than by referring to a conversation which took place between a gentleman and his neighbour some weeks ago. "Is not this a terrible Coercion Act we are groaning under?" said the latter. "Yes, it is," said the other; "but have we not been groaning under a more terrible one all our lives—the Ten Commandments?" "I do not think anyone who keeps the Ten Commandments need fear the Coercion Act." "I do not think they need," was the reply. He believed the people of Ireland wanted to keep the Ten Commandments, if only the hon. Member for the City of Cork would allow them to do so. As the clause would not interfere with anyone who did keep them, he, for one, was not afraid to vote for it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, notwithstanding his acquaintance with the Ten Commandments, the hon. and gallant Member opposite had not scrupled to break the one which forbade him to bear false witness against his neighbour, in saying that the majority of his constituents were in favour of this Bill.

At the beginning the right hon. Gentleman had stated that it was a case of law between the rich and the poor, and therefore, as Mr. Lowe said—

"Nothing could be more dangerous or unfair than the use of ambiguous expressions of this kind, especially in a measure which ought to be easy of interpretation, being, as it was, a law between the rich and the poor. The springing of an offence of this kind suddenly upon the country seemed to be one of the most imprudent pieces of legislation he had ever seen, and he was astonished that such a mistake should have been made."—[3 Hansard, cccxvi. 711.]

If that was the interpretation of Lord Sherbrooke, what would he say in reference to the term "intimidation?" The noble Lord had said that—

"The springing of an offence of this kind suddenly upon the country seemed to be one of the most imprudent pieces of legislation he had ever seen, and he was astonished that such a mistake should have been made."—[Ibid.]

What would he say of a Bill which proposed to spring 100 new offences on the country at very short notice indeed? The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill (Sir R. Assheton Cross), in endeavouring to defend the clause, said—

"In its present form, it was really less strong than it had been before. In its original form the words were 'who threatens or intimidates.'" —[Ibid. 712.]

The Irish Members were quite willing to take the words "threatens or intimidates;" but this Member of a Conservative Government went on to say—

"But there was a question raised as to whether a threat was sufficient to bind a man over for, and therefore the word 'threatens' was omitted. Intimidation, however, was another matter altogether;"

and this was what he (Mr. Dillon) wished to dwell upon—namely, what, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, was the nature of intimidation—

"Intimidation, however, was another matter altogether, and the clause in its present form, instead of its being stronger than it was, was weaker. [Mr. Lowe: No, no!] In his view it was weaker. It now provided that not only must there be some action on the part of the offender, but it must have a certain effect on the person whom it sought to intimidate."—[Ibid.]

That, he (Mr. Dillon) thought, thoroughly explained the matter, and a definition to that effect would enable the farmers in Ireland to get at the meaning which the word "intimidation" in the present clause was to have. But now he came to a speech made by another Member of the present Administration—the right hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella). The right hon. Gentleman said—

Mr. Dillon

"Whatever might have been the intention of the noble Lord who made the Amendment in the House of Lords, the effect would be to leave intimidation wholly without qualification or definition."—[Ibid.]

And so it was now; the intimidation was left entirely without qualification or definition. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say—

"As the Bill stood before, the intimidation was to be such intimidation as would justify a justice of the peace in binding over a person; but as it now stood, the word 'intimidates' was left entirely without qualification, so that the justice would have to decide as to what it might be. No doubt, the intention was to follow the Charge of the right hon. and learned Recorder, but that right hon. and learned Gentleman really defined what he meant by intimidation, using the words 'such an exhibition of force as is calculated to produce fear in the minds of ordinary men.'"
—[Ibid.]

Would the Government accept the definition of the hon. and learned Recorder of London, which had been regarded as an authoritative definition of intimidation, and had been accepted in that sense by both sides of the House? Would they insert the words of the Recorder of London in this Act? If so, the Irish Members would withdraw all further opposition to it. If they declined to accept that definition, they had no right to say that they were legislating in the same spirit for the Irish peasantry as they did for the working men of England. The noble Lord (Lord Sherbrooke), who used to be an influential Member of the Liberal Party, said what he (Mr. Dillon) had endeavoured to argue the other day, that the necessity for a definition in the clause of the offence of intimidation was very much increased when they bore in mind the nature of the tribunal before which the offence would have to be tried, and also in view of the fact that it was a law made to be administered for the poor man against the rich man. There was another point in favour of his contention that the law of 1875 was passed not as a measure of coercion for the working men of England, but as a measure of relief. A great deal depended on the administration of any law, and the spirit in which it was introduced. The law of 1875 was passed not to coerce the working men of England, and not to put an end to combinations, but for the purpose of relieving working men from restraints; and it was well known that if the Intimidation Clause was to be strictly interpreted, the only result would have been that another Bill would have had to have been introduced in the following year to modify it. He was not sufficiently a lawyer or authority to state the effect of the cases which had been decided under the Act; but there was not the slightest doubt in his own mind that the magistrates and the County Court Judges, in ruling under that Act, appealed to the Charge of the Recorder of London, as being protective in the matter of interpreting the meaning of the clause, especially when that view was backed up by the statement of the Lord Chancellor of England himself. If any man contended, as a matter of argument, that that clause would have to be worked in this country against the working men of England and their unions as an open intimidation clause, let him produce his cases. He denied that it had ever been so used, and he challenged the Attorney General or the Home Secretary to produce any case in which it had been so used, or to show that wherever it had been brought into action—if it ever had been brought into action—the Charge of the Recorder of London was not only appealed to, but allowed to be a protective definition in favour of any man who might be prosecuted. As he had already stated, if the men who were then advocating the rights of the working men of England had a right to insist, as they did insist, and to press hard for a stricter definition than was given by the Government in the clause, how much more had the Irish Representatives a right to ask for a stricter definition in this clause when they were dealing with a Bill not of restraint, but of oppression? Because the Bill was not brought in to encourage, but to put down combination—not to encourage the methods the farmer, or the agricultural labourer, or the mechanic, all the world over, were obliged to resort to in order to defend their rights against capitalists or landlords, but to put them down. He contended that the Bill was introduced not in order to enable the Government to take off the shackles from the Irish working man in the shape of the small farmer, and enable him to combine and maintain methods of combination, but to make it impossible for them to combine; and, that being the object and intention of the Bill, if the Committee consented to pass it without a single statement of any definition whatever—for the only statement they had had was a repeated declaration that Her Majesty's Government utterly refused to define it—this sub-section would simply enable the magistrates, in applying the Act, to stop at nothing. The Irish Representatives had, therefore, a tenfold greater right than Lord Sherbrooke, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, or the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) ever had to insist on limitations being placed to the term "intimidation," and they had a tenfold greater right to insist on the limitation of this section. He did not see that the Government, in the course of the discussion upon the Bill, had yielded by a single inch to any of the representations which had been made by the Irish Members. The case stood now exactly as it stood when they first objected to this clause—that the magistrates, who were notoriously partizans, and completely under the Ministerial influence of the Treasury Bench, would have it in their power—to use the words of the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster)—to send to gaol for six months with hard labour "anybody who looked crookedly at the child or wife of any man in Ireland." Those were not his words, but those of the right hon. Gentleman, and they were applied to a clause much milder than that which the Irish Members objected to. But times had now materially changed with the right hon. Gentleman, and he (Mr. Dillon) saw no course open to the Irish Members but to continue to the best of their ability to endeavour to amend the clause by every means in their power. He trusted that the Government would come forward and accept the fair and reasonable offer made to them to give an undertaking that the interpretation of the Intimidation Clause in Ireland should be ruled by the Charge of the Recorder of London, in the same manner as the clause in the Act of 1875 was interpreted.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he had no reason whatever to object to the desire of the hon. Member to amend this clause in any way he thought desirable; but he would ask the Committee to consider the position of the Amendment. The Amendment before the Committee proposed to omit the words "In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes," &c. Now, that was an objection to a definition of intimidation. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), with all his great ingenuity, which all of them recognized, tried his hand at an amendment of the definition of the Government, and was obliged to admit that he failed to make one, and, therefore, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to omit all definition whatever. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) said that was what he desired to do; and hon. Members on the Benches opposite below the Gangway seemed to agree last night with the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets that it was desirable to leave out all definition of "intimidation." That was virtually the proposition now before the Committee. But he (Sir William Harcourt) had said on Wednesday—"Is what you wish to have intimidation left without a definition?" And, with one accord, they said, "No." Last night they all said "Yes." When the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets proposed to leave out all definition —

Mr. DILLON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was misrepresenting what was said. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets only said that he wished to leave out the definition of the Government, but not that he would not substitute another definition for it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT remarked, that even assuming that was the object, these words must be left in the clause, and, therefore, it was necessary that the Committee should negative the Amendment. If the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets did not wish to leave out all definition, it would be necessary for the Committee to go on in regular order. If the hon. and learned Member or the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) desired to have a definition of intimidation, they must have these words in the clause—"In this Act the expression 'intimidation,'" If the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets desired no definition, he was right in proposing to omit these words; but the hon. Member for Tipperary could not be right, because he said he wanted a definition. If the hon. Member for Tipperary and his Friends wanted some different definition from that of the Government, let them bring it forward, and the Government would consider it. If not, they would take their own. What he complained of was, that upon the Amendment Paper there was a singular absence of definition. The hon. Member for Tipperary said a great deal about desiring a definition; but he (Sir William Harcourt) did not find any definition except one by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins). Then, in the name of common sense, do not let them, in the interests of definition, strike out the words that were necessary to enable them to introduce a definition. That was not a reasonable proposition, and he would not be seduced by the hon. Member for Tipperary into going into any collateral issue as to the discussion which took place in 1875. For his own part, he was perfectly satisfied to be judged by what he did then, and he knew very well that the result of the Act of 1875 was to leave intimidation without a definition; whereas, by the Act of 1871, it had a definition. The Act of 1875 amended the Act of 1871 by leaving out the words of definition which it contained. The Lord Chancellor said, with reference to the Act in 1875—

"This is not an interpretation of the law of intimidation, and we may be quite sure that the interpretation will be given."

Well, that, he said, would be the case in the present instance.

Mr. SYNAN said, Irish Members were charged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman with wanting to exclude all definition; but the fact was, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) and Irish Members on those Benches resisted the definition because they wanted the Government to insert in the Bill a limit to the word "intimidation." The definition of the Government widened the meaning of the word, and brought under it things which, according to the law of intimidation, were not intimidation at all. If the Government intended the word to have the ordinary meaning, they would accept their definition; or if they gave the ordinary legal meaning of the word, they would not resist them. If the Government were sincere in their expressions, they would confine themselves to the legal meaning of the word. He understood the Government that the acts done should be done with the intent of producing injury to person or loss of business. They had not got the word "intent" in the clause, and if they admitted the first line of the definition, how could they depend that the Government would put upon the Table a definition which should be the legal meaning of the word "intimidation?" Would the Government also accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and say that the clause should not apply to exclusive dealing? It appeared, that while Irish Members were anxious to secure themselves by limiting the definition, the Government were intent upon widening it. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets was clear in his opinion that the Government aimed at exclusive dealing under this definition, and it was that which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford was intended to meet. He said Irish Members were fairly entitled to some further information and assurance from the Government; and unless they satisfied them that the acts done meant acts done with the intention of producing fear or injury to the individual, it was clearly the duty of Irish Members to resist the definition until that assurance was given.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he thought the question the Committee had to consider was whether "Boycotting," or, as the hon. Member opposite termed it, "exclusive dealing," was to be efficiently dealt with or not. The first consideration which governed this was as to whether the ordinary law had or had not been found efficacious in dealing with it. The answer was, that it had not. For the last two years "Boycotting" had spread over a great extent of the country. Besides the ordinary law, there was the unwritten law of the Land League; and he maintained that that law, as expounded by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), had been utterly unable to deal with "Boycotting." The hon. Member for the City of Cork, speaking at Ennis, said, last year, that "Boycotting" ought to be confined to cases in which men took farms from which others had been evicted; and he would not do the hon. Member the injustice of saying that he then made a mental reservation. On the contrary, he believed that his views remained the same now as they were 12 months ago on the subject of "Boycotting." It was clear, then, that this unwritten law had been inefficacious in the matter of "Boycotting" also; for schoolmasters had been subject to this persecution for expressing an unfavourable opinion, and persons also for having, as it was said, spoken disrespectfully of the Land League—in short, men in Ireland had been "Boycotted" for every assignable reason; for reasons which the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), who went further than he did, condemned. The hon. Member for the City of Cork, with all his influence and power in Ireland, had been utterly unable to repress this practice. Both the ordinary law and this unwritten law having failed, the Government were compelled to come forward and ask for this legislation. Now, he submitted that, if this clause were passed, it would deal effectually with "Boycotting;" but there remained the consideration whether it would interfere gratuitously or unnecessarily with the liberty of any considerable portion of Her Majesty's subjects. He contended that it would not; and, in concluding his remarks, he could not better illustrate the position of things than by referring to a conversation which took place between a gentleman and his neighbour some weeks ago. "Is not this a terrible Coercion Act we are groaning under?" said the latter. "Yes, it is," said the other; "but have we not been groaning under a more terrible one all our lives—the Ten Commandments?" "I do not think anyone who keeps the Ten Commandments need fear the Coercion Act." "I do not think they need," was the reply. He believed the people of Ireland wanted to keep the Ten Commandments, if only the hon. Member for the City of Cork would allow them to do so. As the clause would not interfere with anyone who did keep them, he, for one, was not afraid to vote for it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, notwithstanding his acquaintance with the Ten Commandments, the hon. and gallant Member opposite had not scrupled to break the one which forbade him to bear false witness against his neighbour, in saying that the majority of his constituents were in favour of this Bill.

very careful and anxious consideration; and the clause now under the consideration of the Committee was expressed in the form which, in the opinion of the Government, offered the best means of dealing with this matter. That being so, it was not for them to alter a clause which was the result of continued deliberation. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had said it was not the business of private Members to amend the clause. But, then, whose business was it? The Government brought forward a clause, as they considered, in the best possible form; and, he said, it was for those who differed from it to propose Amendments to it which they considered necessary. His hon. and learned Friend—himself an ingenious lawyer—had tried his hand upon the clause by bringing forward an Amendment, which he afterwards admitted would not do. That circumstance seemed to be rather in favour of the Government proposal. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) then tried his hand at amending it, and he could not satisfy himself. Finally, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) put down an Amendment, and the Committee had not accepted it. Up to the present time, therefore, he thought the Government clause had stood fire very well. His hon. and learned Friend, having brought forward an Amendment which did not satisfy his own mind, said that the last paragraph in the clause was no definition of the word “intimidation.” That was perfectly true, and the Government had always said so. Moreover, they had said from the beginning that they did not intend to define “intimidation;” and, after four days’ debate, he had only to repeat the statement. He was now asked to make a frank statement, and he said, in reply, that, in his opinion, it was impossible to define intimidation. That was the view taken in the Act of 1875; it was the view the Government had already stated, and to that they still adhered. His hon. and learned Friend said the last paragraph was not a definition—it included things which it ought not to include. But the Government thought otherwise; and if hon. Members were of a different opinion, let them discuss that question at the time when it properly came forward. His hon. and learned Friend had alluded to several alterations which had been proposed to the clause, and had asked him to say what he intended with regard to them. By all means let them be taken in order; but he submitted it was an unreasonable thing to ask him to mix them all up together, and to state what he thought of them collectively and individually, and what it was proposed to do with them by Her Majesty’s Government. Her Majesty’s Government proposed to submit the section as it stood to the consideration of the Committee, and, in turn, to consider the Amendments which hon. Members had put upon the Paper with a view to altering the clause. That seemed to him to be the reasonable and Parliamentary course to pursue. But he repeated that, from the point of view of his hon. and learned Friend, and from that of every hon. Member, the expression “intimidation” ought to be retained in the clause; and even if it were possible to define it, it must still stand part of the clause. The only issue before the Committee was that raised by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), that the clause should contain no definition at all. That was the question to be decided; and he was sure his hon. and learned Friend the author of the Amendment would admit that this was the sole issue before the Committee. By proposing to leave out the paragraph, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets said, in effect, “Let us leave the word ‘intimidation’ as it stands, without definition.” But the Government, while they did not think there should be definition, thought that there should be explanation; and, with this issue before them, he appealed to the Committee to allow them to go to a division.

MR. EDWARD SHEIL said, it appeared to him, from the observations they had just listened to on the subject of the clause before the Committee, that the author of it could be no less distinguished a person than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself. He hoped the Committee would not accuse the Irish Party, who offered opposition to this clause, of attempting to defend intimidation. What they protested against was that the interpretation of the clause should be left to the discretion of the Resident Magistrates, he thought that observation was justified. As the clause stood, it was literally correct to say that any act done or word spoken which two Resident Magistrates chose to think amounted to intimidation, constituted an offence for which the accused person might be sent to prison for six months. That, he said, was a power so wide and undefined as he would not be a party to committing to the highest Judges in the land, and it was, therefore, a power which, in his opinion, ought not to be given, if it could be avoided, to a tribunal presided over by Resident Magistrates. He had frequently said, with regard to this body, that with reference to many of them no complaint ought to be made; and he had always deprecated attacks upon them in that House, because they were placed in circumstances of great difficulty, and it was impossible for the House to judge in particular cases of the facts which the Resident Magistrates had before them. It was, nevertheless, the fact that this body did not possess, speaking generally, the confidence of the people in Ireland; and, therefore, he considered Her Majesty's Government were bound to say "Aye" or "No" to the question as to whether or not they proposed to introduce any limitation into this clause. If they intended to stand by the words of this definition, which he was prepared to show was no definition at all, then he thought the Committee should go to a division at once. But if it was proposed to introduce some definition which would render more certain that which was now left uncertain and at large, he said it was not the duty of private Members to introduce that definition. It was the duty of the Government to do this, who were bound to put before the Committee the form of the limitation, qualification, or definition, or whatever else it might be called, which they desired to have expressed in their Bill. Now, although he should not be in Order in discussing later Amendments, he hoped he should be allowed to say that the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) had put down an Amendment to this clause, and that the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer) had proposed words for the purpose of qualifying that Amendment. That being so, he asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary to read the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch, qualified as it was proposed to be, and say whether he would accept it. That Amendment, in its qualified form, would exclude from the Bill that which he ventured to say ought never to have been brought within it. Again, there was an especial reason why it appeared to him desirable that Her Majesty's Government should speak out at once. He, for one, said that there was some inconsistency, as had been pointed out by his right hon. and learned Friend, in at one time opposing a definition, and at another time insisting that there should be a definition. But the reason for that apparent inconsistency was that, if the definition was to be left as it now was, it would be better to have no definition at all. He (Mr. Russell) certainly preferred to have a definition which should clearly, accurately, and distinctly express what was to be brought within the purview of the clause and what was not; and, therefore, he respectfully urged upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman to tell the Committee in plain and unmistakable language, either that the Government did or did not insist upon the whole clause as it stood, and, if not, to state what were the limitations or alterations which they proposed. Because let the Committee remember that with regard to the clause now under discussion, which the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) proposed to omit, was not a definition in any sense at all. It was that the expression "intimidation," used in the clause, included any word spoken, or act done, calculated to put any person in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living. The term, therefore, remained uncertain and at large, and it would still be left to the magistrates to apply the word "intimidation" to any word spoken, or act done, as they might choose to think right. For these reasons, he said the Government ought distinctly to state their intentions as to the limitation, or otherwise, of the clause.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government could not be supposed to have decided upon the introduction of a clause of this character without very careful and anxious consideration ; and the clause now under the consideration of the Committee was expressed in the form which, in the opinion of the Government, offered the best means of dealing with this matter. That being so, it was not for them to alter a clause which was the result of continued deliberation. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had said it was not the business of private Members to amend the clause. But, then, whose business was it ? The Government brought forward a clause, as they considered, in the best possible form ; and, he said, it was for those who differed from it to propose Amendments to it which they considered necessary. His hon. and learned Friend—himself an ingenious lawyer—had tried his hand upon the clause by bringing forward an Amendment, which he afterwards admitted would not do. That circumstance seemed to be rather in favour of the Government proposal. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) then tried his hand at amending it, and he could not satisfy himself. Finally, the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) put down an Amendment, and the Committee had not accepted it. Up to the present time, therefore, he thought the Government clause had stood fire very well. His hon. and learned Friend, having brought forward an Amendment which did not satisfy his own mind, said that the last paragraph in the clause was no definition of the word “intimidation.” That was perfectly true, and the Government had always said so. Moreover, they had said from the beginning that they did not intend to define “intimidation ;” and, after four days’ debate, he had only to repeat the statement. He was now asked to make a frank statement, and he said, in reply, that, in his opinion, it was impossible to define intimidation. That was the view taken in the Act of 1875 ; it was the view the Government had already stated, and to that they still adhered. His hon. and learned Friend said the last paragraph was not a definition—it included things which it ought not to include. But the Government thought otherwise ; and if hon. Members were of a different opinion, let them discuss that question at the time when it properly came forward. His hon. and learned Friend had alluded to several alterations which had been proposed to the clause, and had asked him to say what he intended with regard to them. By all means let them be taken in order ; but he submitted it was an unreasonable thing to ask him to mix them all up together, and to state what he thought of them collectively and individually, and what it was proposed to do with them by Her Majesty’s Government. Her Majesty’s Government proposed to submit the section as it stood to the consideration of the Committee, and, in turn, to consider the Amendments which hon. Members had put upon the Paper with a view to altering the clause. That seemed to him to be the reasonable and Parliamentary course to pursue. But he repeated that, from the point of view of his hon. and learned Friend, and from that of every hon. Member, the expression “intimidation” ought to be retained in the clause ; and even if it were possible to define it, it must still stand part of the clause. The only issue before the Committee was that raised by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), that the clause should contain no definition at all. That was the question to be decided ; and he was sure his hon. and learned Friend the author of the Amendment would admit that this was the sole issue before the Committee. By proposing to leave out the paragraph, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets said, in effect, “Let us leave the word ‘intimidation’ as it stands, without definition.” But the Government, while they did not think there should be definition, thought that there should be explanation ; and, with this issue before them, he appealed to the Committee to allow them to go to a division.

MR. EDWARD SHEIL said, it appeared to him, from the observations they had just listened to on the subject of the clause before the Committee, that the author of it could be no less distinguished a person than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself. He hoped the Committee would not accuse the Irish Party, who offered opposition to this clause, of attempting to defend intimidation. What they protested against was that the interpretation of the clause should be left to the discretion of the Resident Magistrates, who, by their action, had already shown how little they were to be intrusted with such enormous powers, and the unkind treatment which people might expect at their hands. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had just told the Committee that he would not trust the powers of the clause to the highest Judges of the land. That being so, let the Committee bear in mind that the proposed tribunal of Resident Magistrates was deeply distrusted by the people of Ireland, and consider how far they were likely to have their respect and confidence in future. They were not even now to be trusted with the powers which they possessed; still less were they to be trusted with those powers which even the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary himself did not attempt to defend. Therefore, he hoped, even at that time, it was not too late—especially after the wise words uttered by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk—for the Government to re-consider their decision with reference to the clause. The Committee should bear in mind that the Resident Magistrates, who were to constitute the proposed tribunal, were closely linked with the landlords; and, although he said nothing at all against that class, there could be no doubt that, at the present moment, they were suffering under feelings of great dissatisfaction. That being so, it was not difficult to imagine what would be the consequence of placing this undefined power in the hands of men connected with a class labouring under a sense of what they believed to be wrong. It was only to be expected from such a tribunal that the powers of the Bill would be made use of in an unjust manner. He deeply regretted the position taken up by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary with regard to the clause, and could only say that as long as the Government refused the reasonable concessions asked of them, the opposition of his hon. Friends to the clause would continue.

Mr. CALLAN said, that unless some limitation of the clause was introduced, it was difficult to see what act done in Ireland might not be made to come within the operation of the Bill. The hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst) seemed, on the subject of intimidation, to have what was vulgarly called a "flea in the ear." The Clause said that intimidation "Included any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Now, it might be said that words uttered with regard to a Parliamentary Election which intimated to a candidate that he would be put to the expense of contesting his seat, came within the clause. Irish Members intended to put a great many Radical Members to intimidation, in the shape of the expense of a good contest at the next General Election; and he asked whether they were to be prevented putting Irish Radical Members to loss and damage in this sense on the decision of the Resident Magistrates that it was an act of intimidation? He himself might go down to the county of Cork and use words to the electors which would have the effect of putting the hon. and gallant Member opposite to the heavy expense connected with a County Election; he might have to go before the magistrates, and it might be sworn that he had done an act calculated to put a person in fear of injury to or loss of his property. The act might be held to be intimidation, and he would be liable under the Bill, unless the Home Secretary agreed to put some limitation on the paragraph. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman placed some limitation on the paragraph, his present objection would be removed; but, if not, under the circumstances he had described, he could only look forward to spending six months in the county gaol when the next election took place. The clause, as he had pointed out, referred not only to injury to the person, but to the fear of injury or loss of property; and he asked what would be a greater loss to a man than to put him to the expense of contesting his election for a large county? Very few Members, under such circumstances, would spend less than £3,000; and he ventured to say that no one was in a better position to confirm the accuracy of this statement than the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General after his experience at Taunton. He objected very strongly to the clause in its present form, and would remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary that, unless he agreed to place some limitation upon it, he would be adding to the length of the present discussion.

[Eighth Night.]

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the most forcible objection which had been raised to the clause was that it would be used as a means of preventing legitimate agitation. Of course, Her Majesty's Government said they did not mean that. He did not think that was their intention; but hon. Members opposite contended that this would be the effect of the clause unless it was amended. That being so, he suggested that it might be possible to add to the clause words to the effect that nothing in the Act contained should be held to subject any person to punishment for anything said or done honestly in the protection of his own interests or in fair political agitation.

MR. METGE said, the Government had refused, from the commencement of the discussion upon this clause, to give the Committee any definition of the word "intimidation." But the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had, in the course of yesterday's discussion, stated that the object of the clause was to put down "Boycotting," and that he intended to judge and criticize every Amendment proposed to the clause by that test. But if the intention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not to define the word "intimidation," and if his wish was that this clause should not interfere with the powers of the Executive Government in Ireland to put down "intimidation," why, he asked, did he not agree with the suggestions which had been made by Irish Members on that side of the House and upon the opposite Benches below the Gangway? He did not think that either the Committee or the right hon. and learned Gentleman believed that "intimidation" would cover all the forms of "Boycotting" which would present themselves to the minds of the Resident Magistrates in Ireland; and in the case of those men who would have to carry out the provisions of the measure when it became law, there would not be a moment's hesitation as to the way in which the word "intimidation" would be interpreted. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, he believed, in his definition of "Boycotting" took a wider view of the matter than was usual with other occupants of the Government Benches. But he (Mr. Metge) thought that the opinion of the Committee was not in favour of putting down "Boycotting" in a general sense, although all were agreed that some forms of it should be put down. But the clause which the Home Secretary said now was not an attempt at definition, was certainly an attempt at description, and of a very vague character. The first word of the clause pre-supposed a large area of other crimes which the Government had included in the term "intimidation." Now, his idea of a definition of this kind was that it should be purely explanatory, or that it should be a definition of a general term by a less general term—certainly not the reverse of that method of procedure. The position, then, in which they were left with regard to the clause was most unsatisfactory, so far as the word "intimidation" was concerned. But, apart from that, there were other words in the clause which were the cause of uncertainty on account of their vagueness. There was the word "calculated," for instance, which, to his mind, was even more dangerous than "intimidation;" indeed, to his mind, it was the most dangerous word in the clause, inasmuch as it was not to be taken in the ordinary sense, but in the sense as calculated in the mind of the magistrate, or rather in the particular frame of mind in which he might happen to be at the moment. Here, then, was a word which itself condemned that part of the clause in which it was placed; and, besides this, there were other words in the clause of an equally vague character, all of which required to be defined quite as much as the word "intimidation." He believed that if the clause remained in its present form, the very widest acceptance of these terms would be taken by those who would have to carry out the Act. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated in another argument which he advanced in support of the clause, that the meaning of "intimidation" was perfectly clear to the professional mind, but that the desire of the Government was to instruct the people of Ireland as to what was criminal under the law. This view seemed to him rather different to that which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just stated. But, whatever might be the real object of the Government in this matter, it was not so much the wish of Members near him that the Irish people should be so instructed, as that some limit should be placed to the freedom which the Resident Magistrates were sure to take in construing the Act.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, it appeared to him that the clause, inasmuch as it would interfere with the ordinary ways of social life in Ireland, would become an absolute impossibility. He asked the Committee to consider what the clause really meant, and to look for a moment at its wording. In this Act the expression "intimidation" included any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living. That being so, let it be supposed that a shopkeeper was doing a thriving business in a particular street, and that another man chose to set up another shop of the kind in the same street. That act might ruin the business or the property of the shopkeeper first alluded to, and reduce the man to a condition of absolute pauperism. Well, it seemed to him that, as the clause stood, that perfectly innocent act of competition in business was rendered an offence against the Act. Take the case of a newspaper. He was personally interested in this matter, because he was himself a newspaper proprietor; and he asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he would be at liberty to prosecute any person who set up a rival paper in the same city where his own newspaper was published? It seemed to him that he certainly had power, under this clause of the Bill, to prosecute and he should consider, if the event happened to which he had referred, whether or not he should use it. He would not detain the Committee by describing other cases to which the clause would be made to apply; but he repeated that it was an impossible clause, inasmuch as it covered a multitude and variety of things which could not reasonably come within the scope of a legislative measure. The application of the clause, moreover, depended on the discretion of a class of magistrates by whose judgment the people in Ireland were unwilling to abide. He contended there was no security or liberty for anyone under the measure, especially under this section of it, which was all-pervading and far-reaching; and Irish Members were, therefore, bound to limit its application if they possibly could, and to extort from the Government some definition which would restrict the injury and harm which was likely to arise under the clause. He heard the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary say on a former occasion that certain matters must be judged, not in respect of their probability, but in respect of their possibility. Acting on that advice, then, he judged that under this Bill any amount of confusion and disturbance was possible. If hon. Members could not amend the measure, they were, at least, bound to protest against it, and that they would continue to do to the last.

MR. BARRY said, he desired to make a suggestion similar to that which had been put forward by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen). It was believed in Ireland that the effect of this clause would be to stifle and prevent any kind of political agitation. Hon. Members were, of course aware, that the Government entirely disclaimed any such intention; and, that being so, he thought it would go a long way to remove public apprehension if the Government would insert some words to the effect that political agitation would not come within the scope of the clause. Without such a declaration, he was afraid Irish Members on those Benches could arrive at no other conclusion than that it was the deliberate intention of the Government to stifle or destroy all legitimate agitation in Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 130; Noes 49: Majority 81.—(Div. List, No. 121.)

DR. COMMINS said, although he had little hope of making an impression on the Committee after the very conflicting declarations which had been delivered from the Treasury Bench with regard to the intentions of the Government in the matter of this clause, and with regard also to the difficulty—nay, impossibility—of defining the word "intimidation," yet he would venture upon a definition which would be better than the so-called definition which was furnished in the Bill. He offered this to the consideration of the Committee, first, because of the utter inadequacy, from a legal point of view, of the definition which the clause contained. Intimidation, they were told, by this so-called description or definition, or whatever other name was to be given to it, included

[Eighth Night.]

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Now, he said that these words were so wide as to be inadmissible in any Act of Parliament—that they were so wide as to include every or any act of a man's life; that by them "intimidation" was so enlarged as to mean anything beside that which the act or word expressed to the person alleged to be intimidated by it. Whether or not that was the view which the Government took of the clause, it was its effect from the legal point of view. An hon. Member (Mr. Barry) had thrown out to the right hon. and learned Home Secretary a general challenge to say what was meant, and what interpretation was to be given to the words of the clause; but his hon. Friend was no lawyer, or he would have known that no declaration of the kind would have been worth the paper it was printed on. No Judge or magistrate, whether superior or otherwise, having to administer this Act, nor even a policeman, would be bound to pay the slightest regard to the Home Secretary's declaration as to the meaning of the words which the paragraph proposed to explain. It was the Judges, and the Judges alone, who could interpret an Act of Parliament, and the Judges did interpret Acts of Parliament by rules which were as well known as those of arithmetic. It was not for one moment to be supposed that men whose business it was to interpret Acts of Parliament passed during a period of 800 years would not know how to interpret this Act. Why, every legal interpretation, ancient and modern, would be exhausted by them in its administration. Therefore, he said, the clause must be judged by the words out of which it was constructed, and, taking those words, the definition might mean anything. To begin with, it did not answer the purpose of a logical definition at all, which meant what a term included, to the exclusion of everything else, and, so far from doing that, it gave no information whatever as to what it excluded, while it allowed you to include anything you liked. From the point of view, then, of the logician, the definition was utterly bad, and the student who offered the words in the paragraph as a logical definition of intimidation would probably be turned out of his class. The so-called definition was so ungrammatical and illogical as to be utterly worthless. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) and the hon. Member for Hereford (Mr. R. T. Reid) had respectively instanced the crimes of manslaughter and fraud as offences not defined in law. But, if they had been criminal lawyers, they would have known that there was not an indictable offence in England which had been more strictly and logically defined than that of fraud. The hon. Member for Hereford ought to have known that the whole catalogue of offences were most strictly defined which he said the law of England had never defined at all. No doubt, the hon. Member found a proposition laid down in some elementary treatise, that the Courts of Equity never defined fraud, because, if they limited the term, the ingenuity of the fraudulent would seek to go outside the limits laid down. But both the hon. Members in question, as well as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, who put forward this as undoubted law, forgot that the House of Commons was not now dealing with equitable principles, but with principles of Criminal Law; and so the absurd statement that fraud had never been defined, was used as an argument in favour of the legislation proposed to be created by this Bill. Now, there was no such offence known to the law as "Boycotting," and to say that the word "intimidation" meant that, was only to make the difficulty worse than it was before. It was impossible to get a definition of that term, because no two persons were agreed as to what "Boycotting" was. One person might consider it to be legitimate non-intercourse, and another legitimate exclusive dealing; and if this section of the Act were intended to prevent legitimate acts of that kind, all he would say was, that the Bill constituted an attempt at imposing upon the people of Ireland the grossest tyranny ever exercised in a civilized country. It was an invasion of the rights of humanity which no people would endure, and which would produce a thousand crimes in defence of those rights. He wished to examine whether this description was open to that charge. Intimidation, according to the wording, included

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Now, no act was criminal according to law unless the intent was criminal. Here, however, the word was not "intended"—it was "calculated." But the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said there were other words which would carry that meaning to be found in the Bill. If that were so, why were they not employed here? In whose mind was this word "calculated" to operate? Was it in the mind of the magistrate, or the policeman who happened to be getting up the case? Did this mean "calculated" in the mind of a nervous man or woman, or in the mind of some person spying upon another man's acts. Lord Hale, in treating of the intimidation which would reduce what would be otherwise murder to an act of self-defence, said that the fear which the law would take into consideration in judging that offence must be the kind of fear that would fall upon a brave and firm man and not upon a fool. But in this definition they had no restriction as to the kind of fear which the person intimidated was to suffer. He would now examine whether there was any single act which a man committed that might not put some person in fear of loss of property, means of living, or of injury or danger to himself, or some member of his family, and he began with the acts of a man's public life. Suppose a man attended a public meeting. Public meetings in Ireland were aggregations of large numbers of human beings. Mobs were liable to become riotous, and a person who considered that the action of an assembly which he attended was calculated to put him in fear would naturally be inclined to prosecute those who took part in it, and he might appeal to the words of the clause, and the magistrate administering the Act would be strictly and legally bound to convict according to the legal interpretation of the clause. Nothing more would be necessary than that the prosecutor should say—"It was calculated in my mind to cause injury to myself and put me in fear; therefore, I call upon you by the law to give these persons six months' imprisonment." That would be the result of a public meeting. He would now take the case of the private acts of individuals, and inquire whether any private act would be free from the construction which the apprehensions or fears of an individual might place on the acts of another. A man might go out after nightfall, wishing to call, say, upon a neighbour—now, it was well known that in Ireland persons never met each other without a form of salutation—and supposing this person happened to meet a policeman, or someone who he believed was ready to do him an injury, and passed him by without the customary salute, the person so passed by might say to himself—"This man has passed me without a salute; he means to terrify me, and he did terrify me." A prosecution might be instituted in this case under the legal interpretation of this section, unless the words were defined as he proposed they should be. He would now refer to cases which had occurred in Ireland, and in connection with which there had been some utterly illegal convictions—convictions which under this Bill would be now legalized. And here he would remark that it was a marked feature of the Bill that it made things legal which were formerly illegal, and other things illegal which before were legally done according to right and usage. Take the case of a person setting up a school in opposition to another already existing. A case of the kind occurred in the neighbourhood of Mallow. The Attorney General for Ireland would know this case very well, for it occurred in his own neighbourhood. Of course, the cry was set up that the second school was a school of the Land League; but not only was the person who established it prosecuted for holding a Land League school and exercising the ordinary occupation or profession of a schoolmaster, but he was sent to prison, and when he came back to the place he was driven out by the police. This was one of the most high-handed acts he had heard of

[Eighth Night.]

for some time, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had been compelled to offer some attempted justification for it. Then there was the case of a gentleman who went to pay a visit to a lady, and whom a policeman, without the decision of any Judge, but with that assumption of authority which was unjustified by any law of the land, ordered to leave the house. These were the kind of things which would be legalized by this Act. Again, fairs were very common in Ireland, and it was well-known that within the last few months, people, instead of going to the fair green at a place in Queen's County, transacted their business on the high road, and in this case, both buyers and sellers were prosecuted. There was probably a question of franchise connected with this, but the buyers and sellers had a right to meet on the public road and make their bargains. Under this section, these people could now be legally convicted. He would take another case of what had occurred within the last 12 months, and which, unless this clause were modified, might happen again. Again, they had heard a great deal of the cruelty of "Boycotting" a blacksmith's forge, and the loss of business consequent upon it. They knew that the amount of business for blacksmiths in Ireland was very small, and that, as a rule, an Irish village would only support one business of the kind; they knew that some blacksmiths had made themselves unpopular, and that other blacksmiths looking for business had gone to some villages and set up other forges there. These men were regarded as quite illegal blacksmiths, and under this Act could be prosecuted and sent to gaol, because they interfered with the business of other persons. The same with coopers; and, on similar grounds, they would be liable under this Act. He did not wish to detain the Committee with an enumeration of the instances to which he might refer; but he would say that there was scarcely an act of any kind, public or private, that any person in Ireland could do, but might under this Bill, if it were passed into law, be held by some magistrate to be to the injury or damage of a man's property, business, or means of living, or as tending to put him in fear of such injury or damage. But it was said that they were better off under the provisions of this Bill than the English people were under the Conspiracy Act of 1875, because the Conspiracy Act of 1875 did not define intimidation. But this argument, as used by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, did not hold water at all; because, to begin with, the clause or sub-section they were now discussing did not give a definition of what was to be construed as intimidation. All it did was to add other things to intimidation, instead of defining what intimidation was. The provision appealed to by the right hon. and learned Gentleman had been appealed to over and over again by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) as giving a definition of intimidation, and there could be no harm in him (Dr. Commins) referring to it again. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary to the point, because, although in the Act of 1875, in which they were getting rid of what was in the previous Acts—while in the present case they did not attempt to finish what that Act intended to do—the clause relating to this subject was so constructed as to restrict the meaning of the word "intimidation," and the cases which were to be considered as intimidation were kept within very narrow and easy limits, so as to afford a tolerable definition of an illegal act. The 7th section of the Act of 1875 was described in the side note as a section imposing a penalty for the offence of intimidation, or annoyance by violence, or otherwise. The section set forth that—

"Whosoever, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing an act which he has a right to do, or to do an act which he has a right to abstain from doing, without legal authority, uses violence to intimidate such other person, or his wife or child, or injures his property, shall be guilty of the offence of intimidation."

created by the Act. This clause defined the offence of intimidation, and the definition was a very good one as far as it went. It showed, in the first place, that the person intimidating must direct his violence towards some individual, because it defined a certain "other person, or his wife or child," and spoke of injury to the property of "such other person." Here, therefore, the words of the section set forth clearly that there could be no intimidation unless there was, first of all, a person to be brought forward who could be shown to have been intimidated, or intended to have been intimidated. The person accused of the offence of intimidation under that section must be shown to have intimidated some other person, or his wife or family, by using violence, or by injuring the property of that other person. The main point here was that there must of necessity be a person to be intimidated, and it must be shown that the accused intended to intimidate him or to injure his property. But how stood the case with regard to the section at that moment under the consideration of the Committee? That section was so rudely constructed that the person to be intimidated need have no existence at all; while in the Act of 1875 he must not only exist, but he must be set forth in the proceedings as the person it was intended to intimidate, or whose property was to have been injured, and this person must be brought into Court. It must be shown that the person so appearing in Court, or his wife or family, were intimidated, or intended to be intimidated, and the act of intimidation must be proved. But, under the present section, there need not be any specified person against whom intimidation was intended to be exercised. He might be anybody or nobody, and it need not be proved that the act done or the word spoken really had intimidated anyone, or that there was anyone who could be intimidated. They all knew that under the ordinary law it was a legal necessity that unless they had the person whose pocket was picked, or attempted to be picked, they could not prove the offence of picking or attempting to pick a pocket; but here they had a statutory provision, under which it was to be enacted that a man might intimidate a non-existing person, and by which he might be convicted of the crime of intimidation where no person was intimidated, or nobody existed who could be intimidated at all, or where no one need come forward to say he had been intimidated. This was very different from what had been done by the Act of 1875, which, as he had shown by reference to the Statute itself, had made it absolutely necessary, in order to constitute the offence it created, that there must be a person who had been intimidated, and not a vague and indefinite person who might have existed, or whom it might have been intended to intimidate, or whose property it might have been intended to injure, or whose wife or child it might have been intended to intimidate, and upon whom the act alleged must have taken effect. That which he had quoted from the Conspiracy Act of 1875 was, he wished the Committee to perceive, consistent with the whole force and bent of the English law as it was ordinarily understood and applied. According to the English law, as it had hitherto been construed, there must be a person to be convicted of the offence charged. It was one of those old maxims of the law of England which had been instituted by the wisdom of the past, and which had been steadfastly maintained for the purpose of protecting people from having false charges brought against them, that before any person had been convicted of an offence it was necessary that proof should be given of a corpus delicti. He saw one of the greatest lawyers in England on the Bench opposite to him, and he challenged the right hon. and learned Gentleman to bring forward a single instance in the whole Criminal Law of the country of an offence having been proved against any individual without there being satisfactory proof of a corpus delicti. He challenged not only the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but any other learned Member of that House to bring forward a single case in which this proof had not been necessary; and yet, in defiance of this well-understood legal maxim, it was now proposed to create, in an Act to be applied to Ireland, a new doctrine entirely subversive of the existing state of things. He did not think he need go any further to show how utterly dangerous was the description of intimidation sought to be introduced into this Bill, nor need he go further to show that the clause would be better, that the administration of justice would be rendered more safe, by striking out the words to which he objected, and leaving it to Johnson's Dictionary and to the common sense of the magistrates who would have to administer the law, to say what intimidation was, so that the people might know what they would have to avoid, and would be able to keep clear of the risk of conviction with regard to what they might do or abstain from doing. It would, he repeated, have been a great deal better to have left it thus. In the Criminal Law there ought to be no crime and no offence—and, practically, there was none at the present time known to the law—of which there was not some definition, so that persons might know what it was they had to avoid. It was a universal principle underlying all their Criminal Jurisprudence that it was utterly unjust, and, therefore, inexpedient, unwise and impolitic, as well as cruelly mischievous, that any person should be liable to be accused and convicted of an offence which he could not himself commit, and as to which there were no means of knowing whether it was an offence or not, and with regard to which the conviction was only to be obtained by ex post facto legislation to be administered by any “Justice Shallow” who might happen to be in a position of authority. For this reason, he urged that it would be much better if the Government or the Committee were willing to strike the objectionable paragraph out altogether, and trust, as he had already said, to common sense and Johnson's Dictionary for an interpretation or definition of the offence against which it was sought by this Bill to provide; at the same time, acting on the uniform, universal, well-established, and scientific principle of legislation he had endeavoured, it might be very presumptuously, to expound. Why, he asked, did not the Government adopt this course instead of adhering to their proposal, and attempting to do what the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had admitted that they were unable to do; what he had also said the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) had tried, and was equally unable to do; what the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) and the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce) were unable to do; and, lastly, what the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) was also unable to do, for the hon. Gentleman had made a suggestion, in reference to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had said he could not make a definition of the offence of intimidation? It might be exceedingly presumptuous on his (Dr. Commins') part to deal with such a question; but he had, at all events, made an attempt, and unless the Government were enabled to make a better one, he would submit his proposition to the Committee, in the hope that it might be deemed worthy of acceptance; and he did so on the ground that, however imperfect it might be in other respects, it would have the effect of narrowing the question, and of giving the Irish people to understand what it was they were to avoid, while it would also give the Justices clearly enough to understand what it was they would have to convict an accused person of having done. To begin with, there was one thing in his Amendment which, in his opinion, ought to recommend itself to the Committee on the very common principle that ought to be observed in legislating for Ireland, and, it was this, that it enunciated a cast-off principle of English legislation, which, like old clothes, in some cases, seemed to be good enough for Ireland; for the Irish people were glad enough to take occasionally these cast-off principles. In the Criminal Law Amendment Act, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had reminded them of, there was a definition of criminal intimidation. That definition was of such a character that it aroused the whole of the trades unions of England to something like frenzy, and the consequence was that they agitated the whole country against it. They held public meetings at which they denounced it, they presented Petitions against it, and they made it a leading topic on the platform of the Trades Unions' agitation from the year 1871 to the year 1874. So effectual was that agitation, that in the course of those four years they compelled the Government to withdraw that definition, and to re-cast the Act of 1871, of which the Committee had heard so much. And why had the Government done this? It was because they considered that it was too wide for application in England; it left too much to the discretion of the magistrates; it interfered too much with the freedom of trade in England; it afforded too much power to interfere with trade combinations in England. And when he offered it now, humbly saying it was a cast-off principle of English law, for the acceptance of the Committee, he urged that it ought, at least, to carry with it the recommendation that it was, as he feared, only the cast-off English principles that the Irish ever got. In the Criminal Law Amendment Act criminal intimidation was defined as such intimidation as would justify its being dealt with as an offence under the law—as any threatening, or attempt to intimidate, as would enable a Justice of the Peace, on a complaint being made to him, to bind over the person guilty of such threat or act of intimidation in securities to keep the peace. That was the provision contained in the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1871, and it was found that it was too wide for England—that Englishmen would not have it—that they felt it to be an intrusion on their liberties, and would, if insisted upon, tend to provoke the working classes to civil war. He thought, therefore, that the Irish people were not asking too much when they said they would be glad to have applied to them a law which the English working class would not bear even for so short a period as three years. They would be glad to get the law, even in that form. But he would say more than this, because he had drawn his Amendment in such a way as to include every act of intimidation that he had heard complained of in that House, and that might properly be said to be a criminal act. They had heard many eloquent descriptions of “Boycotting” in the course of these debates, and a variety of methods by which “Boycotting” was practised had been brought under the attention of the Committee. Indeed, many things that were said to be included in the resort to “Boycotting” were perfectly legitimate—things which, he asserted, could not be touched by the Bill before the Committee without attacking the most sacred and natural rights of the Irish people. The vulgar form of “Boycotting” included things which, assuredly, if any semblance of liberty was to be retained, the people of Ireland ought to be allowed to do. The Irish peasant, surely, was entitled to associate with whom he pleased, as long as he cared to associate with them; he was entitled to trade with whom he chose, so long as those persons did not improperly carry on any business requiring a Government licence, such, for instance, as that of a publican or a person licensed to let cars for hire; and he was also entitled to work for whom he pleased. If this liberty was to be denied, the Irish people would be placed in a worse position than that of the people of Russia—although there, no doubt, such a thing as the exercise or non-exercise of a man’s ordinary occupation might be punished as a criiminal offence. Nevertheless, here they found that, under the shallow and hollow name of liberty, hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House were coolly proposing to subject men to the grievous penalty of six months’ imprisonment for refusing to associate with those whom they did not like, and for refusing to work for those whom they considered to be infamous characters who were not deserving of their service. If they were to preserve the smallest semblance of liberty in Ireland, these rights must be retained. Her Majesty’s Government, no matter how loosely they might construct the law, or what persons they might intrust with the administration of it; no matter how they might oppress the people with soldiers and police; no matter what amount of intimidation there might be on the side of the Government—for, no doubt, this was an attempt to counteract intimidation by intimidation—no amount of intimidation it was in the power of Her Majesty’s Government to apply, unless they went back to a period of early Irish history and exterminated the people—shooting them at sight, as directed by a recent Circular about which they had heard enough described—unless this was what they intended to do, any provision like that contained in the clause under discussion would prove utterly inoperative; and, so far from having the effect of putting a stop to “Boycotting” and non-intercourse, and refusing to work for persons who were disliked, it would only have a tendency to aggravate the evil, and merely drive what now was discontent to desperation, and desperation to outrage. Under this Bill, if passed, they would only find results similar to the results of like Acts of oppression which had been inflicted on Ireland in past years, often without even the sanction of the law, and it would be seen that the consequences of further legislative oppression would be the mere repetition of acts and scenes which no one in that House deplored more than he did. Therefore it was that he now came forward with an endeavour to safeguard the last remnant of human liberty in Ireland—the last remnant of social freedom, and the means of social and commercial intercourse. Of course, it might be said that this might be very unpleasant to some people; but he would point out that the evils inflicted by oppressive legislation had been very unpleasant to some people, and the desperate social remedies to which they had been driven in consequence had been so very unpleasant to many people, that he had heard the right hon. Gentleman the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, from his place on the Treasury Bench, describe them as outrages on humanity. Two years ago, before the right hon. Gentleman became indoctrinated with the spirit of Irish diplomacy, before his good intentions had had their first blush rubbed off, he had heard him say that the landlord who, in the then state of the country, used to the full his legal rights, would be deserving of the execration of humanity. These were high words, and he (Dr. Commins) distinctly remembered their being used in that House. But they did not hear such language now. At the present moment, instead of these people being said to be deserving of the execration of humanity, it was those who merely exercised their human privilege of leaving others alone who were to be deemed deserving of the execration of humanity, and the infliction upon them of the penalty of death by military execution. He threw down the challenge to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, or whoever else had charge of the Bill, to point out one single act of that class of "Boycotting" which was understood in the ordinary and vulgar application of the system so-called, that ought properly to be restrained by the intervention of the law, which would not be included within the four corners of the Amendment he asked the Committee to adopt. Let the Government suggest any such act that was not included in the Amendment, and if he found that this was so he would include it. Hon. Members on the Opposition Benches below the Gangway had been challenged to produce their definition of intimidation, and they had answered the challenge. Her Majesty's Government had confessed themselves incapable of furnishing a definition, and he (Dr. Commins) now came forward and said he was ready with a definition, which he now furnished—a definition that would include every offence and every possible combination that could be engaged in with intent to do illegal damage to a third person. If this were not enough for the Committee, if they wanted something wider than his Amendment, all he could say was that the spirit which had hitherto characterized the law seemed to have somewhat gone out of it, while those who were engaged in the framing of the law preferred that it should remain vague and obscure, and appeared to be animated by the spirit of those who, in ancient Rome, hung up the Twelve Tables so high that the people were unable to read them. He would put it to the Committee whether it was possible for any reasonable man to say, before the civilized world, that the laws which were to govern Ireland were made so that the people of that country could be expected to understand them? Under this Bill, it was proposed to create an offence that could not be defined; and he maintained that this was done as a snare or pitfall which was to be laid for the Irish people by a class of officials who had always been looked upon as the oppressors of the people. He was sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the Committee, and he must thank the Committee most cordially for the attention with which it had received his most imperfect observations. He would conclude by saying that unless something better than the definition of intimidation at present inserted in the clause were furnished by the Government—if, in fact, the Government persisted in their expressed intention, and adhered to the description or definition, such as it was, that they had already given, they would leave the Bill open to the observation that it was a measure not directed against violence, not directed against crime, not directed against injustice, but one which was in reality directed against public opinion. In which case he told Her Majesty's Government that in the long run they would find public opinion to be too strong for their Bill, and too strong for themselves. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Dr. Commins

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 25, to leave out all the words after the word "intimidation" to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words "shall mean any words spoken or act done against any person from which he would have reasonable grounds to apprehend that the person using such words, or doing such act, intended to do him some illegal damage, or to cause or incite some other person or persons to do him such damage, in such manner as would justify a justice of the peace, on complaint made to him in that regard, to bind over the person guilty of such language or act in securities to keep the peace."—(Dr. Commins.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'includes' stand part of the Clause."

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he hoped the Committee would accept the Amendment just moved by his hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins). If they made no other step in the shape of altering or amending the Bill, they certainly ought, in his opinion, to adopt this proposal, because if the clause were to be left in its present shape, with its wide and sweeping language unaltered, it would be open to any Justice of the Peace to put any construction he might think fit on the word "intimidation."

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, there were many things in the clauses of the Bill to which he objected, and there were some to which he had the strongest possible objection, and among the latter was the paragraph in the clause then under consideration, which the Amendment moved by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) proposed to omit, and for which it was intended as a substitute. The words used in the clause were—

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

This would leave it open for the magistrate before whom a case was brought to put his own construction on a word that might have been used by someone in a passion, but who only used it in the heat of the moment, and had no intention to do any injury. As to the words—

"Or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living,"

it might be that a man might lose his property, business, or means of living, by the mere result of ordinary opposition or competition in his trade. It was quite possible for one man to thoroughly destroy another's business by commencing an opposition to him in the next street; and if the Committee was to legislate in this loose way and give such wide scope to the magistrates in their interpretation of the clause, they would find that many persons would be committed to prison who ought not to be so dealt with. If, however, the Committee accepted the Amendment, it would have the effect of furnishing such a definition of intimidation as would prevent the sweeping constructions that would otherwise be put upon innocent words and acts by magistrates, who would not be at all scrupulous in going to any length they were enabled to do. There were several other parts of the clause that were very objectionable; but if the Committee accepted the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) these objections would be greatly modified, for that Amendment would define the charges on which a man might be brought before the magistrates and convicted in the penalties imposed by the Bill. It certainly appeared to him a very hard thing that because a man who had been worked into a passion might make use of words which he had no intention of carrying out—expressions which he only suffered to escape him in the heat of the moment—he should be liable to be brought before a magistrate, and committed to prison for a term of six months, for having said what was calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself or family. It might be held under the clause, as it stood, that one man threatened to do injury to another by setting up in business and starting an opposition trade. Therefore, he thought that if Her Majesty's Government intended to permit any change to be made in the Bill or to accept any Amendment, the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Commins) ought to be adopted. If, however, the Government were determined to throw down their Bill on the Table and say they must have the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill, it would be of no use to attempt making any further Amendment. If, on the other hand, they were disposed to listen to reason, he would strongly recommend them to accept this Amendment. There was nothing objectionable in the Amendment, nothing that could be regarded as wrong; and it would not alter the Bill very much if adopted, but would merely show the Irish people that they need not be afraid of the measure, unless they choose to commit themselves by acting in an unlawful manner. What he wanted to see secured was the protection of the men who were innocent, and who, having made use of words they were sorry for directly afterwards, ought not to be subjected to the heavy penal consequences of this Bill. If the Committee would accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Commins), they would be affording this protection by putting the offence of intimidation in a definite shape.

MR. O'KELLY said, he regarded what had taken place with regard to this clause as a striking illustration of the temper of the Government. The matter now under consideration was very important. If Her Majesty's Government simply meant to deal, as they had previously intimated, with actual acts of violence, or with acts tending to incite to violence, he thought they might very fairly accept the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins); but, from the silence they had hitherto observed with reference to that Amendment, it might, perhaps, be assumed that they had definitely made up their minds to make no concession to the Irish Members in the passage of this measure, and that they intended to insist on the passage of every clause in the Bill, whether it was reasonable or unreasonable—and no matter how unreasonable the Irish Members might show it to be. If the clause stood as it was originally drawn, without amendment, it would be the means of inflicting very great hardship and injustice on the Irish people—not on any small class in Ireland, but on the general population of the country. The effect of this clause would be very widely felt, because it would place the people completely at the mercy of every policeman and every hanger-on of a landlord or of a landlord's agent in Ireland; and he assumed that the Government scarcely desired to place so unreasonable and unconstitutional a power in the hands of irresponsible persons. If the Government would only go so far even as to pledge themselves to the Committee that this measure, stringent as it was in many of its provisions, should only be put in force with the consent of the Executive Government in Ireland, they might then have some guarantee that it would not be used for the purpose of executing local vengeance, or for the satisfaction of petty spites. But, in its present form, there was no guarantee that every maliciously-disposed person in the country might not make use of the Bill, when passed, for the purpose of wreaking his own private vengeance; and, so far from contributing to the peaceableness of the community, the constant tendency of the operation of the measure would be to promote friction among the people. If Her Majesty's Government would accept the definition offered by this Amendment, the people of Ireland would at least be able to form something like a clear notion of what was legal and what was not legal—of what they might do under this measure, and what they might not do. If the Government insisted on maintaining the clause in its integrity, no one would be able to understand what were the limits of his rights—what he would be at liberty to say, or what act he would be at liberty to do. This he held to be a most unreasonable state of things, and one that no sensible Government ought to promote or be the means of bringing about in any country. According to the Amendment, any person who might be in any way injured, or in any way threatened, or put in danger to his person or his property, by which he could seek protection under the existing law, would be able to go into Court and punish the person who had attacked or threatened him; and he was sure that this would supply the Executive in Ireland, and those who had to administer the law in that country, with ample powers for dealing with any system of "Boycotting" or of social ostracism that might be attempted in Ireland.

MR. LEAMY said, he would not pretend to say he was at all surprised at the Government not accepting the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend (Dr. Commins), because he assumed that by this time they had made up their minds not to accept any Amendment that might come from that quarter of the House. The Government were determined not to accept any advice it received even from its own supporters, including some very distinguished lawyers; and by insisting on carrying the clause under discussion without amendment, they were committing to the Irish magistrates a power which ought not to be given to anyone. It seemed to him that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had inserted words in the clause that would have included any word spoken or act done by any person in Ireland, he would have given the Committee about as good an indication of what was intended to come within the purview of the Bill as he had done by what he called his explanation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had told them he was not able to define intimidation, and stated that he had not attempted to do it; but he had endeavoured to explain what was meant, and the explanation was that any word spoken or act done that might be calculated, in the opinion of the magistrates, to put any man in fear of injury, or loss of property, or business, or means of living, was intimidation. He (Mr. Leamy) confessed that he failed to see how any magistrate, acting honestly under the powers given by this Bill, could refuse to sentence, either to a mild or a long term of imprisonment, anyone who criticized the conduct or character of another, or spoke ill of another in regard to the conduct of his trade. If a man ventured to suggest that the goods of a particular shopkeeper were not worth buying, or told a friend that he could get a better class of goods from one man than from another, he would, under the operation of this clause, be liable to be brought before the magistrates, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. There was nothing in the clause which stated that the surrounding circumstances were to be taken into account. It would be quite enough for a man to say to another—"I advise you not to deal at such a person's shop, because you cannot get good articles there," to bring a man under the penalties of this Bill. The Amendment would, if carried, have the effect of rendering any man liable to be sent to gaol under the Bill, provided he used such language or did such act as under the Act of Edward III., which conferred large powers, would enable the magistrates to bind a man over to keep the peace. They had, within the last few months, seen men bound over to keep the peace in Ireland under that Statute; and they knew very well that in the opinion of the present Irish Government the conduct of the magistrates, in the judgments they had given under that Statute, was regarded as harsh, as was shown by the action the Executive had since taken. Anyone who had had experience of the numerous and varied cases in which the magistrates were able, under the Statute of Edward III., to bind people over to keep the peace, would see that if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) were accepted, in nearly every case—he might say he was sure it would happen in every case—in which the Government would desire the law to interfere the magistrates would have power to send any man to gaol under this Bill. But he supposed the Government must be considered to have resolved on carrying the Bill as it stood. They had come to the determination that when once they had put a word into the Bill it could not be taken out again without somehow going back on the principles of good government, and all that sort of thing. They had also seen, during the last few days, in the discussions that had taken place on this Bill, that the moment Her Majesty's Government ventured, even ever so slightly, to speak in favourable terms of some Amendment or suggestion from the Benches occupied by the Irish Members, some Conservative occupant of the Front Bench immediately got up and said to the Government—"Oh, you must not do such a thing. Why should you speak in such a civil way to hon. Members opposite? The Irish people will think you are not in earnest, that you are not sincere, that you mean nothing, if you give way on this point." The Government knew very well that they could carry the clause. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary said that evening, the clause had stood fire very well during the last three days. Why, if the Irish Members had riddled the clause, and it had been also riddled by the supporters of the Government, so that they had not left one single word of the clause, as originally drafted, in its place, the Government, and the majority they had at their back, would set the clause up again exactly as it was before. What, therefore, was the use of hon. Members riddling a clause, if the Government were determined to force it down their throats? Of course, it was the duty of the Irish Members to protest against this course.

Mr. O'Sullivan

They all knew very well that the effect of the administration by the magistrates of the new Bill would only be to further exasperate the people. They would be convinced by what was now proposed that they had nothing to hope for from the great Liberal Government which had come into Office with such sounding promises for the amelioration of the condition of the Irish people, and winning them over to the side of law and order by making the law something which they could respect, and could not in every case afford to complain of. But how had these promises been kept? This Bill was not intended to afford protection. As the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had pointed out, there was a wide difference between this measure and the English Act of 1875—the Act which the English workmen obtained to relieve them of restrictions and prevent undue interference with the right of combination. The hon. Member had shown that the magistrates, knowing the spirit in which that Act was introduced, would feel it their duty to be as slow as possible to punish those who were brought before them under it. But in this case they had a Bill which said that every act done, or word spoken, that might be deemed calculated to injure anyone in his business or property was a crime; and it would be almost impossible for any magistrate, however desirous he might be to administer the law fairly, to allow a single act or word brought to his notice to go unpunished as a crime. He should be glad if they could get some intimation from the Government as to whether or not they intended to leave out the last words of the clause—the words “any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.” It appeared to him that, as the clause then stood, if a tenant said to his landlord, “I won’t pay my rent,” he could be summoned to the Court and sentenced to three or six months’ hard labour. Did the Government intend that because a man might refuse to pay his rent, or said he had not enough money, and would not pay for a month or more, he should be sent to gaol for that? Because, if a man used such language, he would be clearly saying that which was calculated to put his landlord in fear of injury and loss of property. When a tenant said he should not pay his rent then, or he had not the means, the landlord might very likely be in some fear that he would never get his rent at all, and, as his rent was his property, that would be fear of the loss of his property; and he (Mr. Leamy) did not see how any magistrate administering the law could pass this over. It was, he was afraid, evident that the Government were resolved to carry the clause through as it stood in the Bill. They had done the same thing last year, and they had failed in the object they had intended to secure; and he had very little doubt that when the House of Commons met again next Session the Government would be compelled to admit that this latest Coercion Act was as complete a failure as the last had been.

Mr. Leamy

Mr. HEALY regretted that this Amendment must exclude consideration of the next, because it would be necessary to put in the word “include,” and he did not know whether the Government had any objection to inserting that word. The opposition of the Government was an extraordinary one. They wished magistrates to have power to sentence men to six months’ imprisonment for anything that they could imagine; and they proposed to place no limitation upon that power whatever. He would like to hear from the Government whether their position was one of a non possumus character, and whether they refused to give any concessions and no reasons for their refusal. It was not usual, when an Amendment had been moved, for the Government to say nothing upon it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) had, in speaking upon this Amendment, dealt with many things which were really outside the scope of the Amendment, and had given a number of illustrations of cases which he said would come under the clause, but which he (the Solicitor General) thought it would be impossible to bring under the clause. The hon. and learned Member had left out of sight the fact that, in order to bring any person within the scope of the Act, any act done or word spoken must be done with a view to coerce someone to do something he did not wish to do. Those were the governing words of the clause, and that purpose must be proved in every case in which an offence was alleged against any person. The hon. and learned Member said he had taken the grounds of the Amendment from the Act of 1871. It was perfectly true that that Act contained, not exactly this definition, but something in the nature of this definition of intimidation. But that definition was abandoned when the Act of 1875 was passed; and the hon. and learned Member was mistaken in saying that the agitation which took place was against that definition of intimidation. It was directed against a different part of the Bill altogether—namely, that relating to molesting and obstructing, and had nothing to do with intimidation or the definition of intimidation. When the Act of 1875 was passed, it was thought wiser not to define intimidation, and, therefore, intimidation was omitted. He could not think the hon. and learned Member had been so successful in defining intimidation as to meet all cases, which he should have thought every hon. Member would desire to meet under this Bill. If that definition were accepted, the only cases in which a man could be punished for intimidation would be those in which he had done acts or uttered words in respect to which he could be bound over to keep the peace. Surely there had been sufficient illustrations during this debate to show that acts were done in violation of liberty in Ireland—and admittedly so done by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and others—which would not come within this Amendment at all; and the hon. Member for the City of Cork admitted that it was desirable to put a stop to “Boycotting” which was used for purposes of a most objectionable and cruel character—to prevent persons obtaining the means of livelihood, and so starving them into submission to a course which they thought was not the right course. He thought many hon. Members would join with the hon. Member for the City of Cork in wishing to put down that practice; and when the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon proposed to alter this clause in order to leave some vestige of liberty, as he said, to the people of Ireland, he would remind the hon. and learned Member that what the Government desired was that the people of Ireland should be left free, and should not be coerced and forced by intimidation to what their consciences condemned. He could not imagine, in the name of liberty, any invocation of tyranny greater than that from the Irish Benches. Why was it the Government desired to see this clause passed? He did not think even Irish Members could doubt that it was because it was revolting to one's whole nature that a man should be forced and driven by the acts of others, and by the fear of starvation, to take a course which his conscience condemned. Could there be more horrible tyranny than that? When he thought of those who had been thus coerced and driven against their own will and desire, it was very difficult to be altogether patient with criticisms, some of which were conceived directly against the Bill, as though it were a wicked thing to endeavour to put a stop to crime. If a better way could be shown of doing this, or if there were mistakes in the drafting of the Bill, by all means let that be done, and the Government would anxiously and carefully consider the objections, and would do everything possible to put down the terrible affliction which had been visited upon many people in Ireland. Who were the people the Government wished to protect? The Irish people. [Mr. HEALY: The Irish landlords.] It was something new to him to learn that Irish landlords had not a right to be protected from intimidation. Had even an Irish landlord no rights? Was it wrong to protect him, and leave him at liberty to act within his rights as a landlord? But he denied that it was the Irish landlords whom this Bill was designed to protect. The Irish landlords were one class, and a very small class, of those whom the Bill was designed to protect. There was not a class in Ireland that had not suffered more than landlords—peasants and farmers had all suffered from “Boycotting” infinitely more than landlords—and, therefore, he denied that the Bill was intended to protect landlords alone. It was for all men and all classes in Ireland; and he should have thought that the hon. Members opposite might have been willing to assist rather than impede the carrying into effect of a clause which would have the effect of preventing intimidation and coercion of a kind which seemed to be of the worst and most cruel description that could be imagined. The course which the Legislature had pursued might be bad; but the coercion by men actuated by selfishness and evil passions was infinitely worse than the most mistaken coercion of the most mistaken Government that ever existed. He altogether demurred to the view of the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon, that there was something wrong in putting a stop to this coercion, and the Amendment now before the Committee would not meet that case; and that was his objection to it. There were kinds of intimidation which hon. Members below the Gangway opposite admitted were not justifiable; and he thought he had fulfilled the demand that was made upon him by stating, in as plain terms as he could, the reason why, although they were willing to fairly consider any Amendment that was consistent with putting an end to what he should have thought all would desire to stop, it was impossible to accept an Amendment which really would not meet many of the cases which even the hon. Member for the City of Cork had admitted the Government ought to put an end to. On these grounds, the Government could not accept the Amendment.

[Eighth Night.]

Mr. HEALY said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had entirely mistaken the points of his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment. His hon. and learned Friend desired a limitation of the word "intimidation," because he feared the powers given under this Bill would be abused. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not attempted to meet that in the smallest degree. He had stated a number of truisms which nobody could dispute; but they were altogether beside the question. The hon. and learned Gentleman said nobody had a right to compel a man to do what was revolting to his conscience. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman maintain that proposition? He remained wisely silent, because, no doubt, he remembered the Vaccination Act. A man might be obliged to do some things which were revolting to his conscience in England or in Ireland. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman said it was not the Irish landlords alone who were to be protected. Whence came the demand for this Bill? Who asked for it? Where were the Petitions in its favour? He would challenge the Government to show a single demand from anybody in Ireland in favour of this Bill. He and his hon.

Friends represented Ireland in a much stronger sense than anyone on the Treasury Bench. Where, then, was the demand? The Judges had already condemned the Bill twice in succession, and the Prime Minister was altogether evading that point, knowing that the first portion of the Bill was absolutely condemned by those who were intended to carry it out. Was there a demand from any "Boycotted" class for this particular Bill? Could the Government show one man in Ireland who would say that this Bill would do the smallest atom of good? What was "Boycotting?" It might be said that a man should be compelled to sell provisions; but how were people to be made to buy them? A man in Ireland might be compelled to sell bread by the Intimidation Clause of this Bill, under which he could be sentenced to six months' imprisonment; but people could not be compelled to buy his goods, so that this Bill was ridiculous, useless, and absurd, except as a Bill to give magistrates vindictive power. The Government said intimidation was so Protean that it could not be defined; and the Home Secretary said that some cases of intimidation, when it took the form of refusing to supply provisions, would be dealt with by six months' imprisonment. If a man took his butter or cattle to market, would people be punished by six months' imprisonment for not buying of him? If not, what was the good of this "Boycotting" clause? If there were two blacksmiths in a town, people could not be prevented from dealing with one of them and not with the other; but, under this Bill, a man might be sentenced to six months' imprisonment for saying that he would deal with only one of the smiths. Therefore, he could not see what advantage this Bill would give from the Government point of view, while he could see great disadvantages. The Solicitor General said coercion was worst of all when motivated by evil passions. The Irish Members contended that the evil passions of magistrates in Ireland was the worst form of coercion that could be conceived, and, therefore, they were the most unfit persons to exercise those powers. A member of the Land League might be brought before a magistrate, and the magistrate would sentence him to six months' imprisonment simply because of his membership. Would the Government say they were not going to use this Bill to prosecute members of Associations for bringing down rents? The Bill was intended to prop up the landlord system in Ireland. It was intended for the use of landlords, and would be administered by landlords or those in sympathy with landlords, only to prop up landlordism and nothing else. The people of Ireland wished to know what was to be crime in Ireland in future. The Home Secretary said people would be told plainly when this Act was passed. But that was not the case, because there was an absolute difference of opinion among the Government themselves. The Prime Minister said exclusive dealing was not a crime; but the Home Secretary thought it was a crime. Which of the two voices in the Cabinet was to be believed? The people of Ireland were told they must obey the law; and would the Government say what the law was? The people had no guarantee that this Act would be used fairly by the Government for its ostensible purpose. He was quite willing that if a man was being starved to death, measures should be taken to prevent that; but he was not willing that, if a man refused to buy another man's butter, he should therefore get six months' imprisonment. If the Government could show any distinct ground for the Bill, the Irish Members were quite willing to meet them; but they did nothing of the sort, and there had been no demand in Ireland for the Bill. It was purely motivated by English opinion. The Government had brought in this Bill simply because they considered their existence imperilled, and they were met by Tory Gentlemen, who said great danger would arise unless this clause was retained as it stood. He considered "Boycotting" to be a thing which neither this Government, nor any other Government, could prevent; and in India "Boycotting" was maintained by the Government. The caste system in India was a species of "Boycotting." If a man belonged to one caste he would be refused fire or food or water by another caste; and the Government maintained that system because it was in accordance with the predilections of the people. It was "Boycotting" in Ireland, however, that was to be struck at. Men who joined together to prevent themselves from being starved were to have no pity from the Government. The Solicitor General was very sympathetic about those ruined by "Boycotting," and who, he said, were tyrannized over for doing what they had a right to do; but the Solicitor General forgot that the root of this system was the system of landlordism. The people were being ruined by the Government and by the landlords. Was there no "Boycotting" in that?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has never yet come to his speech in support of the Amendment which is now before the Committee. I must remind the Committee that if we are to discuss the whole clause on every one of the 20 Amendments on the clause, it will be impossible for the Bill to get through Committee this Session. There is a particular Amendment before the Committee now, and I must ask the hon. Member to keep to that question, which is to insert certain words.

MR. HEALY said, he was dealing with a proposal to leave out the word "intimidation." The Government said that intimidation was of so Protean a character that it could not be defined.

THE CHAIRMAN: We are dealing with the word "includes." The last Amendment practically concluded with the whole of the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), and stand part of the clause.

MR. HEALY said, his hon. and learned Friend proposed to define intimidation, and he was obliged to consider what intimidation was not; and he was considering intimidation from the point of view of the Government. Therefore, as intimidation was Protean, some latitude of argument was necessary and almost inevitable; but he had not the slightest objection to conclude his remarks, while urging that, in dealing with intimidation, there must be considerable latitude.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, he could not support the Amendment. He had carefully followed the discussion, and considered that the concession made by the Government with regard to the words "in order to," to be proposed hereafter by the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen), met every difficulty in the case. The word "calculated," standing by itself, might have led to difficulty, because it might comprehend a tradesman refusing to supply a customer with goods. A customers might be indebted to a tradesman, and the tradesman might ultimately say he would not serve him with further goods—as tradesmen sometimes did when they could not get their bills paid—and in that case the words “calculated to put any person in fear” might have amounted to a case of exclusive dealing, which would bring a tradesman within the proposed Act. As the words “in order to” had been accepted by the Home Secretary, he had no fault to find with the clause, and he thought that Amendment would get rid of the first class of exclusive dealing cases—although he should have preferred the words “with intent to” to “in order to;” but, at any rate, they had much the same meaning. Then there was the case of a third party going to a shop and telling the shopkeeper that if he served A or B with goods it would be the worse for him. There was a clear case of intimidation, and that would be abundantly met by the clause as proposed by the Government. Then there was a third class of cases in which it was difficult to allege direct or positive intimidation, where a number of tradesmen combined and, without any communication with the person they wished to ostracize or “Boycott,” refused to serve him with goods. In such a case, although there was not positive intimidation, there was constructive intimidation; and there was a well-known case in the Law Books, in which Lord Bramwell delivered an able judgment on a Common Law offence which was really “Boycotting.” Lord Bramwell said every man had a right to have not only personal liberty, but also liberty of his mind and his actions. If a number of men set themselves up to deprive him of that liberty and coerce him, Lord Bramwell said there would be abundant evidence of a Common Law offence, and would bring the offenders within the law of the land. Hitherto such a case had been only indictable; but now, by this Bill, the Government proposed to make it subject to summary jurisdiction, with an appeal to Quarter Sessions. On the whole, he thought the Irish Party ought to feel that the limitation of the words would get rid of any difficulties they felt as to the possibility of exclusive dealing, which was legitimate, making persons liable to penalties under this Act. With regard to “Boycotting,” he had received a letter from a highly-respectable gentleman in Ireland, in which the writer said “Boycotting” had done as much harm as any other cause, and no redress could be obtained at the present time except by indictment. For the last six months he had been unable to get a horse shod or a man to work for him, and members of the Defence Society, who had been induced to enter his employ, had been refused food altogether. The writer said he was unfortunately settled in the land, and had been shot at and “Boycotted” for six months past for spending his life and fortune among people whom he could not very much respect. That shooting and that “Boycotting” was still going on to a very great extent, and it was necessary for the Government to take this matter firmly in hand and to root up this gigantic evil.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR observed, that if this clause was put into operation in Ireland by magistrates like the hon. Member who had just spoken, it would not have received so much opposition as it had received; but the magistrates in Ireland were not of that character, and, therefore, Irish Members took a view of the Bill which could not possibly occur to the hon. Baronet. It was rather difficult, under the different rulings that had been given, to discuss any of these clauses with any feeling of safety. If they were to have a certain Amendment, they must be at liberty to consider what the Bill would be without the Amendment. The Solicitor General had said he thought the Irish Members would have been almost grateful to the Government for such a measure as this, because it was intended, not for Englishmen, but for Irishmen; and therefore, they ought to be delighted to have the ægis of the police and the magisterial power thrown over the unfortunate Irish people. He recollected having heard the same thing said last year very often with regard to the Coercion Bill; but he had yet to learn that the people of Ireland had any reason to be grateful to the Government for introducing that measure; and he was not at all disposed to think that there would be, in the future, any reason for blessing Her Majesty's present Advisers for introducing this measure. But the Solicitor General seemed to have entirely mistaken the object of this Amendment. The object was not to protect “Boycotting” in any sense whatever. It was proposed in order to afford reasonable protection to persons who would otherwise be exposed to unjustifiable and petty tyranny. If a man was proceeded against under the Act of 1875, it was necessary to show that he had committed one of the offences specified in the Act, and the same sort of protection ought to be extended to the Irish people in this measure. That was a very reasonable request, and he had heard no logical or reasonable answer from any portion of the House to that application. Under the Act of 1875 it was necessary to show that a man had been guilty of using violence to or intimidating any other person, or his wife or child, or injuring his property, or persistently following him from place to place, or hiding his tools, clothes, or other property in use by such other person, or preventing him or hindering him in the use thereof, or watching or besetting his house or other place where such other person resided or worked or carried on business, or happened to be on the approach to such house or place, or following such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road. These were the offences, one of which must be specifically shown against a man, under the Act of 1875. But it was not enough for the Government now so to lay down the limits beyond which a charge could not be stretched under the Act of 1875, and to specify things which should not be considered intimidation. A further provision in the Act was that—

“Attending at or near a house or place where a person resides or works, carries on business, or happens to be on the approach to such house or place, in order merely to obtain or communicate information, shall not be deemed a watching or besetting within the meaning of this section.”

That was a very important safeguard; and the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon (Dr. Commins) wished that to be added to this Bill, in order to give the people of Ireland the same sort of protection as had been given to the people of England. A well-known writer on the liberty of the subject and the security of the person, who dealt with every branch of the English Criminal Law, said that, under the head of modern definitions of intimidation, the principle of protecting workmen against workmen was stated in sufficiently general terms, and included all persons whatsoever, and was no longer a piece of class legislation, and that, whenever any person, whether a workman or not, who had a legal right to do or abstain from any act, was wrongfully and without legal authority, and with a view to compel him to act against his will, persistently followed, watched, or beset, the law said at least a penal offence had been committed. That being the case, and these terms being of local application, he (Mr. A. O'Connor) thought it would be difficult for the Solicitor General to prove that such a case as he had contemplated would not be covered by these terms. The Solicitor General pointed out that the agitation between 1871 and 1875 was not directed against the Intimidation Clause of 1871, but against the molestation and obstructive provisions. Then he drew the distinction, and admitted that there was a distinction, between obstruction and molestation and intimidation. If that was to be admitted in the English law why not in the Irish law? The Irish Members wished to introduce some such limitation as would be provided by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Roscommon, in order to protect the Irish people. In England the particular act charged against a man must be specified clearly, and it must be shown to come within the provisions of the Act of 1875. But if a man was arraigned under this Bill the police-constable would be able to adduce the most trivial, trumpery, and ridiculous charges—even the slightest glance or word of advice—and say that that, in his mind, was calculated to put somebody else in fear. In fact, there was nothing a man could do of a most innocent description which might not, upon the interpretation of the constable, make him liable to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, and that without the protection of a jury. That was perfectly monstrous; and he would urge on the sense of justice of English Members to interpose to prevent the passing of such an iniquitous enactment. At any rate, some logical argument or really solid reason should be shown for placing the liberties of the Irish people under the heel of the local magistrates and police. No such argument had ever been advanced.

Mr. DILLON said, the Home Secretary, in replying to some observations of his some time ago, had made a great mistake. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that at least some of the Irish Members had made a declaration that they did not want a definition of intimidation, while other Members did desire a definition. The Irish Members would rather not have a definition than have the Home Secretary's. They would rather have the word "intimidation" undefined than have the Government definition, though they would much rather have their own definition. He was reminded of what took place during the debates on the Act of 1875. The Government of that day were urged to give a definition of the word "intimidation" by the present Attorney General, who was then on the Opposition Benches, and he pointed out that if the word was not defined no specific action would be required to constitute an offence, and thus making faces at a workman's child might be construed as an offence under the Act. The Government of that day met that argument by practically promising that, although the word was left undefined in the clause, it would be defined by the interpretations which the Judges would place upon it; but did the Party now in power accept that? Nothing of the kind. They divided, and the Government only carried their proposal by a majority of 10, the whole of the Liberal Party opposite going against the word "intimidation" being left undefined. Now, because it was an Irish Bill that was introduced, not only would the Liberal Party not do what the Irish Members asked, and leave the word undefined, but they must put in a definition which left the word ten times worse than if it was undefined. Notwithstanding the superior rhetoric of the Home Secretary, he would not be able to throw dust in their eyes. They would rather have the word undefined, because they believed that the decisions of English Judges, and the precedent of the English Act, would rule the definition of the word in Ireland. A counsel defending a man could appeal, as authorities, to the decisions of the Judges under the Act of 1875 in England. The Government knew that perfectly well; and it was with a view to depriving Ireland of that privilege that they put in this definition, which swept into the nets of this clause everybody in Ireland who looked crooked at the wife or child of an Irish landlord, or any man who refused to return the "Good morning" of a landlord. There was a man now in Dundalk Gaol imprisoned for refusing to do that. If a man refused to say "Good morning" to a man who had taken a farm from which another man had been evicted, that would be intimidation under this Act. It would be quite sufficient for a person who was well known, and had some influence, to turn his back on such a man. If he (Mr. Dillon) went into a town, and, in the presence of a large number of people who knew him, refused to take the hand of a man he had previously known, he should be held guilty of an offence under the Act, and the man could swear he had intimidated him, and created public odium against him. If this Act was passed, he dared not refuse to shake hands with a man he had previously known. Did the Government mean to say by this Act that he, or any other man who was known to have some influence with the people, were bound to conciliate a man, and speak respectfully of him, and to take his hand, or, if not, to be accused of having done an act "calculated to injure him in his business or means of living?" There was not the slightest doubt that such a case would come under this clause, and he had no doubt there were people in Ireland and in Tipperary who would gladly sentence him under it. The Irish Members wanted intimidation defined. They wanted to know what the law was in Ireland, and not to have arbitrary power set up; but they would rather have the word left as it was in the English Act than accept the definition of the Government, and, therefore, their first object was to get a proper definition, as proposed.

Mr. HEALY said, he thought the Attorney General for England seemed amused at the suggestion of the hon. Member, that a word or a look might render him liable to six months' imprisonment; but a Miss Reynolds, in the Queen's County, had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for merely saying, when some policemen seized the carts and horses of a man, that although they might seize the carts, they could not compel anybody to drive them. If a man who was known in the neighbourhood refused to shake hands with another, or to go on the same side of the street with him, he would be held to have intimidated the other man. He challenged the Prime Minister to show that there was any intimidation in the act of Miss Reynolds; that there was a bit more or less that was offensive in the eye of the law than the case of which his hon. Friend had stated would be likely to put him into prison. It was an extraordinary thing that Irish Members, standing in opposition to and challenging this Bill, were in the same position exactly as the Attorney General when he was fighting the Act of 1875. The Attorney General, at that time, said that by leaving the word "intimidation" undefined, no overt act or anything would be required to obtain a conviction. Was that still his view? No. He now said they were dealing with a Liberal Government and the stipendiary magistrates whom the Government would appoint, and, therefore, there would be no fear. The Attorney General had further said that the mere making of faces at a workman's child would be sufficient to constitute an offence; but he sneered at the hon. Member (Mr. A. O'Connor) for saying that if he refused to give a man a salute he would be imprisoned. When the hon. and learned Gentleman was out of Office he could take a very different view of what intimidation was. Ought he not to be ashamed of himself to sit upon the Treasury Bench and defend a position so contrary to the position he defended in 1875? He was obliged to defend that position now, simply because he was English Attorney General, and the Irish Members were in the position he had deserted. The hon. and learned Gentleman would not have got the position he now held if he had not taken that course. Last year the Prime Minister said exclusive dealing was not a crime, but now brought in a Bill which made that a crime. What were they to do with a Government of that kind? On the one hand, there was the Attorney General defending the position he assailed a few years ago; and on the other hand, there was the Prime Minister, who last year said exclusive dealing was not a crime, this year bringing in a Bill to make exclusive dealing a crime. He himself (Mr. Healy) had an Amendment on the Paper, declaring—

"That no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either; and no declaration of intention not to so deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing, shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

Would the Government accept that clause and insert it in the Bill? No; they would not. The Prime Minister last year was not opposed to exclusive dealing; this year he made it a crime. The Attorney General four or five years ago had his own view about intimidation; this year, simply because he was across the floor of the House and was Attorney General, he took a different view.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member had made a somewhat strong attack upon the Government in general, and upon one Member of it rather more directly than the others. He (the Attorney General) had been of opinion in 1875, as he was now, that some overt action was required to complete the offence of intimidation. The House of Commons consented to the Statute of 1875 becoming law, and what had been the result? Had any injustice resulted from the acceptance of those words? He maintained that no injustice had fallen upon any individual, and he was prepared to contend that no injustice would follow the passing of this Act. There was much more to be said in relation to what occurred here. There were no Sub-sections (a) and (b) in the Act of 1875; there were no such safeguards and protection in that Act as were given in this case, because in this Bill, in consequence of what occurred in Sub-sections (a) and (b), intimidation must be used with a certain view and object—intimidation must be used with the view and object of injuring some person or persons. It was quite right to say that exclusive dealing was not to be treated as an offence; and it was equally true to say that it was to be treated as an offence, and for this reason, that the offence must depend upon the circumstances under which exclusive dealing occurred. He did not know that "exclusive dealing" was a proper term to use. If the right of choice of your tradesmen or customers, as the case might be, proceeded from a right motive, exclusive dealing would be perfectly legal. It would, for instance, be perfectly legal for a customer to say, "I will not deal with you because you do not keep good articles;" or for a tradesman to say, "I will not sell to you because you will not pay me, or because your family has got the fever." That was the exclusive dealing which the Prime Minister said might be resorted to. It was quite a different thing when there was exclusive dealing for the purpose of depriving a man of food. When a man said, "I will form a part"—separate or individual action, it might be—"of a collective system to prevent a man getting food," which was the means of life in the country, he would be guilty of the exclusive dealing which was aimed at by this clause. Although no reason might be given, the offence must depend upon the circumstances. He could not judge of what the tribunal would say in any particular case. It was correct for hon. Members to say that the Prime Minister said that exclusive dealing was a right thing; but the exclusive dealing in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman was not exclusive dealing done with a view to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons had or have a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing any act which such person or persons had or have a legal right to do. It was, therefore, a mere matter of phraseology which was being dealt with. He did not wish to enter now into the general matter in relation to the clause; but he would say, that when it was said they were interfering with liberty of action, this clause was intended to give freedom and liberty of action to every subject in Ireland. They intended that a man should not have his views controlled by those who said, "If you do not do a certain thing, we will not deal with you; if you take a certain view on political and social matters, we will put you under a ban." He asked hon. Members whether, in order to preserve the right of individual action which was so requisite for good government, a clause of this kind was not necessary? He would not go into detail, because it seemed to him they were always drifting away from the leading matter under consideration. The hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) asked that there should be no offence unless the intimidation was accompanied by actual violence, or by a threat of violence. They had departed from that position long ago, and he did not think the Amendment was one which could be accepted.

Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN said, very little light had been thrown on the subject by the speech they had just listened to from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. They now learnt that the question of motive arose in the matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman said there was exclusive dealing which might be harmless and legal, and there was exclusive dealing which might be illegal, and the legality or illegality would lie in the motive of the man who practised this exclusive dealing. Then they were to have an inquiry into a man's motive, they were to have an Inquisition in the case of any man who was supposed to be practising exclusive dealing against any particular shopkeeper. They talked of foreign Inquisitions; but was there ever a more stringent and a more absurd one than this, that a man should be brought before an Irish magistrate and made to declare the motives which influenced him in not dealing with a particular person? Ordinary social life would be impossible under such a law. He could give them an instance of one purpose to which the law might be applied. There were in Dublin a number of shopkeepers known as the "Lion and Unicorn" tradesmen, specially patronized by Dublin Castle. These tradesmen set up over their establishment a rampant Lion and a tremendous Unicorn, gilded and painted in a most brilliant fashion. Under this law it would be a crime for people to refuse to leave their money with the "Lion and Union" shopkeeper. Suppose one of these loyal gentlemen said—"My business is declining, although I have the 'Lion and Unicorn' and the words 'By special appointment to His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant' over my shop; these seditious people pass my door, and take their money elsewhere;" and suppose he laid a charge against some person who formerly dealt with him, but did not do so now; the accused would be brought before the magistrate and asked to declare his reason for no longer dealing with this loyal shopkeeper. It was an absurdity, but such proceedings were quite possible under the Act. The clause was so drawn as to bring within its scope every human being in Ireland.

This legislation was aimed at the whole Irish nation, and it was left to the discretion of a magistrate to say what punishment a man should receive for any simple act he might do or word he might utter. It had been admitted over and over again that this was an impracticable clause; it would be absolutely impossible to work it to the full extent, and it would depend upon the temper of individuals how far it would be used and abused. Under the circumstances, he considered the clause, from first to last, obnoxious, and, of course, every proposition that went in the direction of limiting the evil contained in it would receive his hearty support.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, that, according to the Attorney General, they were not to be alarmed by this measure because of the example in the English Act. But the evil would lie in the working out of the measure. All cases arising in England under the Act of 1875 were to be investigated by juries; but in Ireland the cases arising under the present Act would come before Resident Magistrates or a tribunal composed of Judges, and not before juries. He could not help thinking, when the hon. and learned Gentleman was speaking, what a marvellous being, in the opinion of the Government, a Resident Magistrate must be. The Prime Minister shrunk from defining what was intimidation; the Attorney General dared not define intimidation; but the Resident Magistrates of Ireland could be safely trusted to define it with perfect justice and accuracy. What Parliament might not venture to do a Resident Magistrate might do. More than that, so great was the trust put in his impartiality that the Resident Magistrate might even inquire into the motives of a man. The clause unamended was certainly imperfect and unsatisfactory.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that hon. and learned Gentlemen had told them that exclusive dealing in itself was not improper, and was not an offence; but that if it were resorted to with a bad motive it became an offence. Although the Attorney General vouchsafed this information to them, he did not tell them what evidence would be required to prove the motive. If the Attorney General would give them in the Bill some indication of the proof required, it would assist the Committee very much, because in Ireland they were to have to administer this law tribunals of a peculiar nature. Last year one of the tenants of Lord Kenmare was sent to prison because he could not pay his rent. He (Mr. Biggar) supposed that under this Bill a tenant would be sent to gaol if he did not come to pay his rent on a particular day, although he might not have the means to pay his rent at all. He agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) that there was no proper definition, and that what was intended ought to be made clear. It was very easy for people to avoid a breach of the law if they knew what the law was; but in this case they were told that the law depended upon the whim of individual magistrates. The Solicitor General had told them that anything done under this clause must be done with a view to coerce. Now, that was not a correct reading of the clause, because the word "coerce" did not appear at all. The word "cause" was used, and that was a word much more easily satisfied in the mind of an Irish magistrate; so that, in point of fact, this argument of the Solicitor General was quite defective. Of course, they all agreed that anything calculated to coerce, or to intimidate, or to take the personal liberty of the subject, was, in the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, most objectionable, and should be put down. But in Ireland they knew very well that this law would be so administered as to very injuriously affect a particular class. The persons who had the administration of the law in their own hands would always take care that, while the persons belonging to their own class should escape all punishment, the members of the other class should suffer very severely under the Act. All manners of coercion were used by landlords and agents and bailiffs for the purpose of getting impossible rents from impossible tenants. Tenants had been turned out of their holdings, and no account had been taken of the improvements and goodwill which, in many cases, was greatly in excess in point of value of all the rent due. Tenants were often deprived by the landlords of the means of living; in fact, the coercion practised by landlords towards tenants was far greater than the coercion exercised by tenant farmers against landlords. In regard to "Boycotting," if the practice came to the worst, and there was a refusal to supply the necessities of life, he (Mr. Biggar) did not suppose that any personal inconvenience would arise, because if one tradesman did not supply goods another would. He suspected that in many cases shopkeepers refused to supply goods to a needy landlord because he did not wish to give him any further credit. The case of the Government was a very unfortunate one; they created intimidation an offence, but they could not explain it. They expected the Bill to be properly interpreted and administered by the magistrates, who had no legal training, and who had not even the advantage of the advice of a professional man. This was haphazard legislation, and the decisions under such a clause as the present must be of an irregular and haphazard description.

[Eight Night.]

Mr. P. MARTIN said, he had listened very attentively to the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and regretted to find no answer had been given to the simple question which his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) had so clearly and forcibly submitted for the consideration of the Government. The great bulk of the Irish Members, as he stated, were dissatisfied with and condemned the attempt made in the Bill to define the offence of intimidation. It was a definition plainly loose and vague, and an imperfect and inadequate definition was, unfortunately, likely to cause want of uniformity and injustice in the sentences pronounced by those magisterial tribunals. Then, under the circumstances, as the Irish Members were willing to leave the offence without definition, as was done in the English Act, why should the Government persist in a refusal which must inevitably result in a great waste of time? In his (Mr. Martin's) hearing, the Prime Minister stated in the House a couple of days ago that he was anxious that, in every way, this Irish measure should bear a strict analogy to the English Act. If in the English Act there was no definition of intimidation, why should it be sought to put in this Bill a definition of what the Government themselves said it was impossible to define accurately? Why not leave the matter to the Court if they had confidence in that Court, though the Irish Members might not have confidence in it? As the hon. Member for Tipperary pointed out in the clearest and most forcible manner, there was every reason why they should do this, because the decisions in the English cases would be a guide and a check to the Irish Court in adjudicating upon cases of intimidation. Why, therefore, not strike out this intended definition of what the Government frankly admitted it was impossible to define? Why not leave the matter to the Court, in the hope that it would be guided by the English decisions? With all respect to the Government, he must confess that they were on this occasion provoking a great waste of time. It was only two days ago that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary asked the Irish Members sitting opposite—Did they contend, or would they be willing, that there should be no definition? He must say the impression left on his mind, and, he would submit, conveyed by the words used by the Home Secretary, was that he could not accept the words by which the offence was then sought to be defined. But, if it was demanded, he was willing there should be no definition of intimidation, and to leave it to the discretion and judgment of the tribunal under this Act, as in the English Act, to say whether an offence had, or had not, been committed.

Mr. PARNELL said, he wished to support the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) in the suggestion he had just made. The hon. Gentleman had suggested that the Government might save a great deal of time by withdrawing cumbrous, clumsy, wide, and inconclusive definition, and allow the clause to pass without it. What would the Government gain by continuing in the non possumus attitude which they had taken up in the various stages of this Bill—by asking the Committee to accede to a certain definition of intimidation which would make it impossible for anyone to do anything or to say anything without breaking the law, if the stipendiary magistrate chose to say that the particular act or word constituted intimidation? A great deal of capital had been made by the Government out of the practice of "Boycotting," and they had expressed their determination to put it down; they had said they would not allow anything to be cut out of the Bill which would deprive them of the power to put down "Boycotting." He did not think the Government cared anything at all about the power of putting down "Boycotting." He believed their object was simply to put down combination to deprive the Irish people of the right of combination. He was perfectly willing they should take power to put down "Boycotting," if they could not put down anything else by means of such power. If they would bring forward an Intimidation Clause, giving them power to put down "Boycotting," but which, at the same time, would preserve to the people the right of combination, he would be quite prepared to agree to it. This clause, however, in addition to giving them power to put down "Boycotting," gave them power to put down the right of organization or combination. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented.] It was perfectly useless for the hon. and learned Gentleman to express dissent. The clause did give the Government the power he (Mr. Parnell) had described. This appeared to be the situation, and he would ask the Government how long they wished this entanglement to continue? Let them take power to put down "Boycotting," but leave to the Irish people the right of combination. The present clause went a great deal further than that, and the Irish Representatives objected to fit on that ground. Did the Government wish to give a labourer the right to leave his employer's service? "We do," said the Attorney General for England; "but it must depend upon the circumstances." It must depend upon the digestion of the stipendiary magistrate, and the hon. and learned Gentleman must know that was so. A person accused of intimidation in Ireland was to be deprived of the protection afforded by trial by jury, but he was to be left at the mercy of the stipendiary magistrate. Under such circumstances, it was perfectly unreasonable to ask the Representatives of Ireland to abate their opposition to the clause, or to any portion of it, by one iota. What rights would the Government allow in Ireland; what would they permit to be said or done in Ireland? They had not defined their ideas in their Bill, and they had not defined them in their speeches. The Committee were in a state of blissful ignorance, and that ignorance would only be removed when a number of respectable men had been sent to prison for six months with hard labour. The position provided by the Bill was not one in which the Government ought to expect the Irish people to be placed; it was not one in which the Representatives of the Irish people ought to allow their constituents to be placed. He and his hon. Friends would have to contest the Bill at every step and at every stage. He could not but think that a desire on the part of the Government to promote the progress of Public Business, and to proceed with those measures of conciliation which had been foreshadowed, would induce the Government to accede to the request of the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin), which was that they should drop the tail of the clause, and consider what saving section they should add hereafter. If they would now omit the last paragraph of the clause, they would be able to consider the situation between this and Report, and make progress with their Bill. It would be perfectly within their power hereafter to introduce, if they desired to do so, such definitions as might seem suitable to the clause.

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. DILLON said, it was very hard for the Irish Members to understand the way in which they had been met by the Government. Yesterday, and on several previous occasions, the Government stated, over and over again, that they were perfectly willing to let the term "intimidation" stand without any definition at all. ["No, no!"] The Government on the Opposition Benches did not say so, but the Government on the Treasury Benches distinctly said so. The Irish Members had always said they wanted a definition of intimidation; but, recognizing that they were not a majority, they were prepared to make a compromise. They wanted a definition; if they could, they would insist upon it. They had a perfect right to a definition, and the Members who sat opposite were committed to a definition, having voted for it, over and over again, on behalf of the English working men. He and his hon. Friends were aware of their weakness, and they were prepared to accept an open intimidation clause—that was, they were prepared to abandon their position in favour of an open clause, in the hope that the decisions of the English magistrates and the English County Court Judges would form some check upon the reckless proceedings of the Irish magistrates. While the Government were holding out to them that this was an open intimidation, they still stuck to what had been correctly described as the tail of the clause, which was a plain incentive to the magistrates to interpret the clause in a certain and given way. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had very properly said that the judgments under this clause would depend upon the digestion of the magistrates. The judgments would depend upon the wishes of the man who paid for the last bottle of champagne. It was well known where the magistrates of Ireland got good dinners; it was well known that the fate of many men was settled around the dinner-tables of landlords; it was well known what would be done with the magistrate who interpreted the law in a fair and honourable way—he would be “Boycotted,” he would be deprived of his dinner, and of his bottle of champagne. He (Mr. Dillon) was stating what was a notorious fact in Ireland. He might state that, whereas in the English Act there was a clause stating that neither an employer of labour, nor his father, nor his son, should adjudicate as a magistrate upon a case in which he was personally interested, a clause providing that neither a landlord, nor his brother, nor his son, should sit on a case in which he was personally interested, was not likely to be introduced in this Act, because the effect of it would be to sweep away the entire Bench of stipendiary magistrates. He would like a Return to be laid before the House showing how many stipendiary magistrates who would have to administer this Act were either landlords, or brothers or sons of landlords. The Attorney General had just said that no injustice had resulted from the open Intimidation Clause in the Act of 1875. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, forgot what he (Mr. Dillon) had pointed out frequently—namely, that when the Bill of 1875 was passing through the House, there was, practically, an assurance given that the interpretation of the clause in the Courts of Justice would be based upon the charge of the Recorder of London, and he believed the clause had been so interpreted. He was satisfied that if intimidation in England had been interpreted in any other spirit than in accordance with the Charge of the Recorder of London, there would have been a great outcry, and, long since, there would have been a measure introduced to adequately define intimidation, and thus protect the working man. He was so satisfied with the manner in which the English Act had been interpreted that he was willing, on behalf of the Irish Party, to accept an open intimidation clause as a compromise.]

[Eight Night.]

Mr. Dillon

DR. COMMINS said, this was a strange sort of clause. If they looked at it on paper, they found it resembled a scorpion, for the sting of it was in the tail. He had previously explained the principles of the English law, and he had asked to have those principles extended to Ireland. In the request he was joined by his hon. Friends; but what was the result? They were denied the extension of the principles of the English law to Ireland almost with mockery. They were told, in the speeches which were made to defend this “scorpion tail” that the Government would not tell the people of Ireland what the law was; that they would not follow precedent; but that they would leave the interpretation of intimidation to the ignorant prejudices of the most interested and least trusted class in Ireland. Class legislation of the worst kind was being enacted in this Bill. He had tried to introduce Amendments founded upon the principles of the English law; he had tried to introduce a principle which would enable people to know what they might do and what they ought to avoid; he had tried to introduce a principle which was sought to be introduced in the English Act, but which was rejected because it was inconsistent with all ideas of English liberty; yet the people of Ireland would be glad of its introduction, because it would give them some rule of life. But he had on every occasion met with signal failure. This clause gave the people no idea of what was right and what was wrong. The Act of 1875 had been appealed to over and over again. The great principle of that Act was that every decision might be revised by a Superior Court—the Court of Queen’s Bench. The accused, too, had the inestimable advantage of being tried by jury. He had to be tried upon indictment, and the indictment had to define the offence; it had to clearly lay down how the man had transgressed, and it had to be tried by a jury and before the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, or a Judge of the land. Moreover, when any question of law arose, a case might be reserved for the Court of Criminal Appeal, and the definition of the Judge might be heard on the point. In this instance, the accused could not appeal to the Judges of the land; he could not go to the Court of Queen's Bench; he could not appeal to an official interpretation of this nebulous and indefinite sort of crime. The man was to be left at the mercy of a magistrate, in whose hands this power was being placed to crush anyone who engaged in a political or social agitation. The Irish people were willing to accept the principle of the Act of 1875. Why did not the Government give it them? Would the Government refuse to give the people any guide as to their action? He challenged any of the Law Officers of the Crown to say there was a single thing in the practice of "Boycotting" which constituted a legal offence. He did not believe it was possible to cite a single instance in which "Boycotting" had amounted to a crime in the eye of the law.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the subject was fully gone into when the hon. and learned Member was absent.

DR. COMMINS said, those who had heard the discussion would be able to form their own opinion; but he was confident that no such instance of absolute crime resulting from "Boycotting" could be cited. He maintained that this was an attempt on the part of the Government to establish anarchy and call it law. He was afraid the Government were determined, by this section, not so much to prevent crime and anarchy as to place a weapon in the hands of one class to use against another class. He warned them not to forget that the class they were trying to arm were only counted by thousands, whereas the other class were counted by millions, and never could be crushed by this or any other Government.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 163; Noes 35: Majority 128.—(Div. List, No. 122.)

MR. HEALY said, he wished to move, in page 3, line 25, after "any," to insert "unlawful." He believed the Government would have no objection to the insertion of this word, because it was to be found in the English Act. He presumed, as a matter of fact, that the word had only been omitted from the Bill by mistake. He had simply copied it out of the English Act, and hoped the Government would have no objection to insert it in the Irish Act.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 25, after the word "any," to insert the word "unlawful."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'unlawful' be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not quite understand what part of the English Act the hon. Gentleman referred to. As far as he could see, the Amendment, if adopted, would make the clause read—

"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes any unlawful word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear," &c.

and would really not have any sense in that part of the provision.

MR. HEALY said, he had not had time to refer to the English Act; but this part of the clause, as it stood, seemed to be absurd. It was—

"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

Supposing a man had infringed his patent, and he said to that man, "I will bring a lawsuit against you to restrain you and recover damages," that would be a "word spoken" calculated to put a person in fear of "injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living." Therefore, as the thing stood, it was simply absurd. If a man owed him 5s., and he told him he would bring an action against him if he did not pay it, that would be a word spoken calculated to put the man in fear of injury to his property or means of living; and he (Mr. Healy), for speaking that word, would be liable to prosecution and imprisonment for six months with hard labour. Surely the Government saw the absurdity of that, and would have no hesitation in accepting this very small and legitimate Amendment.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the point could be argued very shortly. The hon. Member had referred to the English

Act of 1875, and that Act gave a very clear analogy, but not in the direction pointed out by the hon. Gentleman. Under this Bill, certain forms of molestation, which were not in themselves criminal, would be regarded as criminal. The English Act of 1875, in the same way, made certain acts criminal which were not in themselves criminal, such as persistently following a person about and hiding his tools. These acts were not criminal; but they were declared to be acts of intimidation. He would give an instance of a form of molestation, which, though not in itself criminal, must clearly be regarded as criminal in the Bill. One form of molestation not uncommon was that of leaving a man's gate open so that his cattle might stray away. Such an act would only be a civil trespass; but acts of that nature done persistently, in order to frighten a man and prevent him from paying his rent, should be included in criminal offences. If they accepted this word "unlawful," a great many of those acts which it was the intention of the Bill to render criminal offences would be lawful.

MR. PARNELL said, this was too nice a distinction—it was a piece with the whole of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said that if a person left a gate open, that might be construed by the magistrate before whom he would be taken as an offence calculated to intimidate. If a man, in passing through a field, left a gate open, so that cattle could stray out, it might be held to be intimidation, if the owner of the field or the prosecutor chose to take that position. It was a monstrous thing to allow such a charge as this to be tried before the Court of First Instance, and yet this was a fair example of the kind of action that might be constituted into an offence under the Bill. It was a monstrous thing that a Liberal Government should exist, capable, by the mouth of its Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, of laying down such a doctrine as that the Committee had just listened to, and capable of striving to pass such an Act.

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was almost unworthy of the hon. Member to press that matter. He (Mr. Trevelyan) had been arguing this case, not to score a point against the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), but, as he had thought, for the purpose of carrying conviction to the minds of hon. Members opposite, in the minds of men who, as he had believed, had been following him closely. They must know that the words as they were in the clause formed an integral part of his argument, looking at the words which were precedent to them, "wrongfully and without legal authority."

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 192: Majority 160.—(Div. List, No. 123.)

MR. REDMOND said, he wished to move, in page 3, lines 25 and 26, to leave out "word spoken or." His reason for moving this was because the sub-section, as it stood, left it entirely in the discretion of the tribunal as to what was to constitute an act done or word spoken calculated to intimidate. Were it not that this was left to the discretion he should not object to the words he proposed to strike out. Under the circumstances, considering the kind of tribunal that was to try, he was anxious, in every way that he could, to modify the sub-section. The position of the Irish Members with reference to the sub-section was perfectly clear. They desired, if they could, to have intimidation defined. If they could not get it defined as they desired to have it in the Bill, they wished to have the sub-section left out altogether; but, failing that, they were anxious, word by word, to modify the effect of the sub-section. He must say that before they went further, he trusted the Government would give them some intimation that they desired to meet the views of the Irish Members on both sides of the House, and the views also of some English Members. He would not unnecessarily take up the time of the Committee, but would content himself with moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words, "word spoken or."—(Mr. Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was impossible to accept this Amendment, as its effect would be to remove from the operation of the measure words which might be spoken of an outrageous and violent kind. It would not be an offence against the Bill, if the Amendment were accepted, to tell a man that ruin and disaster would fall upon him; indeed, it would be hard to find that an offence had been committed unless a blow had been struck.

Mr. Trevelyan

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he did not think the omission of the words would be a bit more absurd than their inclusion in the Bill. Let them look at the words—

“In this Act the expression ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

He maintained that the leaving in of the words “word spoken” was just as absurd as the leaving out of them—rather more of the two, because what word was it that they could speak in reference to the trade or business or character of anyone that would not come within the scope of the measure? He thought that to retain the clause in its present shape was tantamount to putting into the Bill a clause of this sort—“Resolved,” or “Be it enacted, That for every idle word a man shall speak he shall be accountable to an Irish magistrate.” There was at present a movement going on in Ireland for the encouragement of Irish manufactures, and supposing he said, “I intend only to purchase Irish manufactures for the future,” that would have the effect of, to some extent, injuring those shopkeepers in Dublin who retailed English goods. Every one of those shopkeepers, under this Bill, would have cause of action against him. Suppose he said that he should buy his next pair of trousers from a tailor who only dealt in Irish goods, the neighbour or rival of that man, it might be over the way, would have cause of action; and the more he promulgated the idea that it was better to deal with tradesmen who only sold Irish goods, either by writing or by word spoken, the more would he be an offender under the Act, and the more would he render himself liable to six months’ imprisonment with hard labour. He maintained that the clause was unworkable and could not be carried out to its full extent. It might be carried out to some extent; but what was the use of passing a law which would be, and must be of necessity, trampled on by the Irish people?

MR. SYNAN said, that unless the “words spoken” really were for the purpose of intimidating it was absurd that they should remain in the clause. He apprehended that the Amendment moved by his hon. Friend was to ascertain whether the Government were going to amend the clause by stating that the words were to be spoken “with intent” to produce in a person—

“Fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.”

The Government had intimated that they intended to amend the clause in some degree; and if they specified that the words must have been spoken with ill-intent there could be no objection to retaining that portion of the clause it was proposed to leave out; if, however, they did not specify that, they had no right to retain the words in the clause. He wished to know whether the Government intended to propose an Amendment to the effect that the words must be spoken with ill-intent?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Committee should not lose sight of the words of the clause, which were to the effect that every person who wrongfully and without legal authority used intimidation to oblige anyone to do that which he had a legal right to abstain from doing, or to abstain from doing that which he had a legal right to do, should be guilty of an offence under the Act, and, surely, he ought to be guilty of an offence under the Act.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY apprehended that from the point of view of the hon. Member who moved the Amendment, if the Government would define the words “wrongfully, and without legal authority,” the words, as they were in the later part of the clause, might stand, but that, as the clause stood, any word spoken might be subject to punishment under the Act. He knew that some stress would be laid on the use of the word “wrongfully;” but that was anything but a technical word.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he thought he had rendered all this clear before. He was almost ashamed of repeating to the Committee that he intended to accept the words to be proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen)—the words “in order to,” so as to make it quite clear that the words must have been spoken with ill-intent. That had been repeated over and over again yesterday; still, it did not seem to produce any effect. He had always said that it was not intended in any of the clauses of this Bill to turn any act or word into an offence which was not committed or spoken in order to produce the effects set forth in the measure.

MR. HEALY said, that, for his part, he was quite aware of the intention of the Home Secretary; but he did not believe it met the case in the slightest degree. Supposing the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) or his Friends went over to Ireland, and got up an agitation against public-houses, or in favour of the Permissive Bill, such agitation would have the effect of putting a person “in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living;” and the hon. Baronet, and those who acted with him, would be liable to prosecution and imprisonment for six months, with hard labour. The agitation which was going on in Ireland was an agitation for the reduction of rents, and the agitation the hon. Baronet was interested in was an agitation—indirectly, perhaps—for a reduction of the profits of the publican. In both cases, both the landlord and the publican were put in fear of a reduction of their means of living. Were they in Ireland to be deprived for the future of the power of agitating and speaking in favour of a reduction of rents in Ireland? Was it the intention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to deprive the Irish people of this power? If he (Mr. Healy) got up at a meeting in Ireland and made a speech, saying that the rents of the landlords should be cut down 25 per cent, would that not be an act “calculated to put a person in fear” of “injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living?” What he wanted to know was this—and he did not know what argument could be used against furnishing the information—whether the Government would make a distinct statement as to whether a man, agitating in future in the interests of the Irish tenants in favour of a reduction of rents, would not come under the powers of this measure? If not, would the right hon. and learned Gentleman say why not? He was a lawyer, and was in charge of the Bill, therefore it should not be very difficult for him to answer such a simple question. The man who was agitating for a reduction of rents might be perfectly legitimate in his arguments—the landlord might be a rack-renter. Why, the Sub-Commissioners would come under the Bill as it at present stood. By delivering an argument in favour of reduction of rent they clearly would be guilty of “a word spoken, or act done, calculated to put any person in fear” of “injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living.” He (Mr. Healy) only a few minutes ago had moved to insert the word “unlawful” before the words, “word spoken or act done;” but the Home Secretary would not accept the word, and had said it was absurd. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might throw up his head in a majestic manner; but he (Mr. Healy) would, nevertheless, put it to the Committee, if an act was not an illegal act, why should it be prevented? Why should a Sub-Commissioner, for giving a judicial opinion in favour of a reduction of rent, be considered liable to punishment for having spoken a word, or performed an act, calculated to put a person in fear of injury to or loss of his means of living? What he wanted to get from the Government was something to show why all these cases which had been put by the Irish Members were not possible under the Bill. Perhaps the Home Secretary would oblige.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, he agreed with the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the course the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was pursuing was most unusual. He was asked what would be the effect of the clause; but, instead of answering, he sat in silence on the Treasury Bench. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) knew his hon. Friend had given an additional argument to the Conservative Party in favour of the clause by saying that the Sub-Commissioners would come under it; but he would not pursue this question, as several Members beside him did not seem to stick by what his hon. Friend had said. Would the Home Secretary answer this question? Suppose he got up at a public meeting and said the rents of the neighbouring landlords were at least 25 or 30 per cent higher than they should be, and that they should come down, would he not, in the view of magistrates favourable to the landlords' interest, come under this clause, as having used words calculated to interfere with the livelihood of those landlords? [Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT dissented.] The right hon. and learned Gentleman shook his head; would he tell him why he (Mr. O'Connor) would not come under the clause?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should not have thought hon. Members would have accused him of having been too silent. He had not risen to answer the questions to which reference had been made, because he had not thought that they were seriously put—because he had thought they had been put ironically. To treat the matter seriously, he had no hesitation in saying that the clause would not interfere with a man for saying rents ought to be reduced 50 per cent; but it would not permit him to say that a man who paid a high rent ought to have nothing to eat.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had, with characteristic skill, failed to meet the question. The question was, whether he, standing up and saying that a landlord was receiving 50 per cent more than he ought to get, and that if any tenant who paid the rent demanded was paying more than he ought to pay, would come under this Bill? In the opinion of the magistrates he might, by so doing, have been acting wrongfully, and without legal authority; in fact, in the opinion of many of the magistrates in Ireland, to endeavour to take 1 per cent off the rent of the landlord was a wrongful act.

MR. HEALY said, that, as the Government made no sign in the direction of answering his hon. Friend, he presumed his hon. Friend would go to a division. He (Mr. Healy) could promise for the hon. Member that, if the Government gave some explanation on the point before the Committee, he would withdraw his Amendment. A division would take 10 minutes, and a speech, even from the Home Secretary, would not occupy more than five minutes; so that it would be a saving of time for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to give an explanation. They had put it to him whether, if they got up at a meeting in Ireland and said that a man's rents should be reduced 25 per cent, they would not come under this Bill? The question was a plain one, and deserved a plain answer. The clause was so comprehensive that it would include every act that a man could do, and every word that a man could say in Ireland or anywhere else. Why did the Home Secretary sit silent? He presumed it was because he had no answer to give. The Government would not answer, because it was impossible for them to do it. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent a magistrate in Ireland from giving a man six months' imprisonment for advocating a reduction of rent. The very object of the Bill was to enable a magistrate to do that; and the Irish Party would take care to let the tenant farmers, not only of Munster, Leinster, and Connaught, but also of Ulster, know that this Bill had been brought in to put a stop to reasonable agitation.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 208; Noes 29: Majority 179.—(Div. List, No. 124.)

MR. ARTHUR COHEN said, he wished to move the insertion of the words "in order to, and" to make the paragraph run in this way—

"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes any word spoken or act done in order to, and calculated to, put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

He would only detain the Committee a few minutes in order to explain the meaning of the Amendment. If the Irish Members fully appreciated the effect of this Amendment, they would find a great many of their objections to the clause removed. Words not spoken intentionally to intimidate would be no offence under the Act, and these words that he was proposing were sufficient to solve substantially the difficult question of exclusive dealing. If exclusive dealing were carried on with the intention of intimidating, it was clear it ought to be an offence; but, on the other hand, if it were carried on without that intention, then, if his Amendment were adopted, such innocent exclusive dealing would be no offence. If he was not mistaken, almost all the objections that had been raised would be met by this Amendment; and he ventured to submit, with very great confidence, that if any person, with intent to intimidate, did any act which was calculated to put any person—and that, of course, meant any reasonable person—in fear of injury or of damage, that person ought, according to the soundest maxims of law, to be deemed guilty of an offence. That, he had no doubt, in the mind of any lawyer, would be the true effect, and was certainly the real object of this clause.

[Eighth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, after the word “done,” to insert the words “in order to, and.”—(Mr. Arthur Cohen.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could only say that the Government were very glad to accept these words to make it quite clear that an act without the intent to put a person in fear should not be an offence.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether the hon. and learned Member would accept the words “intended to” in place of “in order to?”

MR. ARTHUR COHEN said, he saw no objection to the proposed alteration.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he did not object to the alteration.

MR. HEALY asked whether the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen) would have any objection to move these words?

MR. ARTHUR COHEN said, he would move the words proposed, if it were in Order, and if the Irish Members preferred them. For his own part, he had a preference for his own words, believing that they would appeal more strongly to the mind of a lawyer. He was glad the Amendment, whichever form it might take, would have the approval of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. If the Irish Members would trust him, he was sure they would find the words “in order to” more calculated to carry out their object than those proposed by the hon. Member (Mr. Sullivan).

MR. GIBSON said, no one could deny that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Southwark—for whose opinion he had much respect—was a very important Amendment. It would require the tribunal before which a man was brought to trial for an offence under the Bill to come to a conclusion as to the intent with which an act was done; and, of course, that was a very grave change to make in the clause. [“No, no!”] There could be no doubt that it was. The words originally presented in the clause were framed with a view of dealing with the very serious and sometimes very terrible generality of “Boycotting” that it was so hard to reach. He did not wish to appear—notwithstanding what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on that (the Conservative) side—as a person who refused to accept Amendments if he thought they were reasonable; and if, on consideration, he was satisfied that it would not seriously interfere with the legitimate examination of the offence of “Boycotting,” he would not question the matter further.

MR. MARUM said, he and his hon. Friends would be satisfied to accept the Amendment “with an intent,” and then the clause would read “the expression ‘intimidation’ includes any word spoken, or act done, which puts any person in fear,” &c.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. HEALY next proposed, in page 3, line 26, to substitute the word “the” for the word “any,” and said he wished to have it quite clear that there must be some person intimidated. He did not think the Government could object to this Amendment. He did not care whether the article was “a” or “the;” but it ought to be made clear that there was some person intimidated. Upon that point the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), forgetful of what he said in 1875, had made an important omission. The right hon. Gentleman said in 1875 that if a person was obliged to give evidence, that would only make the intimidation stronger and prevent his giving evidence. Speaking on the 16th of July, 1875, when he was in Opposition, the right hon. Gentleman said the prosecution should be left to the man who was threatened, and that a third party ought not to be brought in. This was a second instance of the divergence of view of hon.

Mr. Arthur Cohen

Gentlemen opposite—first by the Attorney General, and now by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford—between the position they took up now, when in power, and in 1875, when in Opposition. In 1875 the Attorney General argued that “intimidation” was a vague word, and ought to be defined, and in 1875 the late Chief Secretary for Ireland held that a third party ought not to be brought in. Now, both these Gentlemen had changed their views; but, apart from that, he thought there could be no objection on the part of the Government to insert the definite article, whether “a” or “the.” He would propose to insert “a,” and not “the,” instead of “any.”

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, to leave out the word “any,” and insert “a.”—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘any’ stand part of the Clause.”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he could not quite understand the distinction drawn by the hon. Member. He could understand “the,” referring to some particular person; but “a” seemed to him not quite good grammar in place of “any.”

MR. HEALY said, the reason why he moved this Amendment was that at the present moment all the clause provided was that words or acts were calculated to put some substantive person in fear and trembling. He would agree to propose the substitution of “the;” but he had agreed to propose “a” at the suggestion of the Chairman. Certainly “the” was his word, and, if the Government would accept that, he should be happy to propose it, because it would refer to some definite person who was intimidated. It might be argued from any speech that somebody might, perhaps, have been intimidated; but if the word “the” was inserted there would be some particular person.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought it would be better to add the word “particular” to “any,” in order that it might be shown that some particular person had been intimidated, and that would throw on the prosecution the necessity of proving that some particular person had been intimidated. The clause, as it stood, threw no such necessity on the prosecution; but he thought the prosecution ought to be bound to show that some person or persons were intimidated, or were intended to be intimidated, by words spoken or actions done. The Government had accepted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Cohen) to insert “in order to” put some particular person in fear of injury or danger. That Amendment ought now to be supplemented in the way he had suggested. He did not think that the substitution of the word “the” for the word “any” would meet the objection of his hon. Friend; and if “any” was retained, he should move to insert “particular” after “any,” and before “person.” Perhaps the Government would state their intention at once on the matter, for if they would accept the words “any particular” no further discussion would be necessary.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he hoped the Government would not give way to this Amendment. He was not sure the Committee fully appreciated what was meant by it. If the clause was read as meaning intimidation to put some particular person in fear, then, in order to constitute an offence under the Act, it would be necessary to show some person who was intimidated. Suppose a notice was put up on a chapel door, or in some other conspicuous place, that any person who took a farm from which someone else had been evicted should be “Boycotted,” that would be addressed to all the world, and would be an offence under the Act. But if the Committee acceded to this Amendment, and confined the clause to words spoken to some particular person, that action would not be an offence, because it would be impossible to prove that words spoken in that way were calculated to intimidate any particular person.

MR. HEALY said, he would not press the proposal to a division, and would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY proposed to insert, in line 26, after the word “any,” the words “firm and courageous.” He stated that Sir James FitzJames Stephen, in defining the character of “intimidation,” had said “intimidation” must be with the intent to carry out any common purpose, lawful or unlawful, in such a way as to give firm and courageous persons reasonable apprehension of a breach of the peace. He (Mr. Healy) held that intimidation should be of such a character that ordinarily firm persons would be put in fear by it. Upon the Act of 1875 the Attorney General was anxious lest any person should be sentenced to three months' imprisonment for such intimidation as making faces at a workman's child; and, seeing that the hon. and learned Gentleman's acumen then was directed to the prevention of intimidation, he did not now see why the person to be intimidated should not be a person of ordinarily firm and courageous character.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 26, after the word "any," to insert the words "firm and courageous."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Gentleman's argument was that no person should be convicted unless he was firm and courageous. But how could they ascertain a person's firmness?

Question put, and negatived.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he really wished to limit this vague definition; and, therefore, he proposed, after the word "person," to insert the words, "to whom or with reference to whom such word is spoken or act done." That would give something tangible to go upon, and would tend to narrow down the accusation.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 26, after the word "person," to insert the words "to whom or with reference to whom such word is spoken or act done."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT observed that, according to the Amendment, the person to whom the words were spoken, or with reference to whom the act was done, was to be the person intimidated; but it was plain that if the intimidation was only to be against the person to whom the words were spoken, any man who told another man's wife that he was going to shoot her husband could not be accused of intimidation. The Committee had already decided whether or not the person intimidated was only to be the person against whom the act was actually done, and it was plain in Sub-section (d) that if a man who had paid his rent was intimidated in order to intimidate all the other people who had paid their rent the offence would be very much limited. That had been decided over and over again, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Mr. Healy

Question put, and negatived.

MR. DILLON said, the Amendment he was about to propose was not of a very serious kind, and he hoped the Government would accept it. It was in page 3, line 28, to leave out the words "or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property." It must be apparent to the Committee that this was an important Amendment, though, of course, it would be argued that it was too important to be accepted. But what would be the result of leaving these words in the sub-section? It would amount to saying that no labourer should have a right to leave his employment, except at the risk of six months' imprisonment, for doing what might cause some injury to the employer. It might be said that the magistrate would interpret the law in a liberal spirit; and with regard to the circumstances of the case, too, was it just or reasonable to place in the hands of the magistrates a law which left every labouring man in such a position that he could not leave his employment without the risk of imprisonment? Any employer might be able to say that if a workman left his employment, particularly if he was a good workman, no matter what the motive was, he was put in fear of injury to, or loss of, his property. There were a variety of employments in which this would be the case. Suppose the case of a driver of a horse, which was accustomed to him. If that man left the employment, and a strange driver was introduced, the horse might not work so well, and the master might be able to say that he was in fear of loss through that circumstance. It might be said, of course, that magistrates would act in a reasonable way, and would not press or strain the law, unless in cases for which this clause was specially drawn; but at the Cork Assizes a case had occurred which made a profound impression upon him, and influenced his view as to the manner in which the Act might be used. A respectable and well-known man, with a large family, was put on trial on a charge of having formed one of a small crowd who had thrown stones at an old man who was unpopular. The old man was only slightly injured, and recovered in a few weeks; but the accused man was convicted, although it was not sworn that he had been seen throwing stones, but only that he had been seen coming away from the crowd. He was convicted because he was known to be a prominent Land Leaguer, and was sentenced to five years' penal servitude, which he was now undergoing in Spike Island. In looking over the list of sentences at the Assizes he saw not only this case, but he saw a case in which a soldier was convicted of an indecent assault. He was only sentenced to six months' imprisonment with hard labour. The learned Judge who passed that sentence of five years' penal servitude, and who had since been elevated to the House of Lords, stated that if the neighbourhood quieted down he would exercise his influence with the Castle authorities to get the sentence reduced, and that showed that the Bench had been turned into a political weapon. This clause would be strained against any man who was known to be a Land Leaguer; and if any man left his employment, or took part in a labour combination, and the fact that he was a member of such combination was stated to the magistrate, that would be sufficient to convince the magistrate that the man had left his employment in pursuance of a conspiracy to injure his employer. The clause would make every man in Ireland a slave to his employer, and would deny him the right to leave his employment, unless it happened that the magistrate of the particular district was generous, impartial, and just.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 28, to leave out the words "or in fear of injury to or loss of his property."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, no magistrate or Judge would so interpret this clause as to prevent a man leaving his employment merely because he desired to do so. If it was assumed that a magistrate or Judge would unrighteously pronounce sentences under a law which had no application to the case, it did not matter what the law was; but if it was assumed that this clause would be applied to a man, not for leaving his employment, and not for any unlawful object, the man could not possibly be brought within the Act. But if the Amendment was accepted, a man might threaten to maim cattle, or burn a house and injure property or individuals; and, therefore, he could not assent to the Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, he understood from the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the magistrates had a clear view of the law; but although the Committee had been talking about this Bill for a week past, they had not been able to get a clear view of the law, and he did not believe anybody had, except the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself. He did not think the magistrates in Ireland were likely to be more enlightened than tolerably intelligent Gentlemen in that House. With regard to the question of strikes, there had been strikes by farm labourers in England which had inflicted injury on the farmers. Were similar proceedings in Ireland to be declared unlawful? He understood the Home Secretary to say that in some cases they would be unlawful. Was that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's view? In his opinion, no clause ought to be so wide as would say that an act committed at one time would be lawful, and if committed at another time would be unlawful. If the Home Secretary would show what check there would be upon the magistrates in administering this law, the Irish Members would meet him; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman was unable to show anything but something which might be in the mind of the magistrate. If men struck against a farmer or landlord, what guarantee was there that they would not be interfered with under this law? The Committee were entitled to know what strike would be permissible and what would not; at present they were completely in the dark on the point.

MR. DILLON said, he had entertained the hope that the Government would accept the Amendment. He could not understand how a magistrate could help arriving at the conclusion he (Mr. Dillon) had suggested to the Committee. The words of the clause were—

[Eighth Night.]

"Any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself," &c., with a view "to cause any person or persons either to do any act which such person or persons has or have a legal right to abstain from doing," &c.

What was a strike? It was a combined act of workmen, done with a view to compel an employer to give an increase of wages, although an employer had a right to abstain from giving any increase of wages. It was a well-known fact that many men in England were absolutely ruined by strikes. In Ireland nothing was to be done to cause a person to do anything he had a legal right to abstain from doing; therefore, was it not as clear as noonday that a strike of labourers would be illegal, and would subject the men to six months' imprisonment with hard labour? Any employer of labour in Ireland would, after the passing of the Act, be in a position to cause the imprisonment of any of his workmen who struck work.

MR. MARUM said, he and his hon. Friends were apprehensive that the words "wrongfully and without legal authority" would not be sufficient to save the action of the Trades' Union Act in Ireland without some distinct proviso in reference to that country. Whether the words he had quoted were sufficient for the purpose or not, they did not even appear in the 6th clause, which related specially to combinations.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER) said, the Amendment was very clearly open to several objections. So far as it was an Amendment on a matter of substance, it fell within the decision which had been arrived at upon the Amendment proposed some time ago by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (MR. C. RUSSELL). The present proposal was to exclude from the clause the consideration of any intimidation arising from fear or from injury to or loss of property. As had been pointed out by the Home Secretary, an Amendment of that character was absolutely untenable. The Amendment did not meet the difficulty which had been pointed out by hon. Members who had just spoken. The question of combination did not arise in the Amendment at all. The clause would only prevent intimidation by means of threats or fear of injury to property, which was resorted to with the view of inducing people to alter their conduct.

Mr. Dillon

If there was any reasonable apprehension that legitimate combinations would be prohibited, it would become necessary to preserve the provisions of the Act of 1875 with respect to Ireland.

MR. O'DONNELL asked if they were to understand from the declarations of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland that the Government were prepared to say that all the forms of combinations which were permissible under the Act of 1875 should be allowed in Ireland?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Government proposed that nothing in this Act should be taken in any way to affect or diminish the operations of the Act of 1875—that was to say, that this Act should not be interpreted as affecting or limiting in any way what had been authorized and permitted by the Act of 1875.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 173; Noes 25; Majority 148.—(Div. List, No. 125.)

MR. DILLON said, they had now reached a stage of the discussion at which he had to propose that the tail of the clause should be cut off. The last words of the clause were—

"In this Act the expression 'intimidation' includes any word spoken or act done calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living;"

and the words he wished to be omitted were "business, or means of living." This was really the worst part of the worst clause of the Bill. This definition might put a man in perpetual danger. Under these words, as was pointed out on the second reading, if a man objected to the cut of his coat he would commit an offence; if a man objected to the quality of any goods supplied to him, he would commit an offence. If a man, when conversing with another, were to say—"So-and-so is behaving very badly," he could, under this clause, be held to be guilty of an offence. If a certain solicitor had busied himself very much in behalf of any movement, and he (MR. DILLON) were to say, "MR. So-and-So has acted very badly," the gentleman might go straightway to a magistrate and say, "MR. Dillon has been using certain words calculated to injure me in my business." He (Mr. Dillon) would then be had up and imprisoned. These latter words of the clause would really make it impossible for anyone to speak at all in Ireland with any sense of security. The Irish Representatives knew perfectly well that this Act would be administered in the grossest possible way. He might mention a notorious case which any hon. Gentleman who was acquainted with Ireland would probably remember. A certain trader or dealer in Sackville Street made some remarks with reference to the proceedings of the Irish landlords. The gentleman was a very well-known Orangeman and a leading Tory, and the day after he had made his criticisms of the actions of Irish landlords a circular was issued calling upon landlords to withdraw their custom from the man's shop, at which they had previously largely dealt. It was stated—but he very much doubted the truth of the statement—that this clause would be used with a spirit of even-handed justice against landlords who put men in fear of injury, or loss of business, or the means of living. Lord Sherbrooke had said this was a law which ought to be strictly defined, so that there should be no mistaking its meaning; it was a law affecting rich and poor, and therefore there ought to be the clearest definition. It was clear, from whatever point of view they regarded the words he proposed to omit, that the law would not be administered between rich and poor alike. "Boycotting" was exercised by no class so much as by the educated class; yet no one would contend for a moment that it was proposed to put this law in force against them. He had an Amendment on the Paper bearing on the subject; he hoped he would be able to put it to the Committee. If the Government would accept the present Amendment, of course he would withdraw his subsequent one, which was to insert, in page 3, line 29, after "living"—

"Provided always, That nothing in this Clause shall be taken to apply to—

- (a.) The right of physicians to refuse to meet in consultation, and otherwise to cause injury to the business and means of living of any member of their profession, who shall attend a patient for the sum of five shillings or less;
- (b.) Or to the ancient and well-known system of Boycotting, by which the members of the Irish Bar have from time immemorial enforced an unwritten law to the following effect:—

- (1.) That no barrister shall enter a circuit town before his circuit, lest he might canvas solicitors for briefs;
- (2.) That no barrister shall use any public advertisement for the purpose of bringing his merits under the notice of the public," &c. &c.

He defied anyone to deny that the unwritten laws referred to in his Amendment were not enforced on the members of the Irish Bar in a way as to be a perfect terror of an Irish barrister. He had heard of Irish barristers being ruined by being socially ostracized, because they had broken one of the unwritten laws of their Profession. Why should the Irish barristers and doctors have a right which was denied to Irish farmers and labourers? If the Government would proceed to break down the system of combination amongst barristers and amongst doctors, and inflicted six months' hard labour upon a barrister or a doctor who "Boycotted" one of his brethren, because he dared to break one of the unwritten laws of the Profession; if the Government would undertake to deal out even-handed justice to rich and poor alike, he would willingly withdraw his Amendment. It was because he knew this law was directed against the poor, and not against the rich, that he now proposed this Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 29, to leave out the words "business or means of living."—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member said this was the tail of the Bill, and, no doubt, it was; but the tail very often carried the sting. The words it was proposed to strike out were the words which most nearly touched the practice of "Boycotting," and they must naturally be so regarded by hon. Members opposite. It was quite plain that if they struck out these words it would not be an offence to intimidate a man, and prevent him from doing what he had a legal right to do, by putting him in fear of injury to, or loss of, his property, or means of living. The whole object of the Bill was to prevent intimidation of that kind, and it was evident that if they accepted the Amendment they would fail in their endeavours to put an end to "Boycotting." With reference to the old stories about the Medical Profession and the Legal Profession, the arguments by which they were accompanied were by no means new. They had always been used in all the old Trades' Union discussions—discussions on these subjects had never taken place without these worn-out illustrations being brought up. Arguments of this kind ought not to have weight, or to prevent the Committee from dealing with the particular evil which they knew existed in "Boycotting."

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. LEAMY said, he had challenged a division on the last Amendment; but the Chairman, it seemed, had not heard him. He begged now to move that Progress be reported.

THE CHAIRMAN called upon Dr. Commins.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, the Amendment he had put down on the Paper had already been the subject of a discussion in course of the consideration of the other Amendments to the clause. It would not be necessary for him to make a long statement on the subject, because, in the course of the observations he had made in speaking to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Bryce), he had foreshadowed this Amendment. His proposal recognized the fact that it was intended to put down "Boycotting" as an offence against which the clause was directed. It was not intended to let hon. Members argue on the assumption that it was in any way proposed to exempt "Boycotting" from the Bill—

DR. COMMINS rose to a point of Order. He said he had an Amendment on the Paper preceding that of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Horace Davey).

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member was called on, but did not answer.

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, the object of his Amendment was this. It had been pointed out that Clause 4, as it stood, called for explanation, and was framed in such a way that it would not do what it was the object and intention of the Government to do. He now sought to frame the clause in such a manner as to make it accord with the intention of the Government—that was to say, to make it provide that that should not be an offence which the Government did not desire to make an offence, and to allay the fears that had been expressed and felt that the language of the clause was such that under the Act things might be converted into offences, which it was never intended to be made offences. Illustrations had been given of that, and it was not, perhaps, necessary to renew them; but this would show what he meant. Suppose an association of ladies was formed to "Boycott" linen-draperies who did not provide proper seats for their work-people, they would come under the clause as guilty of—

"Word spoken or act done intended to and calculated to put any person in fear of any injury or danger to himself, or to any member of his family, or to any person in his employment, or in fear of any injury to or loss of his property, business, or means of living."

The formation of the association would certainly have been for the purpose of compelling the shopkeepers to do that which they had a legal right to refuse to do. Where they were defining an offence it was important that they should define it in such language as would accurately express what they meant; and he ventured to think that the principal objection would be removed if they adopted the Amendment he had on the Paper. The words were these—

"Provided, That the refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of trade, business, or employment of either, shall not of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

What he intended to express by that was, that the mere fact of saying, "I will not deal with you," or "I will not supply you with goods," was not in itself an intimidation—that was to say, that that act, being a lawful thing, should not be punished; but that the circumstances under which it was done, or the circumstances under which the words were spoken, should constitute the intimidation. As he had ventured to say on another occasion, it was the circumstances, and not the act itself, which constituted the offence; and in this Proviso he had attempted—whether successfully or not the Committee would say—to embody that idea. The hon. and learned Member for Lincoln (Mr.

Hinde Palmer) had an Amendment to his Amendment, which proposed to insert, after the word "person," the words "individually, and not collectively, or in combination with others." The Amendment, as amended, would read in this way—

"Provided, That the refusal by any person individually, and not collectively, or in combination with others, to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either, shall not of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

With the permission of the Committee, he proposed to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln; and, if it was in Order, he would move his Amendment as amended. He believed there was no technical difficulty in the way of the acceptance of this proposal. He was bound to say that the words suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln were an improvement, because he believed—and he had no doubt that his hon. Friends who had assisted him in framing his Amendment would agree with him—that a combination to do an act which was in itself lawful, must bear a totally different complexion to the same act when done by a single individual.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 29, after "living," insert "Provided, That the refusal by any person, individually, and not collectively, or in combination with others, to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either shall not of itself be deemed to be intimidation."
—(Mr. Horace Davey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the very fact of his hon. and learned Friend proposing the Amendment would secure the attention of the Committee. From the manner in which it was worded, a great many Members, at first sight, might consider that it was consistent with the Bill. But if it was considered carefully, it would be seen that those who had supported the first part of the clause must also support the latter part as it stood. The proposal was that it should not be intimidation on the part of one person to refuse to deal with another in the way of "trade, business, or employment." What did the hon. and learned Member mean by that? Did he mean that the mere fact of a person saying

"I will not deal with you" should not be an offence? If he meant that, then the Government meant that too. Of course, it was legitimate for a man to say—"I will not deal with you; you have no stock-in-trade, and I fear you will not pay me." That would not be an offence under the clause as it stood. If they properly translated the words "shall not of itself be deemed to be," in the Amendment, it would mean such a thing should not be an offence unless it came within the section. They could not say that unless a thing came within the section it should not be an offence, which was the effect of the Amendment. The Government had said that it was the intimidation plus the act which made the act intimidation; whereas the hon. and learned Member said it was the act minus the intimidation which constituted the offence. The Amendment merely said that unless the act came within the section it should not come within the section. The hon. and learned Member would excuse him if he said that the acceptance of the Amendment would not only render the clause ridiculous, but the Committee ridiculous also. ["No, no!"] Well, the point was one he would not discuss. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would not press the Amendment.

Mr. MARUM said, that, with all respect to the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, he did not agree with him. They were not to suppose that in the Court the magistrate would possess that amount of observation and clearness of mind possessed by the Attorney General. It might be that the words might safely be omitted; but, at the same time, it might be necessary that in a Court of this description the words should appear so that it should be clear that where refusal to deal with a person occurred, it should not be conclusive of intimidation, but an element for consideration in the matter. It was said that without the Amendment the Court would take the matter into consideration; but that was assuming that the Court would have the same dispassionate judgment and the same judicial mind as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. He wished to have an announcement of this kind in the Bill, so that, where necessary, it could be placed before the minds of persons in a judicial capacity, who might not take that technical view of the matter that a man of trained mind would take. The intention was that a mere refusal to deal should not be regarded as a proof of the offence. This was not a Combination Clause. The 6th clause was the Combination Clause, so that it would appear that it was not necessary to add the words "individually, and not collectively, or in combination with others," in this part of the Bill. It would be inconsistent to put these words in that part of the Bill which dealt with individual acts, and not acts of combination. The Amendment, he thought, was necessary for the sort of Courts they might have to deal with.

[Eighth Night.]

MR. HEALY said, he wished to call the attention of the Chairman to a point of Order. He should very much have preferred the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Horace Davey) to have moved the Amendment without the addition of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer). As he (Mr. Healy) had an Amendment on the Paper, which, unfortunately, he had not been in his place to move, and as the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch was of very little use as amended, he wished to know whether, if on Monday he put down his Amendment, he should be in Order in moving it? On Monday the Prime Minister would be in his place, and they would be able to hear his opinion of exclusive dealing. His Amendment said—

"Provided, That no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either; and no declaration of intention not to so deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing, shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

Supposing they allowed the discussion on the present Amendment to drop, should he be in Order in moving the Amendment that had been passed over?

THE CHAIRMAN: If the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member is withdrawn, no doubt the hon. Member could go back to the words in the Bill following those last discussed and decided, and anyone can propose an Amendment. I should not like to say whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) could be moved until I have looked at it a little more, because it seems to me at present that if the Amendment we are now upon is negatived, the principle of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford will have been decided. I should, however, like to consider the point.

MR. HEALY said, there seemed to be some doubt on the question, and as this matter would lead to an important debate involving the whole question of "Boycotting," he thought it would be as well that they should now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Healy.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he would appeal to the hon. Member to allow them to dispose of the Amendment before them.

MR. HEALY said, he should have no objection if he could afterwards bring on his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Proviso the hon. Member (Mr. Healy) proposes to move is substantially the same as that before the Committee. Any Proviso that is substantially different can, of course, be moved if the clause is not put. I trust that under the circumstances the hon. Member will allow this Amendment to be disposed of.

MR. HEALY said, he did not object to withdraw the Motion if he had a ruling from the Chairman that his Amendment could be put on Monday. The subject under discussion, however, was one which should be discussed in daylight. Exclusive dealing was at the bottom of it, and that was a matter on which a good deal turned. If the Chairman informed him that he could move his Amendment on Monday he would withdraw his Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN: The first part of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford is contained in the Amendment for the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch; therefore, unless that were omitted the Amendment could not be moved. The latter part of the Proviso, however, could be moved.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, that, if he understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, he intended to bring in a clause that would preserve to Irish tenants the right of combination preserved to English working men by the Act of 1875. He (Mr. O'Connor) would observe, then, that the whole question of combination—including such combination as was dealt with in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch—would have to be considered on the Saving Clause of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He would suggest that they should approach the consideration of this Saving Clause with a Committee unpledged as to the whole question.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the hon. Member must have misunderstood him. What he had said was, that he would save the Act of 1875, so that it would not be in any way overridden by this Bill. The clause he would introduce would be the ordinary Saving Clause—"Nothing in this Act shall contravene anything in the Act of," &c.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had evidently misunderstood the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and they were not in as good a position as he had thought they were. What the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said just now only confirmed the reasonableness of the demand of the Irish Members—namely, that the question should be left open until they were able to discuss it as a whole. The difficulty they were under was plain. The hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey) wished to discuss an Amendment, the hon. Member for Wexford wanted to propose one, and other hon. Members might wish to do the same, all these Amendments dealing with the question, a portion of which only was raised by the Amendment now before the Committee. Was it fair, then, to ask the Committee, at half-past 1 in the morning, to pledge itself beforehand by a division on a matter which was to be fully discussed at another Sitting?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, as he understood the matter, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) wished to raise a larger question than was raised by the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch (Mr. Horace Davey). If that was so, clearly he would be entitled to raise the question on Monday, if it was not the identical question to that before the Committee. Hon. Members opposite, unless he (Sir William Harcourt) was mistaken, said the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch did not meet their views, therefore the Committee should be allowed to dispose of that Amendment. When that Amendment was disposed of they could then bring forward Amendments that would meet their views.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it would facilitate matters very much if it were ruled that the hon. Member for Wexford could bring in his Amendment, even though the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch were disposed of that evening. He would point out that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch was not merely that hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment as it stood, but his Amendment coupled with that of another hon. Member. It would be seen, then, that these two Amendments, taken together, were very different indeed—the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford and that before the Committee. The Chairman could, without difficulty, rule that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford was substantially different to that of the hon. and learned Member for Christchurch.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of my ruling, but of the decision of the Committee. If the Committee should decide that—

"The refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either, shall not of itself be deemed to be intimidation," the hon. Member could not afterwards move that—

"No refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either," &c., "shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."

MR. HORACE DAVEY said, he thought there was some justice in the remarks of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) as to the way in which he (Mr. Horace Davey) had moved this Amendment; and although he might not be prepared to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford, he thought he ought not to stand in the way of the hon. Member having an opportunity of proposing the Amendment. He, perhaps, might have misled the hon. Member for Wexford by adopting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Lincoln (Mr. Hinde Palmer); and, as the last thing he desired was to give the slightest ground for saying that he had misled any hon. Member, he would withdraw his Amendment.

[Eighth Night.]

Motion, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either; and no declaration of intention not so to deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing, shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. GOSCHEN said, before the Committee reported Progress, he wished to submit a few observations to the Committee and to the Government with regard to the position in which the Committee found itself. His observations did not refer to the last three or four hours of the debate in Committee, but to the general course of the Bill since the House went into Committee upon it. The Committee entered upon this particular clause on Tuesday last; they debated it on Wednesday; they debated it again on Thursday; they had debated it again to-day; and it was not yet concluded. He did not at all deny the gravity and great importance of this clause, and he did not wish to cast reflections on any single Member with regard to the course he had adopted respecting any of the Amendments; but he thought any Member who had been present throughout these debates would admit that there had been a constant repetition of the same arguments; that issues almost identical had been submitted to the Committee several times; and that, although a majority had decided upon certain principles connected with this clause, nevertheless the case against the clause had been put into a different form and again submitted to the Committee. As fast as Amendments were disposed of further Amendments crowded the Notice Paper; and he thought the time had come when the Committee should consider what action should be taken with a view to progress in this matter. If it had taken all this time to deal with Clauses 1, 2 and 3, and part of Clause 4, he put it to the Committee to consider when they were likely to arrive at the end of this Bill? Meanwhile, he asked the Committee what was going on in Ireland? Hon. Members opposite, and some hon. Members on this (the Liberal) side of the House, wished to stop evictions; and they were aware that the Government was making an endeavour, in the Arrears of Rent Bill, to stop the causes of evictions. Was it right, in the interests of Ireland itself, by these protracted debates, to delay beyond the actual requirements of the case the completion of this present Bill? Were there not other matters in Ireland which urgently required to be dealt with? Could any Member of the House have heard the Chief Secretary read that formidable list of offences and of outrages which had been committed? [Mr. LABOUCHERE: Evictions!] Surely the House desired to stop evictions and outrages; and he hoped the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would endeavour to strengthen the hand of the Executive in dealing with that fearful state of things, which was bringing disgrace upon Ireland. The Committee were acquainted with the clauses in the Bill which followed this particular clause. The Irish Government had asked for those clauses; and he put it to the Committee whether they could afford to go on week after week, as slowly they had proceeded so far, and whether it was not likely that if they proceeded at their present rate, it would be six weeks, at least, before this Bill could be concluded? Was it right that they should proceed in that manner? He believed he expressed the feelings of the vast majority of the House in saying they would be prepared to make any sacrifice of time and patience in regard to this measure, and he thought hon. Members opposite would admit that the Committee had shown much patience. They had not complained, and if it was necessary to continue the debate at this late hour, he hoped Her Majesty's Government would consider whether there were not means, even by more continuous Sittings than the present, of hastening the measure. The debates would have been much more protracted if hon. Members who desired to support the Government had not frequently remained silent because they did not wish to lengthen the debates. He hoped their silence would not be taken as indicating any lukewarmness with regard to the action of the Government, and that it would be understood that they did not object to the action of the Government, although they had thought it better to remain silent. They wished this Bill to be passed, and as speedily as possible. The blood that was being shed in Ireland was not only Saxon blood, but Irish blood. The Executive asked for such powers as were necessary to stop that bloodshed, and if this Bill did not suffice to stop it they must ask for further powers; for neither the Government nor the House would endure a continuation of these outrages. The Government must be armed with the powers they asked for; and he hoped that before Monday the Government would consider whether any further steps could be taken to expedite the progress of the Bill.

Mr. Horace Davey

MR. HEALY said, it was evident that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon had not been present during the debates on the Land Bill last year; for if he had, he would have found that the Tory Party delayed the Government no less than four days on the first three lines of the Bill, whereas the Irish Members on this occasion had only delayed the Government six days on one whole clause. The Bill now before the House affected the rights of the people of Ireland; but the Bill before the House last year only affected the interests of a few landlords; and hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway on the Tory Benches did not scruple to waste the time of the House and prevent the Bill being passed, although evictions were then taking place. He did not hesitate to say that there had been more pain, more misery, more loss inflicted on the Irish tenantry in one year than there had been inflicted on the landlords by outrages in 100 years. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was very solicitous, as they all were, when individuals incurred loss and suffering in Ireland; but he must remember that the people for whom he appeared to evince most sympathy were the aristocrats—the people of his own class—at all events, the monied class. The Irish Members represented the poor; and certainly, if they had no sympathy for the class from which most of them sprung, and if they did not understand the feelings of the poor, he should like to know by what title any hon. Member could claim to represent anybody in that House? They felt as much for the people they represented as the right hon. Gentleman could feel for his class; and he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that, although he complained that so much time had been spent over this Bill, the Government had now practically got the pith and core of the Bill—the abolition of trial by jury and of “Boycotting.” The remaining portions of the Bill did not, in the opinion of the Government, constitute the major part of the Bill; so that in about a week they had practically got the core and the marrow of their proposals. What was the conduct of hon. Members last year? They kept the House of Commons 50 nights on the proposal to limit the rights of Irish landlords; but the Irish Members had now kept the House six nights altogether on proposals to limit the rights of the people of Ireland for three years, and yet the right hon. Gentleman said they were wasting time. He would remind the Government, who claimed to be a Liberal Government, that there were a number of hon. Members on these (the Irish) Benches who were quite as Liberal as any hon. Member opposite, and that their support and sympathy might be required by the Liberal Party when the right hon. Member should be on these Benches. If the Government wished to come to a closure with the Irish Party, they would have a tough Party to tackle. That Party was not afraid to oppose any proposals the Government might bring forward, and the Government would have to consider whether time would be saved by following the advice of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen). The right hon. Gentleman had given the Committee the benefit of his absence on this clause, for which they could not be too grateful; but, having waited till 2 o’clock, he came down to give the Government the benefit of his advice. He would remind the Government that whenever they were in a difficulty they were assailed behind the back by hon. Gentlemen of the peculiar temperament of the right hon. Member for Ripon. He did not believe that the following of the right hon. Gentleman, all told, would amount to half-a-dozen

Members in that House; while the Irish Members numbered 30 or 40, and represented some 5,000,000 of men. Making that contrast between the right hon. Gentleman and this Party, he would leave the Government to form their own conclusion.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had no desire to enter into a controversy as between the interests of landlords and tenants; but he would mention, in regard to the hon. Member's remarks as to this Bill being carried in the interest of the landlords, that of the five attempts to murder reported that day, one was committed upon a landlord, one was upon an unfortunate soldier, and the other three were attempts to murder poor farmers.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN, referring to the advice of the right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Goschen) to hurry this Bill because outrages were being committed, evictions were taking place, and blood was flowing, said, the contention of the Irish Members was that this Bill would do no good in Ireland, but a great deal of harm. That being their belief, they were bound to resist it to the utmost within their legal rights and abilities. The right hon. Gentleman had said the Arrears of Rent Bill was waiting on this measure; but when the Arrears of Rent Bill should come before the House hon. Members above the Gangway on the Opposition side of the House would take good care that it did not make progress. They would fall upon that Bill and strangle it, if they could; and if they could not do it, that would be done for them "elsewhere." Here, then, was the situation. The Committee were appealed to to hurry through this coercive measure, which would not improve the condition of things in Ireland, but would rather make confusion worse confounded; while the remedial measure which was promised after this Bill was a mockery, a delusion, and a snare. He believed it would never be passed into law; it would be opposed by hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway in a most protracted and determined manner, and would receive a coup de grace "elsewhere." Therefore, the Irish Members stood on their rights in opposing this cruel measure, which they believed would produce, not peace and order, but anarchy in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the Committee had arrived at an hour in the morning when they might pretty well consent to this Motion, and not enter into debate in a heated spirit. With reference to what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had said, the Government were fully impressed with the extreme necessity of proceeding as rapidly as possible, consistently with full and fair discussion, with this measure. They felt that the present circumstances of Ireland made it more than ever necessary that this Bill should pass into law without unnecessary delay. At the same time, as the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had said, it was true that the early clauses of the Bill were among the most important portions of the Bill. If he were asked his opinion, he should say he thought the debate upon this clause might have been more condensed than it had been, and some time might have been economized; but he had perceived, during this evening, a disposition to forward the discussions, and not to unduly delay them; and the Committee having passed this clause, which had been one of great difficulty and complexity, he hoped they would make more rapid progress with those portions of the Bill which had still to be dealt with.

Mr. Healy

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress, to sit again upon Monday next.

COUNTY COURTS [SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF EXAMINERS OF ACCOUNTS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the repeal of so much of section two of "The County Courts Act, 1866," as limits the Salaries and Expenses of the persons by whom the Accounts are to be Examined.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

MOTION.

PUBLIC OFFICES SITE BILL SELECT COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That the Report and Minutes of Evidence of the Select Committee on Public Offices and Buildings (Metropolis) 1877, be referred to the Select Committee on the Public Offices Site Bill.—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

House adjourned at Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Monday, 12th June, 1882.*MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Report— Claims of Peerage, &c. [No. 128].PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Public Health (Fruit-Pickers Lodgings)* (127); Interments (Felo de se)* (130); Land Drainage Provisional Order* (131); Local Government
(Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (132); Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3)* (133); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2)* (134); Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6)* (135);
Local Government Provisional Order (No. 10)*
(136).Second Reading—Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister (75), negatived; Local Government Provisional Orders* (106); Local Government Provisional Orders (Poor Law)*
(107).Committee—Boiler Explosions* (85-129).Third Reading—Arklow Harbour* (98), and passed.EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has any further news which he desires to communicate to the House with reference to the state of things in Egypt; and, also, if he will inform the House whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any measures, or whether measures are so far advanced that the Government can inform the House of their nature?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in reply to the noble Marquess's Question, I will read the telegrams which have been received at the Foreign Office from Alexandria. The first is from Vice Consul Calvert, dated 10.40 last night, and states that a serious riot had taken place in the afternoon between Arabs and Europeans, and that Mr. Pibworth, an engineer of Her Majesty's ship Superb, was killed, and many wounded, among whom were, I regret to state, Mr. Cookson, Her Majesty's Consul, and three constables of the Consulate. A further telegram from Mr. Calvert, dated 10.25 this morning, states that the women and children, who sought refuge in the Consulate, have been transferred to the ships, and that the military are maintaining order. I am glad to say that Mr. Calvert states that Mr. Cookson is convalescent, and his injuries are not serious. Sir Edward Malet has telegraphed that the Khedive has sent an aide-de-camp to Alexandria, and the latest telegram received this morning from Mr. Calvert is of a more re-assuring character. The natives, the English authorities, and Dervish Pasha advise that men should not be landed. Sir Beauchamp Seymour has power to land sailors and marines should he think it necessary; but he has telegraphed that the disturbance is of a non-political character, and was suppressed by Egyptian troops.

EARL DE LA WARR: I wish to ask the noble Earl, If the consent of the Sultan has been given to the proposed European Conference with reference to the affairs of Egypt?

EARL GRANVILLE: All the Powers have pressed the Porte to consent to a Conference. The Sultan has stated his opinion that it is unnecessary, and in some ways objectionable; but His Majesty has made no refusal to the proposals of the Powers.

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.—(No. 75.)(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said: Your Lordships are already acquainted with this Bill. It has been several times before Parliament. It has passed through all its stages in "another place" no less than seven times; and, although your Lordships have not yet seen fit to allow it to pass the second reading, you have, except on two occasions, regarded it with steadily-increasing favour each time it has come before you. Thirty years ago, when the House divided on the second reading, the "Contents" were only 16; in 1879 they were 81; in 1880 the number increased to 90; and on the last occasion the second reading was only lost by the small majority of 11. Judging by the tone of the recent debates in this House, it is evident that the passing or the rejection of this Bill now turns on the social aspect of the question—that is to say, on the question whether it is, or is not, for the general advantage of the community that the Bill should become law. Your Lordships will remember that this part of the subject was discussed at some length in this House in the years 1879 and 1880, when my noble Friend (Lord Houghton), who has for so many years taken a deep and warm interest in this question, brought it forward. I cannot add much that is new to the discussion; but my duty to your Lordships requires that, even if I have to go over a part of the old ground again, and do no more than remind you of considerations with which you are already familiar, I should briefly state my reasons for asking the House to read this Bill a second time. Before doing so, I should like to make some general observations in regard to it. I would, in the first place, point out that it is not a sweeping measure for the general reform of the Marriage Laws. It aims at nothing more than the removal of an unreasonable restriction on marriage, which causes much misery and suffering to a considerable number of persons. The Bill is strictly limited to this one object. If I am asked, why is it not of a wider and more comprehensive character, embracing also marriage with a deceased husband's brother or deceased wife's niece, or a deceased husband's nephew, my reply is, that these marriages rarely take place—so rarely that their prohibition does not appear to be felt as a practical grievance. In theory, no doubt, the case for their legalization is as strong as that which is dealt with in the Bill. But it has been found that, for every 100 marriages with a deceased wife's sister, there are only three with a deceased husband's brother; and for every marriage with the husband's nephew or wife's niece, there are no less than 300 with the wife's sister. Therefore, moderate as is the scope of this Bill, it will, as a Bill of Relief, be effective in something like 95 cases out of 100. How many innocent persons—the issue of second marriages with the sister of a first wife—are now bearing the stigma of illegitimacy I cannot say; but there must be tens of thousands of persons in that painful situation. I am assured that in London alone there are some 5,000 couples who have contracted this marriage; and a few minutes before I came down to the House this afternoon a letter was put into my hands, stating that the writer was personally acquainted with no less than 20 of these marriages in the small town of Stratford-on-Avon, where he lived. Then, as to the circumstances under which these marriages have been contracted, I happen myself to be personally acquainted with 13 men, and I have received letters from 15 others, each of whom had been requested by his first wife, in some cases when she was on her death-bed, to marry her sister, in order that she might have the satisfaction of knowing that, when she herself was gone, her children would be properly cared for. And I must say, my Lords, that I cannot find it in my heart to blame those men for complying with such a request. For aught I know, there may be, probably there are, hundreds of similar instances. During the last few days I have received so many letters on this subject that I have not had time to read a third part of them. But even if there had existed no more cases than those I am acquainted with, I should consider that I had good grounds for asking your Lordships to reform a law which would prevent a husband from complying with so natural and so reasonable a request made by his wife in her last moments. A law that would involve so painful an ordeal, even in a few cases, surely requires to be justified on the clearest grounds of public expediency. Therefore, if I am told that I am bound to show reason for wishing to disturb the existing state of things, I think I may, at least, with equal fairness, argue that the onus of proof lies rather with those who wish to retain the existing state of things. Then, as to public opinion, I may refer to the Petitions that have been laid on previous occasions before your Lordships' House. I know it is sometimes said that money and organization will procure any number of signatures to any Petition whatever; but among those in favour of this Bill that have at various times been laid before your Lordships' House are several which neither money nor organization could have procured. For instance, more than 1,000 municipal bodies have petitioned in its favour. All the 81 Scotch burghs have five times collectively petitioned in its favour, and of the 240 English boroughs, there are only 15 whose Corporations have not petitioned in favour of the Bill. Your Lordships will remember the important Petition from the Convention of Royal Burghs of Scotland, presented, I think, three years ago, and also the remarkable Petitions from the farmers of Buckingham and Norfolk, which were signed by an altogether overwhelming majority of the farmers of those counties. But I appeal, besides, to the steady advance which this measure has made in your Lordships' House during the past 30 years. That I consider to be proof, almost amounting to certainty, that the tide of public opinion is strongly setting in its favour, and that sooner or later it will be carried. My Lords, I have pointed out how limited is the scope of this measure, and the reason of its being so limited. I have pointed out how large is the probable number of persons to whom this Bill will bring relief. I have also shown under what peculiar circumstances marriage with a deceased wife's sister is sometimes contracted—circumstances which cannot but enlist sympathy on the side of those who offend against the present law; and I have shown that there is good reason to believe that public opinion is favourable to the change which this Bill proposes to make. I will next turn for a moment to some of the principal objections that are urged against it. I hardly think I need now trouble your Lordships with what I may call the Ecclesiastical objection. The chief objections urged now-a-days are based on the supposed social effects which it is prophesied would result from the passing of the Bill. It is said, for instance, that this Bill is a Bill for the abolition of sisters-in-law. So far as I can understand that argument, it comes to this—that because the law prevents their marriage, a young and marriageable sister-in-law may take up her abode with a young widower, manage his house for him, and take care of his children, without let or hindrance or scandal of any kind; but that if this Bill became law, it would be impossible for the bereaved husband to enjoy any longer the help and comfort of his sister-in-law's society. My Lords, I deny altogether the soundness of the foundation on which that argument is based, and I ask your Lordships whether you would allow any daughter of yours, even in the present state of the law, to reside alone in the house of a young brother-in-law, in order that she might take care of her sister's children? Then, as to giving rise to the question of scandal, there would be less chance of that if this Bill became law than there is at the present moment; because, if two people whom the law permitted to marry did not marry, the inference would be that they did not wish to marry. But what might be—and, as I believe, sometimes is—the situation as the law now stands? Why that a brotherly and sisterly affection might, and sometimes does, gradually ripen into a stronger and warmer attachment without either party being aware of the change, and if that should happen marriage is forbidden. I ask your Lordships, is that a desirable state of things, and is it not a danger which the present state of the law is distinctly calculated to increase? Because, by considering as brother and sister two persons who are not brother and sister—that is to say, by interposing a barrier where nature has placed none—the law merely throws both parties off their guard. The law cannot diminish the danger to which they are exposed. It can only conceal the existence of that danger; and, my Lords, I must say that the idea that the passing of this Bill will make it impossible any longer for a woman to take care of her sister's children, on the ground of the impropriety of her living in the house of her brother-in-law—a thing which it is asserted she may now do with safety, and without impropriety—presupposes a most exaggerated and, to my mind, altogether incomprehensible belief in the power of human law to control human passion. But I admit that there is just this one grain of sound argument in all the chaff about abolition of sisters-in-law—namely, that whereas now a woman may live with her bereaved brother-in-law, and help him with his family, without any ill-natured person being able to say that her object in doing so is to step into her sister's shoes, she will, if this Bill becomes law, have to face as best she may the chance of such things being said. But in regard to far more serious insinuations in regard to a scandal of a really grave and injurious character, she will be placed in a vastly superior position. First, because she will be on her guard against whatever danger may lurk in the so-called sisterly attachment; and secondly, because, should a more than sisterly affection spring up, marriage will be open to the parties. That being so, she can well afford to bear the slander of such envious tongues as may choose to say that her object in taking care of her sister's children is to marry her brother-in-law; and I will venture to say that in 99 cases out of 100 she would care nothing for it. It seems to me that those who assert that a selfish consideration, such as fear of what Mrs. Grundy might say, would deprive many a man of the solace and consolation that the sister of his wife might otherwise bring to his home, display a most unenviable ignorance of the courage and generosity of women. Again, it is urged that if this Bill is passed the domestic life of many families will be poisoned by the jealousy which will arise between husband and wife, and especially on the part of the wife towards her sisters. My answer to that is that I think it extremely improbable that many wives are tormented with the thought that when they are dead their husbands will marry again. But even granting, for the sake of argument, that, unfortunately, this were the case, is there any reason to suppose that the wife finds greater comfort and satisfaction in the thought that, at all events as the law now stands, her successor cannot be her own sister? Then, again, I have heard it said that this Bill will restrict the area of our unpassionate affections, just as if it were in the power of an Act of Parliament to exercise any such control over our affections as is here implied; and it is also asserted that, if it passes, the purity of English social life would disappear under its baneful and pernicious action, and the very bonds of society be loosened. In answer to this vague prophecy of evil, which is really too vague and intangible to argue against, I will refer your Lordships to the experience of our own Colonies, Australia and Tasmania, inhabited, as they are, by men of the same race as ourselves; and also to the experience of the New England States of America, where marriages with the deceased wife's sister are permitted. Have any of these evil effects made their appearance in these countries? Do any persons in these countries advocate that these marriages should be prohibited? Or look at our own country prior to the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, when these marriages were, in 99 cases out of 100, practically good and lawful marriages. Is there any evidence anywhere to be found in any records of any kind—in memoirs, in history, in novels, plays, or other writings—that this marriage between a man and his deceased wife's sister produced any evil results? Do we read of the constant jealousy of wives towards their sisters, or of any tendency to relax those bonds of morality which keep society together? And if we do not, may I not say, on behalf of the supporters of this Bill, that we have not merely reason, but also the facts of experience on our side; whilst our opponents are compelled to support themselves by prophecy and sentiment of the vaguest kind. Then, again, it has been said—I think in your Lordships' House—that 99 out of every 100 women are against the passing of this Bill. My Lords, I should like to hear that assertion proved. But I may say that it is certainly not the fault of the opponents of this Bill—both in Parliament and out of it—if women have not the most extraordinary notion as to what it is intended to do. The question has been so argued as to give the impression that this is a Bill to compel a man, on the death of his wife, to marry her sister, or, at least, to point her out to him as the proper person for him to marry, if he does marry again. Well, it is not surprising if wives, as a body, object to have their successors named during their own lifetime, or if sisters-in-law feel a little alarmed when they are told that this is a Bill for their abolition, because whatever that may mean, no one likes the idea of being abolished. Women have not had fair means of judging this question. If they had, and if there were some means of ascertaining their opinion, I see no reason to believe that it would be unfavourable to the Bill. There is, at this moment, before your Lordships a Petition in favour of the Bill signed by no less than 5,000 women, over 18 years of age, living in the Cathedral City of Lincoln, the total population of which is only 35,000. I could understand women wishing the scope of this measure were wider, or I could understand their objecting to all second marriages. But, so far from there being any reason to suppose that, in the case of a wife, the idea of her husband marrying again would be doubly painful, if she could think that there was a chance of his finding a second wife in her own sister, the reverse is probably nearer the truth. For we know that a wife on her death-bed sometimes begs her husband to marry her sister, thinking very naturally that in her own sister her children would be likely to find the kindest and best of stepmothers. Certainly, the picture of a dying wife, made happy in her last moments by the grim thought that, come what may, her sister, at all events, cannot succeed to her husband's affections, is grotesque and ridiculous in the last degree. But there is one more objection, my Lords—and this, I admit, is an objection more weighty than any of the others—namely, that to pass the Bill would be to grant an amnesty, by reason of its retrospective clause, to those who have already contracted this marriage in defiance of the law. No doubt, there is force in that argument; but, my Lords, how would the case stand if the retrospective clause were left out? Who would suffer? Not the parties you want to punish. Not the parties who broke the law. They would go off to the Registrar's office, or to church, and get married at once. The persons who would suffer would be the innocent children, who, if you do not make this measure retrospective, except, of course, in regard to property, would be left, as they are now, to bear the stigma of illegitimacy to the end of their days. It is for the sake of the children, my Lords, rather than of the parents, that I ask you to pass this Bill, and entirely for the sake of the children that I hope you will see fit to make its action retrospective. I may remind your Lordships that precedent is in favour of this case. Whether, in the time of Henry VIII., Queen Mary, or Queen Elizabeth, or in the more modern instance of Lord Lyndhurst's Act in 1835, every alteration in the Marriage Law has been retrospective. Moreover, if you should pass the Bill, omitting the retrospective clause, you would have this state of things—all persons born of these marriages between the year 1835 and the passing of this Bill would be illegitimate in the eyes of the law; while all persons born previously to 1835, or after the passing of the Bill, would be legitimate, an anomaly which, in practice, would be intolerable. I have now dealt with the principal objections to the Bill. I will next state the principal grounds on which, besides the one that I have just mentioned, I ask your Lordships to read it a second time. I might argue that as a general principle, when it is a question of marriage between any two parties, freedom ought to be the rule, and that those who would control that freedom are bound to show, in the absence of any natural or Divine law, that distinct and palpable evil would ensue if restrictions which they advocate were not imposed. But I do not rest the Bill on any such abstract ground. I think, in the first place, that a man ought to be allowed to marry the sister of his former wife, because his children are more likely to find a kind stepmother in the sister of their own mother than in anyone else. This argument is doubly strong in the case of the working classes; for when a labouring man loses his wife he must have someone to keep his house, and look after his children while he is out at work. I believe that, in those cases, it is more often the sister of his former wife who comes to live with him than anyone else. And your Lordships will understand that, when two persons who are no relation whatever to one another are living together on terms of intimacy and familiarity within the confined space of a working man's cottage, it is better, in the interests of morality, that they should be free to marry if they like. If the law forbids their marriage, the chances are that they may do worse, as it is called. Another consideration which, I think, ought to have great weight with your Lordships is this—that public opinion does not support the present law in regard to this particular marriage, and, consequently, the law is broken right and left, with perfect impunity to those who break it. Surely, that is an evil of the very first magnitude. I am not saying that because many people break the law therefore you ought to alter the law. What I say is this—When people do break this particular law, public opinion does not condemn them; on the contrary, public opinion sides with them against the law. For instance, the working classes of this country, especially in the North of England, are very pure and chaste, as a class. If a man and woman, in no way related or connected with one another, lived together without being married, they would, at least, be looked down upon by their neighbours. But let the woman be the sister of the man's former wife, and the arrangement is thought perfectly natural and proper. Again, the Royal Commission, appointed so long ago as 1847, to inquire into this matter, reported that the law failed to prevent these marriages, and that thousands of these marriages took place; and the Commissioners added—

The Earl of Dalhousie

“We do not find that the persons who contract these marriages, and the friends and relations who approve them, have a less strong sense than others of religious and moral obligations, or are marked by laxity of conduct.”

My Lords, these words are even more true at this moment than they were 35 years ago. Is it not, therefore, high time that the law should be brought into harmony with public opinion? Another reason in favour of the Bill is, that the present law presses very unequally on the rich and on the poor. A rich man, if he loses his wife, can pay nurses and governesses to take care of his children. He is, therefore, independent of his wife's relations. A poor man is not. He must get some woman of his own rank of life to come and live with him; and, as I have said, in the majority of cases that woman will most likely be the sister of his first wife. But, again, if a rich man wishes to marry his wife's sister, he can go abroad and do so. I believe that within the last fortnight no less than 10 such marriages between persons belonging to the United Kingdom have been celebrated in Switzerland. These marriages, it is true, will not be good in the eye of the law when the parties return to England; but if they have quieted their consciences by the performance of a religious ceremony, they will probably rest satisfied with what they have done; whereas a poor man is bound by his family to remain where he is, and, if he cannot get lawfully married, it is not wonderful if he should dispense with the ceremony of marriage altogether. But there have been instances where men have committed a criminal offence in order to secure the performance of the religious ceremony. I know of one case in which a noble and learned Lord, now a Member of your Lordships' House, found himself obliged to pass sentence for perjury upon a man who had made a false declaration solely with that object. Another most important argument in favour of the Bill is the anomaly produced by the fact that in the whole of the Australian Colonies, in Tasmania, and within the last few days in Canada also, marriage with the deceased wife's sister is allowed by law; and in New Zealand and Natal Bills legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister have passed the Legislatures, and are only waiting for the Royal Assent. Suppose, for example, a man to have married, as he lawfully may in one of the Colonies, the sister of his first wife, he afterwards embarks for England with his wife and family, he could not land in England with his wife, because, on arriving in England, she has ipso facto ceased to be his wife and becomes his mistress, and her husband would be legally free to marry another woman. Is that a state of things which ought to be allowed to continue? And, apart from the anomaly, is it not desirable, my Lords, that on broader grounds of statesmanship, which none can appreciate better than your Lordships, there should be as little difference as possible in the laws of the several parts of the Empire. I know it may be said, in regard to the Colonies, that it is not the Mother Country which ought to follow the lead of the Colonies, but vice versa. That argument, however, is little better than mere pedantry; and I feel sure that your Lordships will be of opinion that, for the sake of the Empire, it is not wise to maintain unnecessary difference between the laws of this country and those of our Colonies. In the case of the particular law to which this Bill refers, it would be doubly unwise to do so, because our law is of very recent origin. Prior to Lord Lyndhurst's Act in 1835, marriage with a deceased wife's sister was practically permitted. It is a fact that, until the passing of the Act 47 years ago, marriages within the table of prohibited degree were not prohibited by any enactment of Statute Law; and, consequently, marriages with a deceased wife's sister were, in 99 cases out of 100, practically good and lawful marriages. They were virtually never called in question, and could only be set aside by a process in the Ecclesiastical Courts—a process which could easily be avoided by getting someone to institute a friendly suit, and to keep it on foot till one of the parties died. I may, perhaps, be allowed to remind your Lordships of some points in the history of Lord Lyndhurst's Act, for it was never intended that that Act should have its present consequences. In 1835, Lord Lyndhurst brought in a Bill, the original intention of which, as stated in the Preamble, was to limit to two years the time within which a suit could be brought in the Ecclesiastical Court, for the purpose of setting aside a marriage contracted within prohibited degrees. The Bill provided that at the end of those two years, if no suit were brought, those marriages were to hold good. The immediate object of the Bill, and the sole reason of its being introduced, was to legalize the marriage of a Member of your Lordships' House, who, in marrying a second time, had married a sister of his first wife. But in its passage through your Lordships' House the Bill was entirely altered. The right rev. Bench refused to consent to its passing, unless all such marriages as might be contracted in future should be made absolutely null and void. Consequently, the Act of 1835 legalized, in the most extraordinary and inconsistent manner, all marriages within the prohibited degrees contracted previous to the date of its passing, but prohibited, or at least invalidated, all such marriages, including, of course, that with the sister of a former wife, contracted after that date. And these marriages, which, prior to 1835, although theoretically, and in strict law, void, were practically, and in effect, only voidable, and scarcely ever called in question, became after that date absolutely void by the Statute Law of the land. Therefore, I submit that any argument based on the assumption that the law in its present state has the experience of centuries to recommend it is altogether without foundation. I have now stated, very imperfectly, but to the best of my ability, the case for the Bill, and I am most grateful to your Lordships for the kindness and patience with which you have listened to me. My excuse for speaking at such length must be the hardship and unreasonableness of the present state of the Marriage Law, in so far as it relates to a marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I feel sure that your Lordships must sympathize with the offspring of these marriages, who are now condemned to suffer the penalty of illegitimacy, with all the social disadvantages it entails, for an offence committed by their parents against positive law, it is true, but not against Christian morality; and I sincerely trust that the House will regard this Bill from a practical point of view, remembering that the question involved in it is not whether marriage between a widower and his sister-in-law is or is not a desirable thing, but whether there is any just ground for prohibiting it by law. In the absence of any such ground, the mere question of desirability and expediency is surely one that ought to be left to the parties themselves. Unless, therefore, the prohibition of this marriage can be shown to rest on some solid and palpable foundation, I venture to hope that your Lordships will be of opinion that it ought to be removed. I do not expect that the opponents of the Bill will venture to take their stand on theological or ecclesiastical grounds; and as to the lugubrious prophecies in which they indulge, we have the experience of the past in this country, and of the present in our Colonies, to prove that these gloomy vaticinations are the idlest of dreams. I now beg to move that the Bill be read a second time, and hope that this restriction on marriage will be removed from the Statute Book.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

LORD BALFOUR, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, said: My Lords, there are two aspects in which this question may be looked at—namely, argument may be used against the Bill from the theological, or, perhaps, I should rather say, Scriptural, point of view; and also the arguments which may occur to anyone who looks at the social aspect of the question. I was not prepared altogether for the utter contempt which the noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) seems inclined to throw upon the Scriptural side of the argument against the passing of the Bill. I am perfectly aware that there are some who go so far as to deny that whatever the Scripture says on this question it should have any effect on our laws in this 19th century; and there are others who say that if they could be convinced that Scripture did forbid such a marriage as this, they would vote against the Bill, but that they cannot be so convinced. But I frankly own that I belong to neither of those classes, for I do believe that there is a Scriptural prohibition binding upon us at this present day against legalizing the marriage which this Bill proposes to legalize; and I trust your Lordships will bear with me if, after what has fallen from the noble Earl opposite, I venture to give the grounds upon which I have formed that opinion. It is very commonly asserted by the promoters of this Bill that those who oppose it on Scriptural grounds found their opposition upon the 18th verse of the 18th chapter of the Book of Leviticus; but I need hardly tell your Lordships, at this stage of the controversy, that that is not so. Those of your Lordships who think as I do, and all others who likewise think with me, rely not upon one verse, but upon the whole tenour of the chapter. We regard the tenour of the chapter as a code, and as a code which is to be interpreted according to its spirit, and which, to a very large extent, is governed by words which occur in the 6th verse—"That no one is to approach unto those who are near of kin." And then, in the following verses, we contend it proceeds to define what is meant by near of kin, and the prohibitions which follow are not enumerated exhaustively, but are merely put forward as examples from which those for whom the code is intended are to work out for themselves what that code is to be; and if, looking at it in that light, your Lordships will refer to this chapter, you will see that there are certain, what I may call specimen, prohibitions, some of them as to relatives by consanguinity and some as to relatives by affinity. The relationships of affinity and consanguinity, which are prohibited directly by Scripture, are mixed up in about equal proportion. I am sure the promoters of the Bill would concede that this code must be interpreted all through either upon its letter or upon its spirit; it cannot be allowed to be taken sometimes according to its letter, and at other times according to its spirit. Suppose you take it that it must be strictly interpreted by its letter; in that case, noble Lords opposite are at once involved in numerous and serious difficulties. Relationships by affinity are forbidden much more remote than some by consanguinity, which, according to that reading, would be permitted; but if you are to interpret it by its spirit, it can only be worked out in a logical way in the form with which your Lordships are familiar—namely, the Table of Affinity, which is the law of the land. I know that some people say this is a Jewish law; but I think anyone who studies the chapter as a whole will see that it is not so—that these prohibitions are not directed against acts to be done, or supposed to be done, by the Israelites themselves, but that the condemnation with which these acts would be visited is obviously, by the words of Scripture, meant to include the Gentile nations, which were then living around them. I would also say this—that for many centuries the Primitive Church did accept this code as binding upon all of us, and it is necessary to come down to quite recent times before any view in an opposite sense is maintained. One more suggestion—that if this code is not binding upon us at the present time, there is, then, in the whole Scripture, no law against incest at all. Another attempt to dispose of this code as binding upon us at the present day is often put forward, more especially in regard to this particular connection which your Lordships are now debating. I have heard it said that even if you admit that this code on the whole would be binding upon us, there is a special exception in favour of the wife's sister, and that that exception is given in the 15th verse of the 18th chapter of Leviticus; but I must say that I cannot see how that can be held at all. Let us take the verse as it stands in the authorized version of the Old Testament, which, I believe, is the most favourable version to the advocates of this Bill, and it will be found, in the words of that version, that it is a simple prohibition against a particular kind of polygamy. How a man can argue, therefore, that because a particular kind of polygamy is condemned, and because that particular connection is condemned during the lifetime of the wife, that there is a permission to form that connection afterwards, and that that permission is sufficiently strong to dispense with what I hope I have shown is a code otherwise binding upon all at the present time, I cannot understand. To turn to the social aspect of the question, the first remark that I feel inclined to make upon the subject is this—that surely, after the law in its present state has existed in this country so long as it has, the onus of proof should lie, not on those who wish to maintain the law, but upon those who are anxious to make the change in the law. It has often been said that this change was introduced at the time of the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act. I do not understand the noble Earl who has just sat down to hold that view; but I know that many who support the Bill are inclined to promulgate that view. I do not ask them to take my words upon a question of English law, but to pay attention to what Lord Brougham said in giving judgment in the case of "Fenton v. Livingstone." In that case, his Lordship said the marriage was "Clearly illegal, according to the laws of England, and that if it had been questioned while the parties were alive, it must have been voided ab initio, because it was contrary to the law."

And Lord Hatherley also held the same view, and said that the law of England, both ecclesiastical and civil,

"Had, from the first institution of a Monarchy, held marriage with a wife's sister to be an incestuous marriage."

That proves that the law, as it at present stands, has been in existence for about 1,200 years, and surely I am entitled, if anyone proposes to change it, to ask them to give proper proof that such a change is necessary. If you pass this Bill, it will be the first time in the history of English law that any difference is made between the marriage of a man with his deceased wife's sister, and between a man and his own sister, or any other relationship which is admitted to be incestuous. It will be the first time even that any suggestion has been made of making any difference between those relationships. The fact really is, that these marriages have been all along illegal, although, as the noble Earl has said, there were certain difficulties in the way of declaring them void; and all that Lord Lyndhurst's Act did was to declare that all those that had taken place before the passing of the Act should not in future be called in question, and that for the future all such marriages should be void without any declaration to that effect. That being the case, then, all this goes to prove that the onus of proof should lie upon those who advocate the change. What is it that the House has been told in favour of a change being made? The promoters of the Bill have often said that this restriction is found to be irksome. But on whom is it found to be irksome? The noble Earl admits that the chief persons who find the law irksome are those who have already broken the law; and so it ought to be; but that, I think, your Lordships will be very slow indeed to admit as a reason for changing a law. In my opinion, a law ought always to be irksome to those who have broken it.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: I rise to Order. I advocated this change on the ground of hardship to the children, and not so much on account of those who have already broken the law.

LORD BALFOUR: I was just coming to that. And look at the lesson you would teach by passing this Bill on such grounds—that you have only to break the law and to make it irksome to yourself and children, and to do it with sufficient persistence, to induce the Legislature to change it for you? If I have misrepresented the noble Earl, I apologize to him, for it is not my desire to do so; but it does not seem to me that the correction of the noble Earl made any great difference as regards the general line of argument I was following, and endeavouring to press upon the notice of the House. I will say with regard to this that I will quote the words of the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chief Justice of England (Lord Coleridge), who I am glad to see in his place. He once said in this House—

"That no change in the law of this kind should be made except for the general good, and in harmony with the general sentiment of the people."

And I do not think that anything which the noble Earl has told you will prove anything as to there being a general feeling on the part of the people of this country in favour of a change; still less has he proved that this change would be for the general good. I have not got such an extensive acquaintance amongst those who have broken the law as the noble Earl opposite; but, so far as my observation in private life enables me to judge, I should say that a large majority of the educated classes of this country are against this change in the law. At any rate, I am perfectly certain of this—that the most ardent advocate of the Bill cannot do more than say that the educated classes are divided upon the subject. The noble Earl made a considerable point in saying that this restriction is specially irksome to the poor; but I venture to say that is not the case, and that there is a great insufficiency of evidence in support of the assertion. In fact, judging from what people say who have the best means of knowing, I think it is inherently improbable that it should be the case. People in the humbler classes marry young, and the cases in which there will be a free sister-in-law in that rank of life will be proportionately very much fewer than in the higher ranks. Besides, I think the testimony of those who know the humbler classes goes to show it is not the case; and if the necessities of house-keeping and taking care of children are to be assumed as arguments in favour of the Bill, they may be pressed in favour of legalizing marriages with a good many other relatives. The noble Earl who moved the introduction of the Bill gave us a long Parliamentary history of the progress of this measure in the House of Commons; but I would remind the noble Earl that such statistics as he has quoted do not tell much in its favour. They are altogether fallacious. Let me remind the House of the various Parliaments which have expressed their opinion in favour of or against the measure. The first time any attempt at legislation took place was in 1841, when the House of Commons refused to allow of the introduction of the Bill; that elected in 1847 read it a second time twice; that elected in 1852 read it a second time once, and once rejected it; that elected in 1859 twice rejected it; that elected in 1866 once rejected it; that elected in 1868 four times read it a second time, but the majority was reduced from 100 to a little over 30; the House elected in 1874 rejected it the only time it was presented to its notice. The Bill was not again presented to a House of Commons found to be adverse to it, and I therefore maintain that we should have regard less to the number of times it has been passed than to the number of Parliaments that have passed it or rejected it. The fact that the House of Commons elected in 1874 rejected it once and decisively is as good a fact as that the House elected in 1868 passed it four times, for if it had been presented four times to the later Parliament it would have been four times rejected. As to the fact that we have been told that the aunt is the natural guardian of the children, and that it is, therefore, proper that she should take charge of them, a widower's first consideration, on looking for another wife, is not who will take the most care of his children; and, even if it were so, the deceased wife's sister would not be placed in a better position for taking care of the children by the passing of this Bill. She would rather be in a worse, for she would be at once expelled from the house. It has been said that the maintenance of the law places England in a singular position; but why is that? The advocates of change have certainly found Colonial Parliaments more facile, and have wrung a reluctant consent from the Home Government to their Bills; but that is no argument why we should change a law which has stood for 1,200 years. The present Bill is founded on no logical principle. That is claimed as an advantage, for it is urged upon us that the change proposed is a very small one; but, if so, and we were to pass it on that ground, the consequence will be that its acceptance will be used as an argument for a much larger one. The fact is that a law of such importance must be founded on some principle; and if your Lordships were once to make any distinction between the prohibited degrees of affinity and consanguinity, I do not see where you are to stop until the whole Table of Affinity is swept away. If you once do away with this restriction, you will strike a blow at those prohibitions which rightly encircle all our family life, and you will do a very great injustice to the feelings of the large majority of people for the benefit of a very few, and those few are those who have already broken the law. By passing this Bill your Lordships will do violence to the feelings of a large majority for the sake of a very small minority. The noble Earl opposite said that if the Bill passed a widower would not be forced to marry his deceased wife's sister. But it will put it in his power to do so, and therein lies the mischief. The opponents of the measure are not afraid that by-and-bye it will become the custom to marry one's deceased wife's sister; but the difficulty and the danger which they apprehend will arise before the death of the wife. It is our objection to the alterations which will be effected in our relations in the family circle that leads us to oppose the Bill. Women in households in England are fenced about by certain wise restrictions, and I think the wife's sister is one of those who are entitled to that protection, and your Lordships will do her a great injustice if you remove the prohibition. I am only too painfully aware of the inefficiency with which I have put forward what I honestly believe to be a very strong case. I ask your Lordships to reject the Bill, because it is founded on no principle, because it will settle nothing, and unsettle everything, in a sphere in which it is most important that change should not be lightly introduced. If the Bill were to pass I believe that it will bring confusion where there is now harmony; that it will sacrifice the peace, the happiness, and the convictions of a large majority for the sake of the mere morbid cravings of a few; and that it will attach a fatal measure of success to a persistent and most unscrupulous agitation. It is for these reasons that I now move its rejection.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months").—(The Lord Balfour.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD, in supporting the Motion for the second reading of the Bill, said, he considered that the objections raised by the noble Lord near him (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) were based on two points. Some of his objections were based on the law of God, to the effect that we were bound by the Levitical law; and the others were mere matter of sentiment. He (the Marquess of Waterford) believed both grounds to be entirely false; and in regard to what occurred in Holy Writ in reference to this question, the noble Lord had not, as far as he could see, adduced a single argument to bear out what he said. Therefore, they had to deal with what was really a matter of sentiment; and he believed it to be an entirely false sentiment. Indeed, it had been proved to be so by the procedure of other nations and of our own Colonies; and it was an attempt to create by law blood relations which did not exist in fact, and to preserve morality by an edict which he believed to be the greatest inducement to immorality in the English Statute Book. It was argued that great injustice would be done to a sister and a sister-in-law if these marriages were permitted. He supposed the noble Lord meant that jealousy would be created; that what had been called pure affection could not exist between a brother-in-law and a sister-in-law under those circumstances; and that, therefore, the sister-in-law could not take care of her sister's children after her death. But was it possible to prevent jealousies by any law which the Legislature might pass? Jealousies would always exist; and he believed that a wife would much prefer her sister to have charge of her children after her death in the position of a wedded wife, rather than in the position which was too often created by the present law—namely, that of the husband's mistress. Again, he desired to say a word as to the possibility of a young widower having his sister-in-law to take care of his children. In his opinion, it was a most questionable position at any time; and he believed none of their Lordships would like to see their female relations placed in such a position, though some of their Lordships would not object to a marriage which would place the sister in the position of a real mother to her deceased sister's children. At present, both parties had only to go to the Continent, or to one of our Colonies, in order to remove the barrier to their union; and they knew that even poor people might look forward to such marriages taking place, if they could save a few pounds and go over to the Continent. He believed that the laws relating to marriage were the same as the laws relating to everything else. They were made with a view of creating the greatest amount of happiness, healthfulness, morality, and prosperity among mankind; and there was no meaning in any restriction, excepting among blood relations. He thought, then, it was quite clear that they should stop at blood relations; but the deceased wife's sister was in a different position to that; and it was more against the law of nature that first cousins should marry than that a man should marry a deceased wife's sister. It had been stated that if these marriages were permitted we should do away with the pure affection which existed as between a brother and sister. But passion could not be curbed by Act of Parliament, and could only be curbed by the laws of nature, which permitted affection without passion between blood relations, but which created passion in the breasts of a pure-minded man and woman when there was no bar of nature to prevent their intermarriage. Those who objected to this Bill must be blind to its effects on the people of the Continent and our Colonies, where these marriages were allowed without any ill-results whatever. Sisters-in-law were not done away with; they were still able to take charge of their nephews and nieces; they were still able to live in the same house on terms of affection with their married sisters—no evil results had followed, but, on the contrary, the very best results—because it had been found that legalizing marriage with the deceased wife's sister was most conducive to morality. No one could deny that the English law, as it was at present, had forced many people, especially among the poorer classes, into leading immoral lives, and into breaking the law of the land by marrying in spite of it. There was no punishment for doing this, and they were unable to strike at those who disobeyed the law, except through their innocent children. He thought it absolutely wicked that—having an unnecessary law upon the Statute Book which their Lordships had refused to repeal, and being powerless to prevent or punish those who break the law—that they should attack them by branding with the name of bastard the pure little life of a child the moment it appeared in the world, depriving it of its inheritance, giving it no name, and holding it up as a reproach, to be pointed at with the finger of scorn as long as it might live. That was anything but a noble vindication of the law; and, therefore, it ought not to be kept in existence, as it had been, by small majorities in their Lordships' House. Therefore, he sincerely trusted that their Lordships would pass the Bill. It would do no harm to any man, while it would do enormous good to many living and to many yet to be born.

LORD HOUGHTON and the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH rose simultaneously to address the House; but there being loud cries for the latter, the noble Lord resumed his seat.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH said, it was with very great hesitation and some reluctance that he ventured to address their Lordships on that question; and, strange as it might appear to their Lordships, he had really no intention of doing so when he came down to the House. That, however, was the most favourable time for him to do so, and his reason for speaking was this. The speech of the noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) gave him an opportunity of stating that he was aware that the ground he must take in opposing the Bill introduced by the noble Earl on his right was different from that taken by many of those who conscientiously opposed it. He had never been able, in the course of his opposition to the measure, to take what was commonly called the high Scriptural or theological ground, at least as regarded the Old Testament, which was taken by many of his right rev. Brethren on the Bench, in opposition to allowing a man to marry the sister of his deceased wife. It had always seemed to him that the interpretation of the verse which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) quoted, as forming the basis of his opposition, was rather questionable, and had been questioned; and he was further of opinion that if we adopted one portion of the Levitical law, as regarded marriage, it was difficult to see why we should not adopt the whole of it. He would fully admit, as a matter of course, that among theologians any precept of moral obligation was binding upon the consciences of men, even though it was in the Levitical law; but the question as to whether the whole code of the chapter from which the particular verse was taken was or was not one of moral or positive obligation was an open question. He held that if there was any doubt upon the matter, the whole onus probandi of adducing arguments to upset a law which had stood for 1,200 years lay upon those who took the opposite view to that which he adopted. Having said that much, he would pass away from the theological and Scriptural ground of objection to the Bill, and would wish to deal with the subject on the ground on which the noble Marquess who just now addressed the House (the Marquess of Waterford) threw some contempt. The noble Marquess said that if we abandoned the Scripture it became wholly a question of sentiment. But sentiment was a most important, a most powerful element in deciding such a question; for, if sentiment had to do with anything in the world, it was with this question of marriage. Therefore, to dispose in that question of marriage of a sentimental argument, as though the question had nothing to do with sentiment, was hardly logical, for it would have to be considered, seeing that any infringement upon the popular sentiment was sure to excite opposition and discontent. He must confess that he would hardly have ventured to address their Lordships had it not been to express his thanks to the noble Lord opposite for furnishing one of the ablest arguments he had ever heard against that Bill. The noble Lord had the courage of his opinions. He had admitted that, if you were to deal with that question as a question of principle, you could only stop short at the prohibition of marriage with blood relations. The whole Table of Affinity would be swept away. The noble Lord had admitted—and he (the Bishop of Peterborough) entirely agreed with him—that you could not sweep away one of the prohibitions in the Table of Affinity, unless you were prepared to sweep them all away. The noble Lord, with a candour which did him honour, had plainly said to what that alteration of the law logically and necessarily led. He (the Bishop of Peterborough) trusted that the supporters of the Bill would lay that matter to heart, and he thanked the noble Lord for that argument in favour of the Bill. He would now pass from the question of sentiment, which largely and deeply entered into the consideration of that Bill. He had not had the advantage of hearing the speech of the noble Earl who moved the second reading, though he had heard that it was a remarkably able speech. But he hardly supposed that the noble Earl could have adduced any new argument. He ventured, therefore, to assume that the great argument in favour of the Bill contained in the speech of the noble Earl was that it was a poor man's Bill, meeting in a special manner the needs and affections of the poor man. If he (the Bishop of Peterborough) believed that, he would be the last person in the world to oppose the Bill. It had been the fashion of the supporters of the Bill outside that House to say that the opposition of the Bench behind him to the Bill was a bigoted and narrow opposition, and that they who lived in palaces knew nothing of the wants and needs of the poor man; that in disregard to those wants they clung to an obsolete Table of Affinity in their Prayer Books. But his opposition to that Bill would have been equally strong if the whole Table of Affinity were struck out. It was not as an Episcopalian or as a clergyman that he opposed that Bill, although he held that the deep convictions and rooted sentiments of the great majority of Churchmen were entitled to some consideration at the hands of their Lordships; but he opposed it because he claimed to know as much as any of their Lordships in that House of the wants and sorrows of the poor man. He claimed that the Bishops of the Church of England, from personal knowledge, and from their conversations with their clergy, had some right to speak in that House on the condition and requirements of the poor. But that Bill was not a poor man's Bill, either in its inception, progress, or in the needs that called for it. From beginning to end it had been a rich man's Bill; and it was not now in the interests of the poor man that it was really moved for, though he admitted the noble Earl conscientiously believed the assurance of many of his supporters and prompters that it was a poor man's Bill. It had been clearly pointed out by the noble Lord who moved the rejection of the Bill that the cases arose much more frequently in the homes of the rich than in those of the poor with which that Bill would deal. The Bill was supposed to give to the poor man who had lost his wife the advantage of having someone come into his house to take charge of his children upon whom he could rely to treat them with kindness. But the fact was that the Bill immediately deprived such a man of that advantage, and he wondered that it had not occurred to the supporters of the Bill that common decency and regard to the proprieties of life would always prevent a widower bringing a new wife into his house within a year, at least, of his former wife's death. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] He could hardly understand the laugh by which that statement was honoured. Did the noble Lord who laughed mean that a man, though he might be a poor man, could ask in common decency a person who might become his future wife to come and live in the same house with him before his first wife's remains were cold in the grave? In common decency, he repeated, one year was supposed to elapse before a man could bring home a fresh wife. Thus a man would be, for one year at least, prevented from bringing into his house a woman whom the law had declared to be no nearer to him than any other woman. A poor man had delicate feelings as well as a rich man, and could hardly be expected to ask his wife's sister to remain in the house for at least 12 months after his wife's death; and thus for a year the children, whose case was so strongly advocated, would be left deprived of the most natural and effectual guardianship. As things were, during the presence of the sister-in-law, the widower would be able to find a suitable wife to take care of the children. Except, therefore, in the case of a guilty and criminal attachment during the lifetime of the wife, there was not the inducement which it was supposed there was even for the poor man to marry his sister-in-law. Then it was said that the sister-in-law would naturally prove the most affectionate guardian of her nephews and nieces. He doubted that proposition extremely. It might be the case so long as the sister-in-law, when married to the widower, remained childless; but once there was raised in the breast of the woman the deepest passion of human nature, as well as the holiest—the love of her own children—there would arise all those formidable possibilities of jealousy of the children of her predecessor—her deceased sister. The feelings of the injuncta noverca arose in great measure from the love of a mother as well as from baser motives, and were not to be overcome by the mere fact that the step-children were the children of the stepmother's own sister. On the contrary, it would often make the misery of a sister the more bitter. That was a fact which ought to be taken into account in this controversy. The whole of the stepmother argument, therefore, fell to the ground in the presence of the broad facts of nature; but those broad facts had to be taken into account, and it was important to bear that in mind when the noble Earl said that the only laws of God are the laws of nature, and that they were sufficient to restrain men from the temptation of infringing the sacred law of consanguinity, but not sufficiently powerful to prevent them from transgressing those of affinity. The law of nature and the law of God in their original purity were, doubtless, the same; but it ought not to be forgotten that the laws of nature were the laws of a corrupted and fallen nature, and it could not be assumed that the passions of a fallen and corrupted nature represented the laws of God. He pleaded not only for the poor man, but for the rich man also. He pleaded, likewise, most earnestly for a class which especially needed protection—he pleaded for sisters-in-law as they were. The relation of sister-in-law and brother-in-law was one of the most beautiful and endearing of all family relationships. There was a sweet tenderness and a depth of affection in it which could only be found elsewhere in the nearest ties of blood relationship. There were hundreds of brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law who had no thought of marriage with each other, and it was those whom the Bill would necessarily sever, as it would be no longer possible for the sister-in-law to remain in her brother-in-law's house when her sister had died. Social disturbance of a most painful kind would arise. He was not speaking of the disturbance which might arise before the second marriage. He was not speaking of the bitterness and jealousy which might be brought about by the attractions of the younger sister in the heart of the wife whom that younger sister might succeed. He was only speaking of the unfortunate sister-in-law who might for years have lived happily with her sister and nephews and nieces, but who, by that Bill, would be driven from their homes. And that effect was to be brought about for the sake of an experiment, and to gratify the passions of rich men, who could not control themselves, and those experimentalizing philosophers who found nothing so safe as to experiment upon matters of that kind without a particle of principle to guide them. Sisters-in-law might remain with their brothers-in-law in a position dubious to the world; but in which their superior strength and virtue would enable them to despise the opinion of the world. It had been said that sisters-in-law might still remain in charge of the children; but they would no longer still be sisters-in-law. They would be evicted as sisters-in-law, and put in as caretakers; and he should hardly have thought the practice of Irish landlords would meet with such favour on that (the Ministerial) side of the House. He protested against the Bill, because it contained no shred of principle; because it would do harm to a number of most deserving persons; and because it picked out of a number of prohibited degrees one, and one only, while it did not attempt to introduce any fixed principle of legislation with regard to the Marriage Law. If they were to disturb the Marriage Law with regard to affinity which had lasted for centuries, he did not use too strong and earnest words when he said—“For God’s sake find some other principle which you can introduce into the Law of Marriage.” These were not times for unnecessary, rash, and experimental legislation on the subject of marriage. In the country districts other Bishops and himself knew that not only marriages of too near affinity, but marriages of too near consanguinity, were of sadly frequent occurrence in the homes of the poor; and he dreaded the effect upon the home of the poor man when he would be told that the highest Legislative Assembly in the whole Realm had, without any fixed principle, and without any reason alleged for it, save this, that a great many desired it, introduced a perilous relaxation of the Law of Marriage, as to which not only he, the poor man, with his dull and uneducated mind, but the most accomplished and eloquent supporters of the Bill in that House could not find a logical principle that would prevent their going on to other degrees, and to others and others again. This Bill cruelly disturbed the existing relationships of happy homes. It would not bring the advantages it was supposed it would bring; and if it did bring those advantages, those advantages would be terribly dearly purchased by the social evil, the immoral laxity, and the wild disturbance of the social relationships which the Bill would provoke. On those grounds he should vote against the Bill.

The Marquess of Waterford

On question, that (“now”) stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 128; Not-Contents 131: Majority 3.

CONTENTS.

Wales, H.R.H. the Edinburgh, H.R.H. D.
Prince of Albany, H.R.H. D.

VOL. CCLXX. [THIRD SERIES.]

Brandon, D. (D. Hamilton.)
Cleveland, D.
Portland, D.
Saint Albans, D.
Sutherland, D.
Westminster, D.

Abergavenny, M.
[Teller.]
Ailesbury, M.
Northampton, M.

Ashburnham, E.
Aylesford, E.
Bathurst, E.
Camperdown, E.
Cawdor, E.
Chichester, E.
Clarendon, E.
Clonmell, E.
Derby, E.
Ducie, E.
Durham, E.
Ellesmere, E.
Essex, E.
Fortescue, E.
Granville, E.
Ilchester, E.
Innes, E. (D. Roxburghe.)
Kimberley, E.
Leven and Melville, E.
Malmesbury, E.
Morley, E.
Northbrook, E.
Onslow, E.
Pembroke and Montgomery, E.
Saint Germans, E.
Strange, E. (D. Athol.)
Suffolk and Berkshire, E.
Sydney, E.
Verulam, E.
Yarborough, E.
Zetland, E.

Bolingbroke and St. John, V.
Combermere, V.
Falmouth, V.
Gough, V.
Hutchinson, V. (E. Donoughmore.)
Leinster, V. (D. Leinster.)
Powerscourt, V.
Sherbrooke, V.
Torrington, V.

Aberdare, L.
Abinger, L.
Alington, L.
Annaly, L.
Ardilaun, L.
Auckland, L.
Belper, L.
Blantyre, L.
Boyle, L. (E. Cork and Orrery.)
Brabourne, L.
Bramwell, L.

Braye, L.
Breadalbane, L. (E. Breadalbane.)
Calthorpe, L.
Camoys, L.
Carlingford, L.
Carrington, L.
Churchill, L.
Clifton, L. (E. Darnley.)
Clonbrock, L.
Conyers, L.
Cottesloe, L.
Dacre, L.
De L’Isle and Dudley, L.
de Ros, L.
Dorchester, L.
Fitzhardinge, L.
Haldon, L.
Hare, L. (E. Listowel.)
Hastings, L.
Hothfield, L.
Houghton, L.
Howth, L. (E. Howth.)
Inchiquin, L.
Kenmare, L. (E. Kenmare.)
Kenry, L. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
Kintore, L. (E. Kintore.)
Lawrence, L.
Leigh, L.
Loftus, L. (M. Ely.)
Londesborough, L.
Lyttelton, L.
Methuen, L.
Monson, L.
Mostyn, L.
Mount Temple, L.
Oriel, L. (V. Massereene.)
Ormathwaite, L.
Ormonde, L. (M. Ormonde.)
Ramsay, L. (E. Dalhousie.) [Teller.]
Reay, L.
Romilly, L.
Rosebery, L. (E. Rosebery.)
Sandhurst, L.
Sandys, L.
Sefton, L. (E. Sefton.)
Shute, L. (V. Barrington.)
Skene, L. (E. Fife.)
Somerton, L. (E. Normanton.)
Stanley of Alderley, L.
Strafford, L. (V. Enfield.)
Strathspey, L. (E. Seafield.)
Sudeley, L.
Suffield, L.
Thurlow, L.
Tollemache, L.
Tredegar, L.
Truro, L.
Tweeddale, L. (M. Tweeddale.)
Tyrone, L. (M. Waterford.)

Walsingham, L.
Waveney, L.
Wentworth, L.
Wimborne, L.

Worlingham, L. (E. Gosford.)
Wrottesley, L.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Selborne, L. (L. Chancellor.)
York, L. Archp.

Buckingham and Chandos, D.
Leeds, D.
Marlborough, D.
Norfolk, D.
Northumberland, D.
Rutland, D.

Bath, M.
Bristol, M.
Hertford, M.
Salisbury, M.

Amherst, E.
Annesley, E.
Beauchamp, E.
Belmore, E.
Brownlow, E.
Cairns, E.
Carnarvon, E.
Dartmouth, E.
De La Warr, E.
Denbigh, E.
Devon, E.
Doncaster, E. (D. Buccleuch and Queensberry.)
Dundonald, E.
Effingham, E.
Feversham, E.
Hardwicke, E.
Harewood, E.
Jersey, E.
Lanesborough, E.
Lucan, E.
Macclesfield, E.
Manvers, E.
Mar and Kellie, E.
Milltown, E.
Morton, E.
Mount Oashell, E.
Nelson, E.
Powis, E.
Redesdale, E.
Selkirk, E.
Shaftesbury, E.
Sondes, E.
Stanhope, E.
Stradbroke, E.
Strathmore and Kinghorn, E.
Waldegrave, E.

Cranbrook, V.
Hardinge, V.
Hawarden, V.
Hood, V.
Melville, V.
Sidmouth, V.
Templetown, V.

Bangor, L. Bp.
Chichester, L. Bp.

Durham, L. Bp.
Ely, L. Bp.
Exeter, L. Bp.
Gloucester and Bristol, L. Bp.
Lincoln, L. Bp.
Llandaff, L. Bp.
London, L. Bp.
Manchester, L. Bp.
Norwich, L. Bp.
Oxford, L. Bp.
Peterborough, L. Bp.
St. Albans, L. Bp.
St. Asaph, L. Bp.
Winchester, L. Bp.

Arundell of Wardour, L.
Balfour of Burleigh, L. [Teller.]
Beaumont, L.
Blachford, L.
Boston, L.
Botreaux, L. (E. Loudoun.)
Brancepeth, L. (V. Boyne.)
Braybrooke, L.
Carysfort, L. (E. Carysfort.)
Chelmsford, L.
Clinton, L. [Teller.]
Colchester, L.
Coleridge, L.
Congleton, L.
Crewe, L.
De Freyne, L.
Delamere, L.
Denman, L.
Digby, L.
Dinevor, L.
Donington, L.
Ellenborough, L.
Emly, L.
Ettrick, L. (L. Napier.)
Forbes, L.
Forester, L.
Foxford, L. (E. Limerick.)
Greville, L.
Hammond, L.
Harlech, L.
Hawke, L.
Heytesbury, L.
Hylton, L.
Ker, L. (M. Lothian.)
Lamington, L.
Lovel and Holland, L. (E. Egmont.)
Lyveden, L.
Massy, L.
Meldrum, L. (M. Huntly.)
Monck, L. (V. Monck.)
Moncreiff, L.
Oranmore and Browne, L.

Oxenfoord, L. (E. Stair.)
Penrhyn, L.
Petre, L.
Poltimore, L.
Raglan, L.
Rayleigh, L.
Ross, L. (E. Glasgow.)
Sackville, L.
Saltoun, L.
Sherborne, L.

Silchester, L. (E. Longford.)
Stratheden and Campbell, L.
Strathnairn, L.
Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll.) Templemore, L.
Tenterden, L.
Trevor, L.
Windsor, L.

Resolved in the negative; and Bill to be read 2^a on this day six months.

PUBLIC HEALTH (FRUIT-PICKERS LODGINGS)
BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to extend the Public Health Act, 1875, to the making of bye-laws for fruit-pickers—Was presented by The Earl STANHOPE; read 1^a. (No. 127.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 12th June, 1882.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For the County of Banff, v. Robert William Duff, esquire, Commissioner of the Treasury.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Elementary Education Provisional Order Confirmation (London)* [195]; Elementary Education Provisional Orders Confirmation (West Ham, &c.)* [196].

Select Committee—Report—Electric Lighting [No. 227].

Committee—Prevention of Crime (Ireland) [157]—R.P. [Ninth Night].

Committee—Report—Public Schools (Scotland) Teachers [153]; Supreme Court of Judicature Acts Amendment [154].

Considered as amended—Local Government (Gas) Provisional Order [144]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 4)* [159]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 7)* [167]; Local Government Provisional Order (No. 8)* [168]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 9)* [174]; Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders* [142]; Tramways Provisional Orders (No. 3)* [151].*

Third Reading—Land Drainage Provisional Order* [164]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 2)* [165]; Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders (No. 3)* [172]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 2)* [145]; Local Government Provisional Orders (No. 6)* [166]; Local Government Provisional Order (No. 10)* [181], and passed.

PETITION.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—“GURNEY v. BRADLAUGH.”

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he begged to present a Petition from George Henry Lewis, gentleman, of Ely Place, Holborn, praying that leave be given to the proper Officer of this House to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, in the action now pending, wherein Joseph Gurney is Plaintiff and Charles Bradlaugh, esquire, one of the Members for the Borough of Northampton, is Defendant, in order to produce the paper writing subscribed by him at the Table of the House on the 21st of February last, and the copy of the New Testament named in the Journals of the House on the same date. He begged also to move—

“That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament.”

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That leave be given to the proper Officer to attend the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice with the said paper writing and copy of the New Testament.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he opposed the Motion, and should feel it his duty to move the adjournment of the debate. He had not himself been informed that the Motion would come on to-day, and he believed other hon. Members had been equally taken by surprise.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the House that the House allows unopposed Motions for Returns to be taken before the commencement of Public Business; and if this were an unopposed Motion for a Return, I should say that the Motion might be made, and dealt with by the House at this period; but as the matter appears to be opposed, it will have to come on for debate when the Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion have been disposed of.

QUESTIONS.

METROPOLIS—THE PARKS—GARDENS OF THE ROYAL BOTANIC SOCIETY, REGENT'S PARK — ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC.

MR. BROADHURST asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will use his influence with the Council of the Royal Botanic Society to induce them to make arrangements whereby the public can have access to the Botanical Gardens and ground of that society situated in Regent's Park?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works has no relations with the Royal Botanic Society in his official capacity. That Society occupies its grounds in the Regent's Park under a lease from the Commissioner of Woods, which does not expire until 1901. It is under covenant to use the premises as a botanic garden; but Government has no power during the present lease to compel the Society to admit the public to the grounds.

EVICTIONS (SCOTLAND)—LOCHCARRON, CO. ROSS.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to two cases of eviction on the estate of Mr. Dugald Stuart, of Lochcarron, in the county of Ross, wherein it is stated that Farquhar Maclean, aged eighty, and John Mackenzie, aged fifty-seven, crofters, have, though not owing any arrears, been evicted, the alleged grounds being that their sons, over whom parental authority has ceased, had, in vindication of character, recovered pecuniary damages for slander from the ground officer on the Lochcarron Estate; whether proceedings thus originating were legal; and, if so, will he take steps to amend the Law; whether he is aware that the public prosecutor for the county acted as agent in the evictions which have ended in public disturbance; and, whether he will issue a caution to procurators fiscal as to conducting civil processes which may end in criminal proceedings?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, I have made inquiry into the circumstances of these cases, and I have ascertained that it is the fact that Mr. Dugald Stuart obtained unopposed decrees of removing against the two crofters named, who are both advanced in years, and are not in arrear with their rent. There had been a dispute between Mr. Dugald Stuart, or his ground officer, and two sons of the crofters named, in regard to the execution of some building work, in the course of which the ground officer used language which the Sheriff Substitute held to be actionable, and in respect of which he awarded £5 of damages to each of the sons. Mr. Stuart then instituted actions of removing against the crofters, with whom their sons were living in family. No attempt was made to remove Maclean, as he was unwell, but the decree was executed against Mackenzie. I understand, however, that a settlement has been, or is in course of being, arrived at between Mr. Stuart and the crofters. I see no reason to doubt that the proceedings were legal, the tenancies having been yearly, and they do not suggest any defect in the law which appears to me to require amendment. In answer to the third and fourth heads of the Question, I have to say that the Procurator Fiscal of the county was employed as a solicitor to obtain the decrees of removing in the Sheriff Court at Dingwall. There was no reason to expect that the execution of the decrees would result in disturbance; and the Procurator Fiscal, who is an able and judicious official, has never, to my knowledge, done anything calling for a caution of the kind indicated in the Question.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION — MR. COMYN, SUB-COMMISSIONER.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that Mr. Comyn, one of the Sub-Commissioners appointed under the Land Act, has been recently engaged in carrying out the Act in respect of the fixing of rents in cases where relatives or family connections of his own were interested; and, if so, whether Mr. Comyn will be removed to a district where cases of this description may not come before him?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the question was started in the public Press, and received the public denial of Mr. Comyn himself.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION — MESSRS. WYLLIE AND CUNINGHAME, SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Mr. Wyllie, Chairman of the Sub-Commissioners for Tyrone, still has his name on the North-West Circuit List; that he only holds his appointment for one year, and intends resuming practice as a bar-rist, in nine months' time, in that district in which he now sits as judge; and, whether Mr. Wyllie will, in consequence, have to receive briefs from those solicitors who are now pleading before him in his capacity as judge; whether he is aware that Mr. Cuninghame, another Sub-Commissioner in the same district, is a partner in a seed and manure firm, having large business relations with the tenantry in this district, and that his traveller, Mr. Tatton, was soliciting orders in Castlederg, on behalf of the firm, on the same day that he was sitting in that town in his capacity of Sub-Commissioner; and, whether he will consider how far it is fair to those gentlemen to place them in the invidious position of judges in a district in which they have present and prospective business relations? The noble Lord said that, since he had put his Question on the Paper, he had ascertained that Mr. Cuninghame was a partner, not in a seed and manure firm, but in a corn merchant's or meal and flour firm.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, Mr. Wyllie informs me that he still has his name on the North-West Circuit List, and that on his ceasing to be an Assistant Commissioner, he intends to resume practice as a barrister on that Circuit. As to Mr. Cuninghame, the alteration in the noble Lord's Question is one of some importance. He has no business relations whatever with any of the tenantry of the district. He is not aware of any traveller of his firm having been in any town while he was sitting in it. Under these circumstances, I think the final paragraph of the Question does not require further answer.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS — PROSECUTION AT SLEAFORD.

MR. HENEAGE asked the Vice President of the Privy Council, Whether his attention has been called to the recent prosecutions under the Animal Contagious Diseases Acts at Sleaford; and, whether the Department agree with the magistrates that foot and mouth disease and foot rot can be so easily mistaken that several hundred sheep affected with the former could be allowed to spread the disease through several counties, without anyone being made responsible; and, if that is the opinion of the Privy Council, whether they will issue such further information as would protect small farmers of no great veterinary experience from being convicted from no fault of their own; and prevent persons who knowingly allow the removal of animals suffering from contagious diseases to the public injury from escaping the penalty?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have seen a Report of the proceedings under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act at Sleaford, which were instituted by the local authorities, and in which the Privy Council were in no way concerned. The Veterinary Department is satisfied that foot-and-mouth disease and foot rot are perfectly distinct diseases, and that no competent veterinary inspector ought to mistake the one for the other. It is not necessary to issue any detailed information to the public on the subject of the symptoms of this or any other disease, because the owner of an animal suffering from any kind of illness, whether a contagious disease under the Act or not, can relieve himself of all further responsibility by giving notice of the fact to the local inspector, who is bound to attend immediately and report to the local authority. Article 122 of the Animals Order is as follows:—

“Optional Notice of Disease or Illness.—Any person having in his possession, or under his charge, an animal affected with disease, or with any illness, or suspected of being so affected, besides giving such notice to a constable, as he is required by Section 31 of the Act of 1878 to give, may, if he thinks fit, give notice of the fact of the animal being so affected, or suspected, to the inspector of the local authority.”

No person, therefore, is justified in pleading ignorance as an excuse for spreading disease.

METROPOLIS—THAMES RIVER (HUMAN CORPSES).

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, with reference to the official statistics recently published, which show that the number of dead bodies found in the Thames during the last five years was 68 in the City of London district, and 1818 in the Metropolitan Police districts, 599 of which were discovered in the river without there being any evidence to show how they came there, any steps will be taken by Her Majesty's Government for securing better protection to human lives on the Thames Embankment and other roadways on the banks of the river?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, this was, no doubt, a very important matter. Some time ago he ordered a large extra force of police to be put upon the Embankment. With reference to the general question, it would not be correct to regard these figures as giving an average at all, inasmuch as they included the Princess Alice year. Three years ago the number amounted to one-half. The matter was one that required further investigation, and he had directed communications to be made to all the Coroners, in order that he might see what suggestions they had to make on the subject.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would consider the question of erecting a central public Morgue?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was understood to say that he would.

ARMY—THE BRITISH TROOPS IN NATAL.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he is aware that there is practically no barrack accommodation for British troops in Natal, the barracks at Pietermaritzburg being sufficient to contain four companies only; and, whether it is intended, in the event of an Imperial garrison being retained in Natal, to quarter the troops in properly constructed barracks, such as may be proof against the heavy rainfall of that country?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; I am well aware of the insufficiency of the present barrack accommodation in Natal; but when the strength of the permanent garrison, if any, which is to be kept there is decided, the necessary accommodation will be proposed to Parliament. In the meanwhile, the expenditure on barracks is limited to repairs and maintenance.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND)—EVICTIONS AT RYNMOUNT, CO. LONGFORD.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that the Irish Government have at present four policemen guarding two emergency men who are taking care of lands on the estate of Mr. Cusack, at Rynmount, county Longford, from which two families have been evicted; whether it is true that both the evicted tenants, the Widow Clyne and Mr. Gregory Yorke, are able and anxious to pay the rent for the homes in which they were born, and which their fathers had built; whether they have offered to pay what they deemed to be a rack-rent; and, whether any charge of any breach of Law was ever made against either of these two evicted tenants?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, it is true that four members of the Constabulary are protecting two caretakers from the Property Defence Association who are minding the evicted farms referred to by the hon. Member. It is true that the evicted tenants were anxious to continue in their holdings, and were willing to pay a considerably increased rent to be allowed to do so. The Constabulary inform me that no charge for a breach of the law was ever made against either of them, but that, on the contrary, they are most respectable, law-abiding people. I am asking some questions about this case, which has some points of importance about it.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN GANNON.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the case of Mr. John Gannon, of Kilgefin, county Roscommon, who was arrested, with six others, thirteen months ago, and is still detained in custody, though his comrades have been released; and, whether the fact that he is a native born American has any influence on his continued detention?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant had Mr. Gannon's case quite recently before him; and, having regard to the fact that he was an American by birth, His Excellency ordered his release on condition of leaving Ireland for America. Mr. Gannon has refused to accept his discharge on these terms, and His Excellency cannot at present allow him to be at large in the district.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—DISTRIBUTION OF THE VOTE OF COMPENSATION.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any of the sum of £180,000, recently voted by Parliament as a reward to the Irish police, will be paid to the officers and men in Clare, Mayo, and Kilkenny, against whom verdicts of "wilful murder" were returned by coroners' juries; whether a great amount of extra duty was also thrown upon the warders and others connected with the Irish prisons during the period since the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act has been in force, as well as upon the police; and, whether prison officials will be entitled to participate in the reward granted to the Constabulary, or if the Government intend in any way to recognise their services?

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the sum in question has not yet been voted by Parliament, and it is not intended that any portion of it is to be given to officers in the Constabulary. In the County Mayo alone were these verdicts of "wilful murder," within the past two years, brought by Coroners' Juries against any members of the Force who will be entitled to share in the proposed grant. There were two cases in that county. In one case the Attorney General obtained a conditional order on technical grounds to quash the inquisition; but instead of proceeding with it, he directed a magisterial investigation, with the result that informations were refused, and the case, therefore, was not sent for trial. In the other case, the Grand Jury at the Assizes ignored the bill. With regard to the case of the prison warders, the extra labour was met by employing extra hands. The duties of some of the superior officials in the prison service were, perhaps, somewhat more heavy than usual. Their case, however, is quite different from that of the Constabulary, and does not call for any special recognition.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—DR. O'BRIEN AND MR. DOYLE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the case of Dr. O'Brien, of Miltown Malbay, has been reconsidered; and also that of Mr. Doyle, of Kerry; and, whether these gentlemen have been removed recently from Limerick to Kilmainham Gaol, much further away from their native place?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency has reconsidered both these cases.

In the case of Dr. O'Brien, he has decided that he may now safely be released, and the order for his release will be issued to-day. In the other case, that of Cornelius Doyle, he has decided that he cannot at present order his release. Both these persons were removed from Limerick to Kilmainham, as the former prison ceased to be a place for the detention of persons arrested under the Protection Act.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— GRANTS TO NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. SYNAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What are the conditions upon which the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland, give grants of money to Irish National Schools; whether the grants of land must be perpetual, or quasi perpetual, and the schools vested in trustees for the Board; whether the grant of £75 to the late Lord Monteagle to build a boys' school in Shanagolden, on a thirty-one years' lease, was a violation of the conditions; whether the site of the school was a plot of ground used as a commonage by the villagers; whether the Commissioners intend to continue the grant for salaries, &c. to a school in which there are only sixteen scholars, and the majority of them the children of the teachers; and, whether the Government intend to suggest to the Commissioners the propriety of giving a grant to a school to which the parents will send their children?

MR. TREVELYAN: The first two Questions of the hon. Member are matters of great detail, and would take a very long time to answer. I have got a reply from the Commissioners of National Education, which I will show him privately. The grant of £75 was made to the late Lord Monteagle at a time when it was quite consistent with the Regulations then in force. When Lord Monteagle proposed to build the school, the law adviser of the Board inquired into the case, and was satisfied as to his title. I am informed that the Commissioners have resolved for the present to continue grants of salary to the teachers. As to the last Question, under the circumstances of the case, which I stated in answer to the Question of the hon. Member on the 19th of May, the Government do not propose to interfere with the discretion of the Commissioners.

MR. SYNAN said, he would take the earliest opportunity of bringing that matter before the House.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. BERNARD M'HUGH.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can see his way to the release of Mr. Bernhard M'Hugh, who has now been kept in prison, on suspicion, for fifteen months, as the district of Castlerue, county Roscommon, to which he belongs, is orderly and peaceful, and in view of the fact that Mr. M'Hugh's father, a very old man, is dangerously ill, and that Mr. M'Hugh is the only support of a very large family?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Lord Lieutenant has had Mr. Bernard M'Hugh's case under reconsideration within the past day or two, and has decided that he cannot at present be released.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (IRELAND) —JUDICIAL VACANCIES.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the vacancies in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice in Ireland have yet been filled; and, if not, when it is intended to make the appointments?

MR. TREVELYAN: Her Majesty's Government is at present in communication with Her Majesty upon this subject, and until Her pleasure has been taken, the right hon. and learned Member will see that it would be manifestly premature for me to make any statement in the House. I wish to say, in reference to an answer I have already given the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that when I said the North-West Circuit was a large one in comparison with the County Tyrone, in which the Commissioner was serving, I meant that it included five counties, of which Tyrone was only one.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked whether, in considering the propriety of filling up the vacancies on the Irish Bench, the Government would take into account the fact that two of the Courts had nothing to do, and that the Court of Queen's Bench would have very little to do but for the coercive policy of the Government?

[No reply was given.]

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. M. J. LYONS.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Michael James Lyons, of Aughamore, county Mayo, who has been imprisoned as a suspect since December last, may now be liberated without detriment to public interests?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant ordered Mr. Lyons's release on the 8th instant.

NAVY—EXPLOSION ON BOARD H.M.S. "SWIFTSURE."

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If the men serving on board H.M.S. "Swiftsure" had been trained, before leaving Plymouth, in the use of the new 25-pound breechloading gun; what trials had taken place with the 25-pound gun prior to the gun being appropriated for service afloat; and, whether precautionary mechanical arrangements are not adopted in that gun, as for some other breechloading guns, by which it is impossible for the gun to be fired before the breech is securely locked?

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: No, Sir. The men serving on board Her Majesty's Ship Swiftsure had not been trained before leaving Plymouth in the use of the new 25-pounder breechloading gun; but they had been trained with the old breech-loading gun, which is not so simple as the new one. As the Swiftsure was going to the Pacific for some years, the Admiralty was desirous of fitting her with these new guns, and this was done on the eve of her departure. It was considered that, as the mode of working them is extremely simple, the well-trained and intelligent seamen-gunners would have no difficulty in at once learning the drill, which was supplied to them. The guns have been tried at Woolwich and Shoeburyness, the trials extending over several months; and two are also mounted in a gunboat, from which 75 rounds have been fired. These guns being radial-vented, no mechanical arrangement is fitted which prevents the gun being fired before the breech is securely closed; but there is an arrangement which shows at a glance when the breech is properly closed, and the gun ought not to be primed until this is done.

HIGHWAY RATES—SMALL TENEMENTS.

MR. ONSLOW (for Colonel BRISE) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the difficulties that now exist in the collection of Highway Rates from small and indigent occupiers, the auditors in some districts having called upon the surveyors to pay out of their own pockets, in cases where the rent cannot be collected; owners of small tenements not being able to compound for the Highway Rate in same way as for Poor Rate under the "Small Tenements Act?"

MR. DODSON: Sir, my attention has been called to the difficulties in the collection of highway rates from small occupiers, in consequence of the repeal of the Small Tenements Rating Act; but I am not aware of any cases in which the auditors have surcharged the surveyors with the rates in cases where the rent of the property cannot be collected. I may add that a Bill for restoring the power of compounding for the highway rates on small tenements is in a forward state of preparation, and I hope to introduce it shortly.

PUBLIC HEALTH (METROPOLIS) — ROBIN HOOD COURT, SHOE LANE.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to a Report from Dr. Saunders, Medical Officer of Health to the City Commissioners of Sewers, in which he called their attention "To the frightful state of certain houses in Robin Hood Court, Shoe Lane, adjacent to the back entrance to the casual wards of the City of London Union;"

and, whether he will impress upon the authorities the necessity of taking immediate steps to remove a cause of so much danger to the community?

MR. DODSON: Sir, I have seen in a newspaper the Report of Dr. Saunders referred to in the Question as to the state of the houses in Robin Hood Court, and I observe that the medical officer recommends that they should be dealt with under the local Acts in force in London. These Acts, however, confer upon the Local Government Board no power to interfere. At the same time, I hope that, as the attention of the local authority has been directed to the subject, they will proceed to take the necessary steps to remedy the evil complained of. As regards the accumulation of casuals near the spot, I will call the attention of the Guardians to the subject, with a view of seeing how far the evil can be prevented; but I may add that the casual wards adjoining the court were carefully inspected on Saturday last, and were found to be clean and in good order throughout, and there has been no case of infection there for many years.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE PROTECTION FOR CARETAKERS IN COUNTY WICKLOW.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that a number of policemen have been placed with caretakers of several vacant farms from which the tenants were evicted in the parishes of Blackditches and Hollywood, county Wicklow, on the property of the Marquess of Waterford; whether it is the fact that no outrage of any kind has occurred in those districts, or in the whole county, during the land agitation; and whether, under the circumstances, the local police are not sufficient to afford protection if any is required; how many extra police are engaged in the duty, and who pays for them; and, whether, looking to the peaceful state of the county, he will order the extra police to be withdrawn?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, there are four protection posts on Lord Waterford's property in the County Wicklow. There have been 45 outrages in that district since the 1st of January, 1880, attributable to the land agitation, and over 100 such outrages in the county, which is very peaceable in other respects than in agrarian crime. Twelve men of the constabulary are engaged in this protection duty. They are paid for in part by the Government, and in part by the county. Owing to the prevalence of intimidation and "Boycotting," the local authorities—magistrates and constabulary—are of opinion that isolated caretakers on evicted farms would not be safe; and I cannot, therefore, order the withdrawal of the extra police.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—RIOTS AT ALEXANDRIA—THE PAPERS.

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I have to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs the Question which stands on the Paper in my name—namely, when the further Papers on Egypt will be produced; and perhaps the hon. Baronet will take this opportunity of answering two or three other Questions of which I have given him private Notice. I wish to know whether he is able to inform the House as to the state of Alexandria at the present moment; whether any of the occurrences which are reported in the newspapers as having taken place there yesterday have really taken place; whether a British officer has been killed, and the British Consul has been wounded; also, whether the British Consulate is in the possession of the captain of a man-of-war? I should like also to ask upon whom does the responsibility rest now for the peace of Alexandria; further, what are the instructions issued by the Porte to Dervish Pasha; whether they have been communicated to England, France, or the other Powers; and, whether the condition into which Egypt has lapsed is to be allowed to continue?

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: Before the Under Secretary answers the Questions of my right hon. Friend, I should like to repeat the Question which I put on Friday last—namely, Whether, since the occurrences that have taken place, Her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that there is any apprehension as to the personal security of the Khedive; and whether, should there be the slightest doubt in the mind of the Government on the subject, any effective measures are likely to be taken to prevent any personal discourtesy being shown towards His Highness?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I hope that the further Papers with regard to the affairs of Egypt will be ready for distribution before the close of next week.

MR. BOURKE: Next week?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes. The Papers have been referred by telegraph to Sir Edward Malet, and probably his first answer will not be conclusive.

MR. BOURKE: Up to what date will the Papers be delivered?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not know that we shall be able to issue the whole to the end of May at once; but if not they will be divided into two sections, the first section coming down to the 17th of May, and the other to the end of May. The most important Papers are those about the middle of May, which will be included in the first section. With regard to the further Questions put to me by my right hon. Friend, Her Majesty's Government have received a telegram from Vice Consul Calvert, at Alexandria, dated 10.40 last night, which states that a serious riot had taken place in the afternoon between Europeans and Arabs, and that Mr. Pibworth, an engineer of Her Majesty's ship Superb, had been killed and many wounded, among whom were, I regret to state, Mr. Cookson, Her Majesty's Consul, and three constables of the Consulate. A further telegram from Mr. Calvert of this morning states that the women and children who sought refuge in the Consulate have been transferred to the ships, and that the military are maintaining order. Mr. Calvert adds that Mr. Cookson's injuries are not serious, and that he is convalescent. The latest telegram received this morning from Mr. Calvert is of a re-assuring nature. Sir Edward Malet has telegraphed that the Khedive has sent an aide-de-camp to Alexandria. The Native and the English authorities concur in advising that sailors or marines should not be landed. Sir Beauchamp Seymour has power to land them should he think it necessary; but he has telegraphed that the disturbance, though serious, was of a non-political character, and was suppressed by the Egyptian troops. Telegraphing at 2 o'clock, Mr. Calvert states that the town was then very quiet, and that everybody in the streets was being searched and disarmed. The person in the first instance responsible for order is the Governor of Alexandria, who appears to be a man of some capacity and energy. He is receiving in this curious and anomalous state of things instructions both from the Khedive directly, and also from Dervish Pasha; but as these concur completely, he has been under no practical inconvenience from that cause. It is also asked me whether anarchy will be allowed to continue? I think I must answer simply that it is, of course, impossible that such a state of things could be allowed to continue. The noble Lord (Lord Eustace Cecil) repeats a Question he put a day or two ago with regard to the personal safety of the Khedive. We have no reason to modify the answer which was then given. The telegrams from Constantinople and from Sir Edward Malet with reference to the safety of the Khedive are of a re-assuring nature.

MR. BOURKE: The Consulate?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Consulate is in the hands of Mr. Calvert, the Vice Consul.

MR. BOURKE: What are the instructions of the Porte to Dervish Pasha?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The instructions of the Porte to Dervish Pasha were communicated to us in general terms, and in general terms they may be said to resemble very closely indeed the bases proposed to the Conference. They are almost the same.

MR. ONSLOW: I wish to ask whether, after what has happened in Alexandria, any precautions have been taken by the Government to preserve the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects in Cairo; and, also, whether any precautions have been taken to provide against any molestation taking place with regard to the Peninsular and Oriental steamships and other ships in their passage through the Suez Canal?

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask whether Her Majesty's Government have any information, with reference to this unfortunate collision between the Europeans and the Arabs, as to who were the aggressors in the first instance; and whether, as one of the daily papers says, the disturbance commenced by a Maltese attacking an Arab?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have seen the statement; but we have no information on the subject. With reference to the question regarding the safety of the Europeans in Cairo, I have already read some words of Sir Edward Malet, to the effect that Dervish Pasha and the Khedive concur in advising that the sailors and marines should not be landed. That applies to the safety of the people in Cairo as well as in Alexandria. Dervish Pasha states he is perfectly able to maintain order in Cairo. With reference to the Suez Canal, I may tell the hon. Member that we have gunboats at each end of the Canal, we are in telegraphic communication with Sir Beauchamp Seymour, and no reports of an alarming nature about the Canal have reached us.

Sir Charles W. Dilke

MR. O'DONNELL: I should like to ask the Government if they would make inquiry as to whether it is the case that the mob of Arabs assembled in the streets of Alexandria were only armed with clubs and sticks, while the Europeans fired upon them from their windows, and that there is a large party among the Europeans resident in Alexandria desirous of provoking intervention; whether a very large portion of European residents in Egypt, or a considerable portion, is composed of the most desperate elements in the Levant; and whether Her Majesty's Government will use their influence to supervise the action of the European residents and prevent them from provoking the Arab population, as well as in protecting British subjects against the possibility of outbreak on the part of the Arabs?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I may point out to the hon. Member that the majority of wounds inflicted were caused by clubs and knives, and, in addition to this, the number of Arabs reported killed is only three; I gather, also, that there were more Europeans hurt, including Greeks and Maltese subjects, than Arabs. The British Consul was wounded by a pistol shot; and, therefore, under the circumstances, I cannot draw the inference suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I wish to ask whether the Porte had been invited by the Government to send troops to Alexandria to quell the disturbances; and, also, whether the hon. Baronet can state how many British subjects have been wounded?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have not received any news of the nationality of the persons wounded. The telegrams speak of Europeans in general terms, without specifying nationalities. In regard to sending Turkish troops to maintain order, I must ask the hon. Member to wait until the Papers come, and he will see.

SIR HENRY TYLER: Does the Government propose to adopt the advice of Dervish Pasha and leave the Europeans to their fate?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can add nothing to what I have already stated. Sir Beauchamp Seymour has power to land seamen and marines if he thinks it advisable to do so.

MR. NORTHCOTE: I wish to ask whether the substance of the conversation with Musurus Pasha and the conversation of Lord Dufferin will be included in the Papers to be presented to the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I see no objection to include the conversation between Musurus Pasha and Lord Granville in the Papers, or Lord Dufferin's conversation with the Turkish Minister at Constantinople on the same subject, though as to the latter I am not so sure.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Events march so rapidly now that it is extremely desirable that the Papers should be brought down to a later date than the 1st of June.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Papers are being printed as they come in, in the usual way, and nothing more can be done in the way of hurrying the later Papers, because the whole staff is at work on the earlier ones. Still, there is no sort of objection to getting them out as rapidly as possible.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Do I understand that the consent of the French Government has been obtained to the publication of the later Papers?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes, Sir; the French Government has given its consent, not indeed to the publication of everything, but to enough to enable us to put our case before the House.

PUBLIC HEALTH—UNQUALIFIED MEDICAL PRACTITIONERS.

MR. H. SAMUELSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to recent cases of the treatment of the sick, by unqualified medical practitioners, at dispensaries at the East end of London, to the death of two children so treated, and to the observations of the coroner at the inquest upon them, on June 5th, to the effect that it appeared that a certain qualified doctor (who keeps several dispensaries) saw one of the children a few minutes before its death, and was thereby enabled to "cover the delinquencies of the other person," i.e. the unqualified person who had treated the case in the dispensary, and that "it was no doubt an unsatisfactory state of things to think that the lives of the poor were in the hands of such persons;" whether he has observed that the above-mentioned unqualified practitioner (who calls himself a colonel and a barrister, as well as practising as a medical man) admitted that, under an authorisation from the qualified doctor who keeps the dispensary, he had signed certificates in that person's name; whether he can take any steps to prevent such illegalities; and, whether he can obtain power, either by the appointment of Government Inspectors, the issue of Government licences, or some other efficacious means to prevent the sick poor from being attended by unqualified medical practitioners at the Metropolitan dispensaries?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Of course, Sir, there is no legal authority which could deal with the matters referred to by the hon. Member. The proper course would be for him to call the attention of the Medical Council, which has power to act by the 21 & 22 Vict. to these cases, and ask them to put the Act in force against them.

POST OFFICE — AUXILIARY LETTER CARRIERS.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Postmaster General, Whether the petition of the Metropolitan auxiliary letter carriers that their remuneration be assimilated to that of the established Staff by certain changes, comprising, inter alia, a slight addition to their pay for each duty, an extra pay for extra work, and a week's holiday in each year, may be reasonably conceded without detriment to the public Service?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the question of the position and pay of the auxiliary letter carriers in the Metropolitan district, to which my right hon. Friend refers, forms part of the larger question of the position and pay of letter carriers generally, which is now the subject of correspondence between myself and the Treasury. A final decision may be expected very shortly.

Mr. H. Samuelson

ARMY (IRELAND)—SOLDIERS AS CARE-TAKERS.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for War, To state how many, and in what ranks, soldiers are taken away in Ireland for duties as caretakers, and for other duties usually confided to police, and to explain under what Article of the Military Regulations, or by what powers, are enlisted soldiers withdrawn from Military duties to perform duties destructive of discipline; and to say when will such employment cease?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to remind him that it is one of the first duties of a soldier to act in aid of the Civil power, and that the exact manner of rendering this aid must depend on the circumstances of each case, provided that the requirements of the Army Acts are always observed. In Ireland about 500 officers and men are so employed, and we have acted in the matter strictly under the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown, and on the urgent requisition of the Civil Government. Of course, I regret the necessity of this employment as much as my hon. and gallant Friend; but I cannot concur with him that it is destructive of discipline, although I shall be extremely glad when it ceases.

AFRICA (SOUTH) — CETEWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—LETTER FROM THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT URGING HIS RESTORATION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he is able to explain a statement made by Mr. W. E. Bok, State Secretary to the Transvaal, in a letter addressed to the British Resident in Pretoria, on January 16, 1882, that, as his Government desired to see a better state of things established in Zululand, and also to prevent bloodshed, "a call was made upon Her Majesty's Government to release the Zulu King Cetewayo;" and, if this statement be correct, whether he will inform the House what answer has been made to this message?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: My hon. Friend will find a full explanation in the Papers which I have laid on the Table of the House relating to Cetewayo's detention. It is perfectly true that within the last year the Transvaal Government made representations to us urging the restoration of Cetewayo, and the answer then given was that those representations would receive due consideration from Her Majesty's Government.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. JAMES MONAGHAN.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will grant a release on parole for a few days to Mr. James Monaghan of Glanidon, Westmeath, who has undergone seven months' imprisonment as a suspect, and whose mother is now believed to be very near her death, both mother and son being very desirous to meet once again before she dies?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, His Excellency has decided that he cannot at present allow Mr. Monaghan's release, on parole or otherwise. The lady mentioned by the hon. Member is believed to be the prisoner's mother-in-law, and not his mother.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—TEARING DOWN NOTICES.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that, on Sunday the 28th of May, a notice which was posted on the chapel of Raheenmore, county Westmeath, requesting the people of that locality to assemble to cut the turf of Mr. William Maloney, a suspect now detained in Enniskillen Prison, was torn down by the police, by which act many persons were intimidated from rendering to Mr. Maloney such assistance; and, whether the Government sanction that action on the part of the police?

MR. TREVELYAN: I find that the sub-constable at Raheenmore did take down such a notice. There would appear to have been no necessity for his tearing down the notice, and he has been called on for an explanation.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE ANGLO-FRENCH FLEET—SUDA BAY.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What are the distances respectively of Famagousta, Marmorice, and Suda Bay from Alexandria, and what are the reasons which led to a preference for Suda Bay as a rendezvous for operations at Alexandria?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, in answer to the geographical inquiry addressed to me by my right hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say that I believe the three places named are distant from Alexandria 325 miles, 345 miles, and 417 miles respectively. My right hon. and gallant Friend further asks me why Suda Bay was selected as a rendezvous? The reason was that it is the natural place in which to assemble squadrons moving from Corfu and the Piræus.

SIR JOHN HAY asked what the Squadron had to do at Corfu?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, in reply, said, that the Squadron had been moved from Corfu. The British Squadron had been moved from Corfu and the French from the Piræus. Suda Bay was directly in the way from those places.

SIR JOHN HAY asked whether there were any stores at Corfu for the supply of the British Squadron?

[No answer was given.]

ADULTERATION ACTS—LARD CHEESE.

MR. R. H. PAGET asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to the manufacture, in the United States of America, of an article called cheese, compounded of a mixture of the bluest skim-milk and lard; and, if he will endeavour to ascertain if any of this spurious cheese is imported into this Country; and, if so, if he will take steps to insure that this compound, when exposed for sale, shall be sold only as "lard cheese," or be distinguished in such a manner as to prevent imposition to purchasers in this Country?

MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has read the report of Dr. Voelcker to the Royal Agricultural Society on the composition of lard and oleomargarine cheese lately imported from America; and, whether he would cause inquiries to be made at the ports of entry relative to the importation of such cheeses, so that they may be entered and sold under their proper designation, and not as "whole milk" cheeses?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, my attention has been directed to the manufacture of an article called "cheese," compounded of skim-milk and lard, or oleomargarine, and I am aware that this article is being imported into this country. I have made inquiries of the Custom House, but at present the import and export statistics do not make any distinction between this cheese and ordinary cheese, and I am consequently unable to give any information as to the extent of the importation; but the question of statistics is at the present time being considered by a small Departmental Committee, and I will refer the question of providing for a distinct classification in future to the Committee. As regards the sale in this country, the Adulteration Acts impose a penalty of £20 on any person selling any article of food not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded by the purchaser, without disclosing the fact, and this enactment would, I presume, serve to prevent imposition. I have also read the Report of Dr. Voelcker, alluded to by the hon. Member for Mid Cheshire (Mr. Wilbraham Egerton), and find that he states that as far as he can judge at present—

"The lard and oleomargarine cheeses are wholesome and nutritious articles of food, which cannot be distinguished by their appearance and general properties from ordinary cheese."

I am, moreover, doubtful whether in any case it is desirable to interfere further with the production or sale of this article, even in the interests of agriculturists, as I find that Lord Vernon, who took the chair at a recent meeting of the Agricultural Society, expressed his opinion that the Society should be very careful before requesting the interference of the Board of Trade, as one of the great obstacles to butter-making was the difficulty in getting rid of the skim-milk; whereas, by the introduction of lard or oleomargarine, the dairy companies would be able to work up their refuse produce into a wholesome article of food. It appears, therefore, that the British farmer may possibly desire to enter into this manufacture.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—RELEASE OF PERSONS DETAINED UNDER THE ACT.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the terrible occurrences again reported from Ireland, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to give any assurance that they will not proceed further with the release of persons who have been imprisoned on suspicion of inciting to murder?

Mr. Chamberlain

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I cannot give an absolute assurance on this point to the hon. Baronet. In cases of arrest on suspicion made previously to his own tenure of Office His Excellency is obliged to pay great attention to the recommendations and advice of the magistrates and special magistrates in charge of districts. But in cases of suspicion of inciting to murder, His Excellency will undoubtedly take into consideration the state of things which has been disclosed by the terrible occurrences of Thursday.

STATE OF IRELAND—ILLEGAL NOTICES—"BOYCOTTING."

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the case that the following notice has been extensively posted in the neighbourhood of Tullamore:—

"All true Irishmen are hereby called upon to Boycott the renegades ——— and ——— who have lately apostasized themselves by paying their rents against the wishes of their fellow tenants, and without obtaining abatement. The former has also purchased a cabin and patch of bog over the head of a defenceless orphan, and his labourers are now called upon to quit his employment;"

and, whether police have obtained any clue to the authors of this notice?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, only one copy of the notice, which is correctly quoted in the Question, was found posted in the district, and it was immediately taken down by the police. The police have no evidence on which they could proceed against any party in connection with this outrage.

MR. HEALY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary if he has received any information that these "Boycotting" notices are frequently posted by penny-a-liners for the purpose of furnishing them paragraphs for forwarding to the English newspapers?

[No answer was given.]

CURRENCY—THE MONETARY CONFERENCE, PARIS.

MR. BRIGGS asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, having regard to the fact that we are still maintaining a gold standard in England and a silver standard in India, and that France and the United States of America desire to restore silver everywhere to its former monetary functions, and so remove the confusion created by variations in the relative value of gold and silver, which variations have been and are seriously detrimental to our commerce, especially with India, it is the intention of the Government to promote an early re-assembling of the Monetary Conference to deal with this subject; and, whether he can inform the House when that Conference is likely to re-assemble?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, on the 12th of April last I was informed, through Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that the Governments of France and the United States had proposed an adjournment of the Monetary Conference, the next meeting of which had been fixed for that day, until further progress had been made in arriving at a definite basis of future discussion, subject to an understanding as to the date of its re-assembling during the present year. On the part of the Government of India I concurred in the propriety of this proposal, and stated my readiness to give the necessary instructions to its representatives to attend the Conference, whenever it was found practicable to fix the date of its meeting. As the Governments of France and the United States have throughout taken the initiative in this matter, it would appear to be rather for them than for Her Majesty's Government to take the necessary steps to promote the early re-assembling of the Conference. I cannot state when it is likely to re-assemble.

POST OFFICE—THE UXBRIDGE POST OFFICE.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will at once take steps to acquire a site in the centre of the town of Uxbridge now available for a separate post office, in which the work can be properly performed, with adequate accommodation for the public, and distinct from any private business?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, it has already been pressed upon my notice that certain premises in Uxbridge, which happen to be vacant, would be very suitable for a new Post Office. I have given the subject careful consideration, and I have come to the conclusion that the circumstances do not necessitate the taking of these particular premises. The postmaster has instructions to make certain alterations and improvements in the present office, the situation of which is convenient; and his private business will not be allowed to interfere with that part of the premises devoted to the Post Office.

INDIA—APPOINTMENTS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that the hon. Ashley Eden, on his promotion from the post of Lieutenant Governor of Bengal to be Member of the India Council, appointed his private secretary, Mr. Henry, to be one of the first grade joint magistrates over the heads of some twenty or more on the assistant list, and also over the heads of ten of the second grade, thus raising his salary from £500 to £900, and gave him also charge of a district, to which in ordinary circumstances he had no claim, thus further securing him another £250 a-year; and, whether Sir Richard Temple appointed his private secretary, Mr. Buckland, then being of the standing in the service of an assistant magistrate, to be superintendent of stamps and stationery, with a salary increased from £500 to £1,500?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have investigated the cases of the promotion of Mr. Henry and Mr. Buckland, and I have no reason to think that there was anything unusual or exceptional in them. The details of these promotions and the rules of the Service regulating them are extremely technical, and I do not think it is necessary to enter into them, though I shall be prepared to defend them if they are challenged. I may, however, state that the officers immediately above and below Mr. Henry were appointed to the officiating first grade of joint magistrates and deputy collectors at the same time as himself. On the recent retirement of the Lieutenant Governor, Mr. Henry was confirmed in that grade before some of his seniors, in accordance with the well-recognized practice of the Service, that officers who have held the position of private secretary shall be transferred to a position of equal value where that is possible. For this practice there is very good reason, inasmuch as an officer holding the appointment of private secretary gives up all claim to the right to other acting appointments of whatever value. He was entitled, by his position in the Service, to the charge of the district to which he was appointed, and his actual predecessor in that district for many months before his appointment to it was a man who entered the Service on the same day as himself. Mr. Buckland was not appointed by Sir Richard Temple to be Superintendent of Stamps and Stationery. When Sir Richard Temple was Lieutenant Governor of Bengal Mr. Buckland was his private secretary. When Sir Richard Temple became Governor of Bombay, Mr. Buckland went with him as private secretary. Some time after that he was appointed Press Commissioner by the Government of India on a salary of Rs. 1,500 a-month, and subsequently, on the abolition of that appointment, Superintendent of Stamps and Stationery by the Government of Bengal. He did not take up the duties of that office, but was appointed to officiate as a magistrate of the third grade.

INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND)— FLOODS AT KILLALOE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been directed to the great possibility of exceptional damages from summer floods during the present year, in the Valley of the Shannon, below Meelick and above Killaloe, by reason of the flood waters from above Meelick being unable to pass Killaloe, owing to the works at the latter place being in a more backward state than the works at the former; and, whether the Board of Works contemplate taking any steps, and, if so, what steps to obviate the danger?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the contingency anticipated by the hon. Member has been fully provided against. It is probable that the works at Killaloe will be completed as soon as those at Meelick; but should they not be so, the sluices can be so managed as to guard against an accumulation of flood water. I am assured that no sluices will be opened at the risk of injury to lands below.

ARMY—PAY DEPARTMENT.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is not a fact that, by the regulations of the Service, the officers in the Pay Department are, in the performance of their duties, and in all matters of discipline, subject to the immediate authority and directions of the Military officers under whom they may be serving; if he will explain, therefore, how the officers of the Pay Department can be, in matters relating to discipline, subject likewise to the orders of the Accountant General; and, whether it is contemplated to have the Pay Department represented at the War Office, and placed on an equality in this respect with the Chaplains, Commissariat, Transport Staff, Medical Ordnance Store, and Veterinary Departments?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, I am really at a loss to understand why my hon. and gallant Friend asks this Question. In reply to his former Question on the 22nd, I told him that there was underlying it the very Question which he puts now, and I said that it was one of those affecting this Department which I was going to consider. I can really add nothing to this at present, except that, as a matter of fact, these officers are already for military discipline under the Commander-in-Chief.

IRELAND—AGRARIAN OUTRAGES— THE RETURNS.

MR. BUXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Why the Returns of Agrarian Outrages (Ireland), issued in March, April, and May, have all been given under different headings; and, whether, considering the extreme gravity of the subject, it would not be possible that in future these Returns may be given from month to month in precisely the same form?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am obliged to the hon. Member for calling my attention to this matter, and I have now given instructions for having these Returns prepared for the future in precisely the same form.

INDIA—FORCED LABOUR AT ASSAM.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, If he is aware that forced labour is exacted from the people of Assam by the British authorities; and, if he has approved of such exaction of forced labour?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am not aware that forced labour is exacted from the people of Assam by the British authorities. Some complaints appear to have been made that the village head men, who are responsible for the maintenance of the local roads, &c., sometimes improperly exact labour from the villagers for that purpose. These complaints appear to have been brought to the notice of the Chief Commissioner and of the Government of India. In the wild tracts known as the Naga and Garo Hills, which have lately been the scene of military operations, one of the conditions made with the people on the pacification of the country is that they shall give a certain amount of labour annually at a low rate to construct roads, &c.

MR. O'DONNELL asked if the attention of the noble Lord had been directed to the letter of a newspaper correspondent, in which it was stated that advances were made in money to these labourers, and that if they refused to receive them or to work they were dragged from their homes and subjected to ill-treatment and imprisonment, and that it was notorious that the only way to avoid this treatment was to propitiate the officers by bribes; and, whether Her Majesty's Government were aware that the forced labour had been characterized by The Hindoo Patriot as a slave-grinding system?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that he was unable to accept the statement referred to by the hon. Member. His attention had been called to it, and he would cause inquiries to be made.

INDIA—NATIVE ESTATES—APPOINTMENTS OF MANAGERS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, If he is aware of the practice of appointing relatives of high-placed British officials in India to lucrative situations in the management of large native estates; and, if he has received any complaints on the subject?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: No, Sir, I am not aware of such a practice, nor have I received any complaints on the subject.

MR. O'DONNELL asked if the noble Marquess would lay on the Table the letter of resignation of a gentleman in Bengal, who had held one of these appointments?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If the hon. Member will put the Question on the Paper, I will make inquiries.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

MR. MONK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any further delay is desirable before the Channel Tunnel Bills are submitted to the consideration of the House for their Second Reading; and, if so, whether he can state when the Government will be prepared to express an opinion upon them?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, my right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to this Question. It has already been stated by Earl Granville in the House of Lords that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government, so far as lies in their power, that the Channel Tunnel Bills shall not be proceeded with at all until the Government are in a position to express an opinion on the subject. I have been informed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War that the Committee which was appointed to consider whether the Tunnel could be made useless to any enemy in time of war have reported, and that their Report has been referred to the military authorities for a strategical opinion on the whole question, which he hopes to receive in the course of a few days. As soon as this opinion is in our hands we shall further consider the subject, and hope shortly to be in a position to offer advice to the House.

EGYPT (POLITICAL AFFAIRS)—THE PROPOSED CONFERENCE.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the facility with which the Suez Canal could at any moment be destroyed from its banks, thereby blocking the communication of England with India by that route, and inflicting disastrous losses upon British commerce, which represents eighty per cent. of the whole European trade passing through the Canal; and also in view of the recent cession of Assab Bay to Italy, and the consequent probability of that harbour becoming an Italian naval arsenal, Her Majesty's Government will take steps for insuring, at the proposed Conference, the recognition of the preponderance of British interests in Egypt, so as to prevent the free communication of England with India from being suddenly stopped in the event of any European complication? The hon. Member wished also to ask whether with reference to the statements of Lord Granville in a despatch to Lord Dufferin of the 9th of January last, to the effect that the policy of this country as regards Egypt must be to maintain the absence of any preponderating influence on the part of any single Power, the Government were prepared to carry out that policy; and, whether they did not consider it necessary for the security of the maintenance of communications with India that the influence of England should preponderate in Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, with regard to the preliminary portion of the hon. Member's Question as to the facility with which the Suez Canal could at any moment be destroyed from its banks, I have to say that the report of the authorities is quite different from that. It is to the effect that to destroy or even permanently to injure the Canal would be extremely difficult, from the nature of its construction, if, indeed, it would not be quite impossible. With regard to the cession of Assab Bay, the Government are not aware of any such cession. There is an establishment of the Italian Government there, with respect to which we have received an assurance from that Government that that establishment will be of a purely commercial nature, and that it will not be fortified or turned into a military post. With regard to the instructions to be given at the proposed Conference, we are precluded on general grounds from stating what instructions will be given to the British Representatives there, particularly in a case where it may be considered necessary that England, in conjunction with France, should be specially responsible in regard to the initiative. Finally, as to the citation of the hon. Member from the despatch of Lord Granville, I really have no interpretation to offer, because I think it is quite plain in itself, and we shall abide by it as it stands.

MR. PULESTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, if the proposed Conference meets, Her Majesty's representative will be directed to call the attention of the Plenipotentiaries to the state of things recently created in Tunis by the action of the French Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that it would not be expedient to make any attempt to enlarge the scope of the Conference, and that such an attempt would be unfavourable to the object for which the Conference was to meet.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (for Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, inasmuch as the Conference proposed to be held at Constantinople is to be composed of representatives of the Powers signatories of the Treaty of Berlin, Her Majesty's Government will instruct the British Plenipotentiary to call the attention of the Conference to the non-fulfilment of certain stipulations of that Treaty, viz. those providing for the introduction of reforms into Asiatic and European Turkey, the demolition of the Bulgarian fortresses, and the assumption of a portion of the Ottoman debt by States now in possession of territory which, before the late war, formed part of the Ottoman Empire?

MR. GLADSTONE: In regard to this Question I must make substantially the same answer. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) is not himself in his place, because I should have been glad to acknowledge his title to put the Question on account of the laborious and useful part which he took in the improvement of one of the provinces of Turkey; but, again, I think the introduction of this subject would not promote the purpose for which the Conference would meet.

ARREARS OF RENT (IRELAND) BILL— THE ESTIMATES.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he will lay upon the Table an estimate of the gross amount of arrears of rent in Ireland proposed to be dealt with under the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, and the amount proposed to be contributed from public funds; together with any Return or other information in the possession of the Government on which these estimates were framed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Sir, in reply to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to say that I think an estimate of the amount charged in the Arrears Bill, in the sense in which the term is commonly used, can hardly be given from the nature of the case; but we are doing our best to gather together the most useful and authentic illustrative information we can get in order to place hon. Members in possession of some facts as regards this subject. That information will be made known to the House before it goes into Committee on the Bill. The heads upon which we would either have information, or, at all events, do our best to form an opinion, are, in the first place, the total amount of valuation in Ireland of holdings under £30 per annum. Then there is the total amount of those holdings up to £30 valuation. A third point is the number of holdings, which are returned in the Poor Law Report at 585,000. As regards that, a large reduction will, I believe, have to be made, and we shall not have to deal with more than 350,000 possible subjects of the Arrears Clauses—possible, that is to say, if the rents have not been paid. Then as to a question of more difficulty, which we are endeavouring to examine into as well as we can—namely, as to the deduction to be made from the total valuation and the total rent corresponding with it on account of the difference in the number of holdings, that is a very difficult matter, and one on which I am afraid we can get nothing except the opinions of the best-informed persons. Besides this, we have got accounts from a considerable number of counties in Ireland, especially in Leinster and Connaught, showing, as a matter of fact, what proportion of estates have arrears upon them and what have not. Then, finally, we have such information as the Board of Inland Revenue can supply with regard to the amount of claim by the landlords in respect of unpaid rents. These are the heads of the matters which we are desirous of laying before the House before it goes into Committee on the Arrears Bill.

MR. BRAND asked if care would be taken in the estimate to make allowance for the effect of Sub-section 3 of Clause 1 of the Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, certainly, Sir; that is an important point, about which we shall endeavour to arrive at a sound judgment.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE PROTEST OF THE JUDGES.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he has now received the protest of the Irish Judges against the abolition of trial by jury in Ireland, and what reply it is intended to make thereto, or if any has been sent?

MR. CALLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, since his statement to the House that no communication or memorial from the Irish Judges had reached him or any of his colleagues in the Cabinet, he has received a letter from the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, Ireland, stating that the resolution come to by the Judges had been forwarded, when passed, to the Lord Lieutenant by the Lord Chancellor; whether such letter and resolution had not, in fact, at the time been received by the Lord Lieutenant; can he state what answer has been returned to the letter and resolution of the Judges so forwarded; and, is it still his intention to persist in imposing distasteful duties on the Irish Bench; whether, as stated in the "Freeman's Journal" of Friday last, the Judges had on the preceding day again met and passed a resolution reiterating in language of increased emphasis the former declaration; and, whether he will have any objection to place upon the Table a Copy of these resolutions of the Irish Judges?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think the answer I gave on a former occasion was not quite accurately understood. Immediately after making it, I learnt that the resolution of the Judges had been communicated to the Viceroy of Ireland, but in a manner which did not appear either to him or to us to require a formal answer. Of course, in view of the Bill now before the House, it is for Parliament to say whether these duties shall be imposed on the Irish Judges or not.

MR. CALLAN asked whether there would be any objection to lay a Copy of the resolution on the Table of the House?

MR. GLADSTONE said, there would be no objection.

MR. HEALY asked what answer was to be returned?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, in their opinion, the resolution did not call for any reply.

THE IRISH CHURCH FUND—ESTIMATED ASSETS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If, in the Return of the estimated receipts of the Irish Church Fund for the next fifty years, which has just been issued, he is satisfied that a sufficient deduction or allowance has been made for the reduction or postponement of rent, interest, and other income receivable by the Commissioners, and that the estimated assets of the Fund can be relied on as accurate and capable of realisation?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my estimate was a minimum of £1,500,000. I will lay on the Table a further Paper, which will, in effect, contain a better answer than could be given across the Table of the House. It will show the ground on which we have proceeded in our estimate, and I have every reason to believe that our calculations will prove correct.

MR. MULHOLLAND asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the thirty-seventh section of "The Irish Church Act, 1869," requires that the accounts of receipts and expenditure of the Irish Church Fund for each year shall be presented to Parliament within five months after the expiration of such year; and, if so, why the accounts for the year 1881 have not been so presented; and, whether he could inform the House on what day they will be laid upon the Table?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the hon. Member correctly states the directions of the 37th section of the Irish Church Act. The Irish Land Commission, who have now charge of the Church property, asked the Treasury to change the end of the year of account from the 31st of December to the 31st of March, so that the Church Fund account might run to the same date as the other accounts made up by the Land Commission; and the Treasury assented to the change. The Church account is, therefore, under this arrangement, not yet due.

THAMES NAVIGATION—THE THAMES BELOW BRIDGE.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he is able to inform the House whether the Government intend to take any steps with a view of improving the condition of the river between London Bridge and Gravesend?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that, in concert with his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board, he had been considering the constitution of a small professional Royal Commission to inquire into this subject. The preliminaries were on the point of completion, and he hoped the Commission would institute the inquiry very shortly.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL—THE CONDITION OF IRELAND.

MR. MONK wished to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which he had not given him Notice. He wished to ask whether, considering the large amount of innocent blood now being shed day after day in Ireland, he was prepared to ask the House to vote Urgency with respect to the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill?

MR. O'DONNELL said, that before the right hon. Gentleman answered that Question, he should like to ask him if his attention had been called to the following declaration with regard to outrages in Ireland. It was in the form of a Pastoral from the Archbishops and Bishops of the Catholic Hierarchy in Ireland. It was as follows:—

"We should fail in our duty, without in any sense excusing the crimes and offences which we have condemned, if we did not declare that in our belief they would never have occurred had not the people been driven to despair by evictions and the prospect of evictions for the non-payment of exorbitant rents. Furthermore, the continuance of such evictions, justly described by the Prime Minister as a sentence of death, is a permanent incentive to crime."

He would ask whether Her Majesty's Government would postpone all other legislation until some measure for the immediate stoppage of evictions on the non-payment of exorbitant rent was passed?

SIR HENRY TYLER wished to ask whether it was the intention of the Government during the passage of the Prevention of Crime Bill, and before it could be completed, to take any further measures for the prevention of murder, outrage, and crime in Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE: My attention has been called generally to the document to which the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) refers, and I am not sorry that he has quoted certain words of mine in it, because I wish to say that it is entirely under a misapprehension that the opinion is said to have been expressed by me that a sentence of eviction is a sentence of death. What I said was, in my own judgment, whether rightly or wrongly, altogether different from that—namely, that, taking into account all the circumstances of the time and the condition of all but famine in which a number of people were, it could be no great matter of surprise if, from their point of view, a sentence of eviction appeared to be a sentence of death. It was not a statement made by me; I said it would be no great wonder that the people should think so. With respect to the other matters in the letter referred to, they do not call for any expression of my opinion, but rather belong to a discussion on the general state of Ireland. Speaking from memory, I think I am quite correct in the substance of what I have said as to the words attributed to me. With regard to the Question of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), it is a subject of constant anxiety with us how we can promote and expedite, to the best of our ability, the passage of this Bill. The time spent upon it has been considerably longer than we should have desired, and, perhaps, than we may have considered altogether reasonable. But then I am bound to say that it is an opinion which the Government has had to form many times during the present Session in regard to particular debates; and we are also bound to bear in mind that we have been discussing some of the nicest and most difficult questions, involving Civil rights, that this House can be called upon to consider. The modification of trial by jury, and the giving of a new application to the law respecting intimidation, are certainly matters on which we should not think ourselves warranted in attempting to draw the line between liberty and excess. We shall endeavour to consider, if necessary, what measures we ought to take to expedite the proceedings of the Committee; for while I do not hesitate to say now that we have got through all those difficult subjects, I hope I am not too sanguine in anticipating some more speedy progress. My hon. Friend inquires whether we will not ask for Urgency; but to ask for Urgency is one thing, and to obtain it is another. I think the circumstances under which we shall ask for Urgency will be such that, so far as we can judge, the House will be willing to grant it. We are not desirous of complicating the matter if we can possibly avoid it. I do not understand the Question that has been put to me by the hon. Member for Harwich (Sir Henry Tyler). We are now legislating on the subject of the prevention of crime in Ireland; and I do not understand what the Executive can do more, while that legislation is under the discussion of the House, than what we have been doing, and are doing, to the best of our ability—namely, to use to the utmost extent the forces that Parliament has placed in our hands for the maintenance of peace and order.

MR. HEALY inquired whether the Government intended to take any steps to prevent the execution of evictions in cases pending before the Land Commission?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to know whether, on the second reading of the Compensation for Disturbance (Ireland) Bill in 1880, the Prime Minister did not use these words—

"It is no exaggeration to say, in a country where the agricultural pursuit is the only pursuit, and where the means of the payment of rent are entirely destroyed for the time by the visitation of Providence, that the poor occupier may in these circumstances regard the sentence of eviction as coming for him very near to a sentence of starvation. . . . In the failure of the crops, crowned by the year 1879, the act of God had replaced the Irish occupier in the condition in which he stood before the Land Act. Because what had he to contemplate? He had to contemplate eviction for non-payment of rent, and, as a consequence of eviction, starvation."—[3 Hansard, ccliii. 1663.]

He wished to know whether the Prime Minister did not declare that a sentence of eviction was equivalent to a sentence of starvation?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have used many words since that speech was delivered; but, speaking from memory—though, I am sorry to say, my memory is not as good as it once was—I do not hesitate to say that the second passage expresses with great exactitude what I said; and with reference to the first passage, it entirely corresponds with the account which I gave just now.

SCOTLAND—LOCAL TAXATION AND EXPENDITURE.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Lord Advocate whether the Return lately presented to Parliament was intended to give an accurate and complete statement of the local taxation and expenditure of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): The Parliamentary Paper referred to by my hon. Friend contains only the Returns of Local Taxation in Scotland, now made for the first time under the Local Taxation Returns Act of last year. Returns applicable to the three subjects mentioned in the Question were previously required to be made by law, and such cases were exempted from the operation of the new Act. These Returns are consequently not included in the Paper referred to; but they will be presented separately, as they have hitherto been.

MR. ANDERSON: May I ask whether the learned Lord could arrange that these Returns should be given in one Report, so that it may be possible to see at once the total amount of local taxation in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I shall see whether that can be done. It would plainly be very desirable.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—MORNING SITTING.

MR. DILLWYN asked if the Prime Minister would inform the House whether he proposed to take a Morning Sitting to-morrow?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the experiment of Tuesday last, and the use to which the hours between 7 and 9 were put, were not encouraging, and he should, therefore, propose that the House should meet at 2 to-morrow.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PREVENTION OF CRIME (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 157.]

(Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 9th June.]

[NINTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

OFFENCES AGAINST THIS ACT.

Clause 4 (Intimidation).

Amendment again proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided, That no refusal by any person to deal with another in the way of the trade, business, or employment of either; and no declaration of intention not so to deal, and no resort to the practice of what is commonly known as exclusive dealing, shall of itself be deemed to be intimidation."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. HEALY said, he had proposed that Amendment on Friday, and he thought that it was a very reasonable one. He did not see why they should wish to import into the law a principle which had never yet been applied to the law of any country. His object was to provide that no act should be treated as intimidation unless it was of a specific and real character; and he wished to get from the Government a declaration that they did not propose themselves to use the Bill for purposes of intimidation. There were two kinds of intimidation—the intimidation alleged to be struck at by the Bill, and the ordinary intimidation which had so long been practised by the Irish police. The Irish Members desired to induce the Government to insert certain specific words in the Bill, in order to prevent the police from harassing shopkeepers and others in the exercise of their trade and business. The Amendment proposed that if a man in the way of trade, business, or employment refused to deal with another, that such refusal should not be held to be penal, and that a declaration of the intention of one man not to buy from or sell to another should not be construed to mean "intimidation" under the provisions of the Bill. He proposed the Amendment for the purpose of obtaining from the Government a satisfactory statement as to their intentions. If the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) were in his place, he would have asked him if it was not a fact that a system of "Boycotting" prevailed in India under the protection of the English Government and the English police? If a man connected with a particular caste desired to enter a place of worship belonging to a caste from which he might have been expelled, or to associate with the members of the same caste, the Indian police, so far from protecting him, would aid in "Boycotting" him, and in doing so they would be sustained by the Government of India. In all matters affecting caste one man was prevented from buying from or selling to another, and the "Boycotters" were protected by the Government. It was said that in India there was no Constitutional government. In Ireland Constitutional government did exist; but in Ireland the Government proposed to attack a system which was not only permitted, but actually maintained and protected in India. He wished to know why this disparity should exist in the case of Ireland; why the people there should be placed in a worse position than the Natives of India, with regard to whom the Government were ready to carry out caste prejudices and caste observances? He wished to point out to the Government that it was quite impossible to deal with "Boycotting" under this Bill, and, therefore, any attempt they made to do so must be ineffectual. As he understood the matter, the Government proposed to make it penal for a man to refuse to sell goods or trade with another man. That was all very well; but who, as a rule, were the objects of this "Boycotting" system? They were persons who had taken evicted land; and in order to take evicted land—to take a farm from which another person had been unjustly evicted—and to make that farm profitable, they must obtain for them the means of selling as well as the means of buying. It would be of very little use for a land-grabber to say that he should have facilities to buy provisions at a shop, if they did not obtain for him facilities for selling his own stock. Twenty policemen might drive a man's pigs to market, but 200,000 policemen could not make a man buy them when they reached there. He asked, then, how could the Government, by this provision, hope to cope with "Boycotting?" They could secure that the men who were the objects of "Boycotting" should obtain bread, by giving the shopkeeper six months' imprisonment if he refused to sell; but if a man wanted to sell his own stock, or butter, or anything else he possessed, they could not oblige a man to buy from him. That being so, what was the object of this clause? A man could obtain the necessaries of life by placing shopkeepers under a penalty of six months' imprisonment if they refused to supply him; but one of the necessaries of life was selling as well as buying, and how could they obtain for a man a purchaser for his goods if the people declined to buy them? That was the position taken by the Irish Representatives upon this clause, and they held that this provision would simply be used for the purpose of police persecution. It had often been said that the police of Ireland was a purely military organization, and, therefore, they were not so well able to detect crime as the ordinary police. Now, that was only one reason, and a very partial and incomplete reason. The reason why the police were unable to detect crime in Ireland was, that nine-tenths of the population detested the police. They never gave them any help or aid or comfort, because the Constabulary Force of Ireland was a detestable and obnoxious institution in the eyes of the masses of the people. And why? Because the police in Ireland only discharged three functions. If they found a donkey straying on the roadside they took it to the pound; if they saw a man driving a cart to market, they looked to see if he had his name on it, and if he had not, they brought him up and had him fined five shillings and costs; and if they saw a man the worse for liquor, although he might not be molesting anybody, they took him into custody. Those were the three things which the police did, and nothing more. They were very good for oppressing the people of Ireland, but beyond that they were of no use at all. They were occupied from Sunday to Sunday in doing nothing beyond what he had described, and that was the reason why they had not succeeded in obtaining the sympathy of the people, and why they were unable to detect crime. This Act proposed to put an additional weapon in the hands of the police. A man would be able to go into a shop, and say to the shopkeeper, "Have you got any butter?" If the man answered, "No, I have not," the police might be called in, and would say, "You are intimidating this man; and if you don't supply him with what he wants, we will take you before the magistrate, who will give you six months' imprisonment." The proposition of the Government amounted to this—that if a man asked for an article, and the shopkeeper refused to give it to him, by saying "I am out of that article," he was liable to fine and imprisonment. If the Government did not mean that, what did they mean? That was his view of their meaning; and all he asked was that the Government should provide in the Bill some safeguard that the measure would not be used in the manner alleged. There was nothing in the Bill to prevent the most malignant abuse of its provisions; and he contended that it would be malignantly and perversely abused. Could the Government show, by reference to any previous Acts of Parliament, either in this or any other country, that such a provision had ever been enacted? He challenged the Home Secretary, who was so well-known for his historical research, to find, even in Anglo-Saxon times, such a provision enacting that people were not to buy from and sell to whom they liked. What he proposed by the Amendment was that exclusive dealing should not be touched by the Government. Now, the phrase "exclusive dealing" was not a phrase of his own, but it was sanctified by having been made use of last year by the Prime Minister. Was exclusive dealing the exclusive property of the Irish tenants? The right hon. Gentleman told them then it was frequently used against Railway Companies and Steamboat Companies and others; and the Prime Minister asked the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), if that was what he meant in asking the Government to deal with "Boycotting." Why had the view of the Government changed now? What reason could they allege for the change on their part; and why had not the Prime Minister, who last year made excuses for "Boycotting," explained why he proposed to introduce a provision of this kind now? He hoped the Home Secretary would be able to show the Committee something that ran parallel with the provision they were now enacting in the enactments of other countries. Could he show from the copious sources of his information any reference to any previous Act passed by England, or by any other country under the sun, which proposed to make buying or selling under these conditions a crime? He challenged the Home Secretary to do so; and he said further, that so far as the right hon. Gentleman attempted in Ireland to cope with "Boycotting," his Acts of Parliament and all his efforts would be fruitless. Although they might compel a man, under a threat of imprisonment, to sell to another man, they could not compel a man to buy of him. Therefore, as far as the provision was directed in favour of land-grabbing, the clause would be quite useless. The Prime Minister said that, in the view of the people of Ireland, a sentence of eviction came very near to a sentence of starvation. The Prime Minister had called the Irish Members to task for not employing the phrase "unjust eviction." In the language which the right hon. Gentleman himself employed that qualifying adjective was absent. The words he used himself were "eviction comes near to starvation." A man went in and seized a holding, and made himself a co-partner in the sentence of eviction carried out by the landlord; and could anyone fail to feel that the land-grabber in doing so had committed an immoral act? It might be said he had not done an act which he had not a legal right to do; but there were higher rights than legal rights—there were moral laws—and he (Mr. Healy) contended that it was an unjust act, and an offence against decency, and an offence against the Law of God, that a man should take a farm from which another man had been unjustly evicted, and which practically amounted, in the words of the Prime Minister, to bringing down a sentence of starvation upon the head of some unoffending tenant. The Committee should take into consideration local colour and local prejudice. Why should they propose to legislate in this manner for the Irish people? All the Acts they might pass—if they went on passing them until Doomsday—would not get it out of the minds of the Irish people that, in the words of the Prime Minister, a sentence of eviction was a sentence of starvation; and anybody who lent himself to carrying out a sentence of starvation would commit a heinous and detestable act, and the natural corollary of that act was that he should be punished by every means the people had of punishing him, and the law ought to give him no protection. To quote the words of Shakespere—

[Ninth Night.]

Mr. Healy

“The world is not thy friend, nor the world’s law;

The world affords no law to make thee rich.
Then be not poor but break it.”

That sentence was used by Lord John Russell in a former debate on Ireland in 1852. The Prime Minister quoted it and reinforced it when he introduced the Land Act in 1870; and the Government, in carrying out a vindictive Statute like this, were simply depriving the Irish people of the only weapon they possessed for their own protection. The law gave these people no protection. Parliament had passed a Land Act which enabled a man to go into Court and get a fair rent fixed; but he might be four years before he had that fair rent fixed, and in the meantime the landlord might come down upon him and evict him for non-payment of a rent which might afterwards be declared to be unjust. Nobody but a malefactor would take an evicted farm; and yet the Government came in and proposed to protect a man whom the common sense and sympathy of the people condemned as an unjust man, actually engaged in stealing things that belonged to his neighbour. And, more than that, the Government constituted themselves his defenders, for the purpose of defeating their own Act of Parliament. They had passed an Act of Parliament to enable a fair rent to be fixed. Owing to the cumbrousness of that Act it could not come into operation immediately; and the result was that evictions took place, and the people appealed to an unwritten law—as if unwritten law had never been heard of except in Ireland—whereupon the Government stepped in and defeated their own Act by enabling the man who had taken the land unjustly to retain it. This Bill would only exasperate the people further, and, in his opinion, it was merely calculated to lead to the commission of crime. It was called a Bill for the Prevention of Crime; he thought it would be more happily described as a Bill for the Promotion of Crime. It would inevitably lead to crime; and he implored the Government to leave to the people, whom the law, unfortunately, did not protect, the only weapon they had in their hands for protecting themselves. If the Government made it a crime to “Boycott” a man, they might rely upon it that the people would resort to other means. [“Order!”] He said it advisedly. If the Government made it illegal for the people to use the only means they had of protecting themselves—if they deprived them of all means of enforcing their own Statutes—they might rely upon it that the people would fall back upon some other means. [“Order!”] The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) cried “Order!” but all the cries of the hon. Member and of the House would not alter human nature. He was speaking not of an Irish tendency simply, but of human nature. The people of Ireland had hitherto had a weapon by which they could protect themselves. That weapon the Government now proposed to take away from them, and they would fall back upon other means, and, to use the phrase of Louis Napoleon, “quitting legality enter on the lines of right.” A very important statement from the Catholic Bishops, with a Cardinal Prince at their head, was published yesterday, and those right rev. Prelates, numbering some 30 or 40 ecclesiastics of the highest position and responsibility, declared upon their responsibility—a responsibility, in their minds, as grave and as serious as the responsibility attaching to the Government of the country—that evictions were the root and parent of crime in Ireland. That being so, what did the Government propose to do? They proposed to take away from the people the only means and the only protection the people of Ireland had against land-grabbing. They had been told by The Times, and other newspapers, over and over again, that over-competition for land was the curse of Ireland. The only means they had of checking that system was to organize themselves and prevent men from taking farms from which other men had been improperly evicted. It must be remembered that the people who resorted to these practices had not the same means of making their views felt as the English farmers. He had heard of a case in Scotland where the tenant of a noble Lord who had been paying £4 an acre for the land he held came to the conclusion that he would, in future, only pay £2, and the surrounding farmers agreed to support him. They discussed the question, and came to that decision upon it at their hunts, and at their farmers' ordinaries on the market day in the market town. Nothing of the sort could take place in Ireland. The Irish tenants had not the same means of intercourse. They were unable to communicate with each other. They did not hunt as the English farmers did; they did not meet in the market town and dine together. They were too poor for that. And no institutions of that kind were to be found in Ireland where the members of the farming class could meet together. Now that the Land League was struck down they had no means of protection whatever; and it was against this miserable set of serfs the Government now proposed to legislate and to take away from them the only weapon they could use. When this Bill passed they would be absolutely defenceless. The law would give them no protection whatever. The Act of last year, according to the admission of the Prime Minister, was passed for their protection; but a majority of them would be unable to obtain the benefit of this protection for the next three or four or, perhaps, five years; and while the Government declared that these people were entitled to protection, and to have a fair rent fixed for them, they were snatching from them every other means of protection they possessed. In legislating for the English trade unions certain kinds of combinations were rendered legal. Why did not the Government allow to the Irish farmers exactly the same right? Why should the Government, by insisting upon the insertion of these harsh and tyrannical clauses in their Bill, exasperate every man in Ireland? In his view, they were doing nothing else. He deplored and lamented the position which the tenant farmers would occupy after the passing of this Bill. But it was indelibly implanted in his mind that the more of these Bills they had the more they would be likely to have. That being so, he could see nothing in the future of Ireland, if the Bill was put in force—as he expected it would be—in that spirit of vindictiveness and ferocity which distinguished the Executive of Ireland in the past, but an increase of crime. The Irish Representatives deplored more deeply than anybody else, the great increase of crime which had occurred in Ireland. And why? Because it encouraged the Government, with the approval of the majority of the English people, in insisting upon these stupid laws of coercion. When once they had introduced a Coercion Bill they could never touch bottom. They went on from bad to worse—the way to an unmentionable place being “of easy descent”—and in the end he could see nothing but Martial Law in front of the people of Ireland. Why, he asked, would not the Government take the advice of those who had the situation as seriously at heart as they had themselves—namely, the Irish Bishops and Archbishops? Surely the responsibility of the men who had the care of souls in that country was much greater than that of those who possessed temporal power. The mere offices which these right rev. Prelates held ought, in the eyes of the Government, to attach great weight to their representations. Therefore, he trusted that the Home Secretary would accede to this very reasonable proviso, and give the Committee some assurance that this clause dealing with intimidation would not be used in the manner the Irish Members apprehended.

Mr. Healy

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I should like to remind the hon. Member of the statement which he made last week. He said then that the Government ought to be content with the progress they were making with the Bill, seeing that they had passed the first four clauses of the Bill. But that statement was not technically true, and I am afraid it is not going to be substantially true, if we are to go on discussing this clause in the manner the hon. Member is discussing it. The hon. Member has made a speech which is a very able defence of the system of “Boycotting;” but we have discussed the system of “Boycotting” at great length already, and the Committee have made up their minds to suppress "Boycotting." What might have been considered by the indulgence of the House a tolerably fair speech upon the whole clause is not so upon the Amendment. There have not been two minutes out of the half-hour's speech of the hon. Member devoted to the bearing of the Amendment. Now, I do not think that is a fair way of dealing with the question or with the Committee. The question of "Boycotting" is, no doubt, a very important question, and the hon. Member has pronounced for the third or fourth time a panegyric upon "Boycotting." The Government do not agree with him, nor do the House. The Government have made up their minds, and they are not likely to change it. They will do all in their power and everything they consider necessary to put down "Boycotting." The hon. Member has referred to the opinion of the Irish Catholic Bishops, and the document which they have put forth. I have read that document; but I see in it no justification or praise of "Boycotting," as pronounced by the hon. Member. The hon. Member says that the police of Ireland harass the people. There are other persons who harass the people of Ireland as well as the police—namely, those who shoot them in the legs and fire bullets into their dwellings. Therefore, I cannot accept the views of the hon. Member as to the manner in which we should proceed. The hon. Member's ingenuity is inexhaustible. He recommends us to introduce the system of caste into Ireland, and to protect it by the police as in India. I do not think that argument is likely to aid the hon. Member very materially. He says this clause will not put down "Boycotting." Well, if it will not put down "Boycotting," why is the hon. Member so anxious and so afraid of it? If that is his view of it, let the clause go, and let us get on with some other part of the Bill; but if he is opposing the clause because it will put down "Boycotting," then I am afraid we must take the sense of the Committee as between the views of the Government and the views of the hon. Member. The Amendment is still open to all the objections that were stated on Friday by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. Then my hon. Friend said that this is confessedly a difficult and complicated subject, and we must endeavour to express ourselves as clearly as we can upon it, and put into the clause nothing that would be superfluous, because that which is superfluous is naturally dangerous, and confuses those who have to administer the law. We have said, over and over again, that exclusive dealing is not what we wish to cope with, and we have agreed to put in the words "in order to." We say that when these things are done in a manner intended to put a person in bodily fear, or in any fear of losing his business, or of being injured in it, it is an offence. That is our intention in this clause, and it is a perfectly fair question to raise. Either the Amendment of the hon. Member means that, or it means something different. If it means that, there is no occasion to put the Amendment into the Bill, because it is there now. If it means more than that, we do not mean more than that, and, therefore, we cannot accept the Amendment. That is the position of the Government with regard to the Amendment, and on these grounds we cannot accept it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was a Liberal statesman and also a member of the Bar, and he was astonished that a right hon. and learned Gentleman occupying those positions should have expressed the views the right hon. and learned Gentleman had just expressed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he objected to have superfluities put into an Act of Parliament. It was the first time he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) ever heard of a member of the Bar being opposed to superfluities in an Act of Parliament. But still worse was the position of the right hon. and learned Gentleman as a Liberal statesman. What was the object of the clause? The object of the clause was to take away from certain portions of Her Majesty's subjects the liberty they had enjoyed up to the present moment. It might be a good or a bad liberty, but it was a liberty they had enjoyed up to the present moment. His hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) proposed an Amendment for the purpose of safeguarding as much as possible the liberty the clause proposed to leave to the Irish people; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as a Liberal statesman, objected to words the object of which was to protect a portion of the liberty of the subject.

